The general grant of power "to lay and collect taxes and imposts," &c., given in the eighth section, is thus restricted in the ninth: "No capitation or other direct tax shall be laid unless in proportion to the census," &c.; 2d. "No tax or duty shall be laid on articles exported from any State." It is a sound rule of construction, and is founded in common sense as well as wisdom, that where a grant creates a general power, and enumerates exceptions to its exercise, that the expression and enumeration of those exceptions operate to exclude all others; because, having exceptions in view, and having specified some, it demonstrates that, if others had been intended, they would also have been expressed; this rule is so true that it has long been a maxim that "Expressio unius est exclusio alterius," and governs the construction of all grants and instalments in public or in private life. I am then warranted in saying, that the grant of power "to lay and collect taxes and imposts, &c.," provided the latter are uniform," is fettered or restricted by no other limitation than the two above expressed in the ninth section; and it follows that we can make any laws necessary and proper to lay taxes, if we do not violate the restrictions interdicting us from laying a tax on exports, and a capitation tax, contrary to the proportion of the census.

Mr. Speaker, an honorable gentleman from Virginia, on the Constitutional question, limits the power of Congress by what I call an interpolation in the Constitution. The words of that instrument expressly give Congress the power "to lay and collect taxes," and "to make all laws necessary and proper" to carry those powers into effect; but the honorable gentleman adds, that "necessary" means indispensably necessary. To this I answer, that the word indispensable is not used in the Constitution; the words used are necessary and proper. The error into which that gentleman and an honorable member from New York have fallen, is a want of precise meaning of the terms they use, or rather confounding two things in their nature essentially different. They confound the means or mode by which an end is attained with the end itself, and nothing can be more erroneous. The end, or power given, is to lay and collect taxes and pay the public debts; the power to make laws necessary and proper to effect that end is also given, and consists in devising and establishing the means of accomplishing it. The means to accomplish the end are no where restricted. All the restrictions are upon the power. The means or mode by which the collection is to be effected, is left to the wisdom and discretion of Congress making all necessary and proper laws for that purpose. I lay down this proposition as universally true, that where a power is given to do a particular act, as "to lay and collect taxes and pay the public debt," that it necessarily results that the party to do the act may do it by any mode or means he pleases (if more means than one exist,) if such mode or means are not prohibited; and I further state that the party in executing the power is imperatively bound to use the means best adapted to ac-comply the end. If, then, which seems generally admitted, a bank is useful and necessary in the collection of taxes and imposts, and payment of the public debt, and is the best mode of effecting it, the creation of a bank for such purposes is definitely within the power of Congress; and, more, it is the bounden duty of Congress to establish it, because they are bound to adopt the best practicable, or in other words necessary and proper, means to collect the tax and imposts.

If more means than one exist to carry a power into effect, neither can be said to be indispensably necessary, because either may be adopted to the exclusion of the other; and this mode of reasoning pushed far proves, that, where more means than one exist to execute power, the power is a dead letter.

That the creation of a bank is a means to excite a given power, and not the power itself, will follow from a careful view of the subject. Here my opponents and myself are precisely at issue. They say the creation of the bank is a power not given by the Constitution. I state it to be a means of executing a power given, and not the power itself. Let sound reasoning test our principles—what is a power, but an authority to attain a given end? What is the power given in this case? Let the Constitution speak for itself—“to lay and collect taxes, imposts,” &c., and pay the public debts. Now the power and the end are express, definite, and precise—there is but one power and one end; human ingenuity can make no more out of the words of the Constitution—but there are many means by which the power may be executed, by which the end may be attained, and those means are vested in Congress, by the power expressly given them “to make all laws necessary and proper to execute the powers before enumerated.”

Congress is a body politic and incorporeal, and must use some agency or means to carry a power into effect. To do it in this instance by the agency of a bank is one means; to do it by the appointment of officers to collect the taxes is another; to make the debtors themselves pay into the Treasury is a third. Now is it not an equal exercise of power, to create and appoint officers to collect, preserve, and pay away public money, as to create a bank for that purpose? The power is the same, though exercised in a different way; but the mode of its exercise does not affect the nature or essence of the power—this is most clear; and I ask gentlemen, in the sense they use the word, where is the express power in the Constitution to appoint and pay officers to collect taxes? Certainly it grows out of the power “to make all laws necessary and proper,” &c., and is no where else to be found; then the necessary consequence is, that the creation of a bank, or the creation of officers, to collect taxes and imposts, &c., is not a Constitutional question, but of sound discretion, as most suitable to promote the public good, and the House has power to adopt either, as in their judgment shall be found most necessary and proper.

Now, for the great objects of economy in collection, safety in keeping and facility of paying it away, as and where the exigencies of Government require, a bank has a decided preference over the appointment of a multitude of officers, with salaries or commissions; the chance of negligence; the risk of loss, and most insuperable difficulty and embarrassment of transmission at home or abroad.

I trust, Mr. Speaker, that I have shown that correctly viewed, the creation of a bank is a means, not an original power; that, as a means it is best adapted to the end or execution of the power, and that, to attain the end, a full, express, definite grant of power is given by the Constitution. But, sir, I ask, is our Government never to settle down to stability—an object so desirable and so important to the happiness of the people? If, from the inexplicitness or imperfection of language, doubts have existed, which have been decided by the concurrence of this House, the Senate, and the illustrious Washington, in the exercise of their Constitutional functions; and twenty years last past have exhibited a practical commentary on the Constitution, ought we not now to regard it as sacred?

Has not Congress, and have not all the States, sanctioned the legitimacy of the bank, by passing penal laws against counterfeiters of its paper? Have not many of the judiciaries inflicted imprisonment and deprivation of liberty on offenders under those laws; and are we now to be told, that the original law which induced all these punishments is unconstitutional and of course no law? But, sir, I will not repose my argument on the fact of long acquiescence in the States, nor of acquiescence under the Administrations of Washington, Adams, Jefferson, and Madison; I will advance a step further, and show that this House, under the Administration of Mr. Jefferson, and that Mr. Jefferson himself did under his own hand acknowledge the legitimacy, and consequently the Constitutionality, of the bank. In 1804, Mr. Nicholson, of Maryland, made a report authorizing the Bank of the United States to establish an office of discount and deposit at New Orleans. A bill was drawn, it passed this House, it passed the Senate and was signed by President Jefferson the day it was presented to him. It was entitled “An act supplementary to the act entitled an act to incorporate the subscribers to the Bank of the United States.” Here let us pause—it is really ludicrous, sir, to see the gravity and wisdom of the nation engaged in passing a supplement to an unconstitutional law. One would suppose, sir, that if the original law was brought into view, if deemed unconstitutional, the object of bringing it into view would be to repeal it—but what was the fact? Why, the very reverse took place; instead of repealing it they enlarged the powers of the bank.

Now, sir, I call on honorable men to answer me with precision—to meet two questions in the teeth; 1st. Was it not as unconstitutional to enlarge the powers of the bank, as originally to create it? 2d. Is not the enlargement, so far as it goes, a new creation of power? Gentlemen cannot escape from these questions by saying that the bank had this power before the act of 1804. I deny it; but for the sake of argument, be it so. Then, I ask, why was that supplement passed? And was not the passage of the supplement a direct affirmative recognition of the power, if already in the bank, and to give it to them, if they had it not?

Sir, I will trouble the House no longer on this part of the subject—I trust I have satisfied gentlemen that we have authority to create a bank under the Constitution; that this authority has been acted on by Federal and Republican administrations; and the United States and the States have acquiesced in it, and sanctioned it many years without murmur or remonstrance.

Mr. KEY then proceeded to examine the question on the ground of expediency, &c.

Mr. PICKMAN.—I acknowledge, sir, that I feel very anxious to have the charter of the United States Bank renewed. Not from any personal interest which I have therein—for I have none. Nor from a regard to the interest of the stockholders, for I consider that very unimportant, when compared with the interest of the Government, and of the community. This question has acquired an artificial importance from the manner in which it was originally discussed and in which it has been discussed at this time. It has been treated as a great Constitutional question, when, according to my view, it involves no great Constitutional principles. Ingenuity has surrounded it with a mist of sophistry which has obscured it, and presented it to the mental eye through a very delusive medium. I shall not attempt to follow the gentleman from New York (Mr. PORTER) in all his nice and ingenious distinctions between the powers vested in the Federal and State Governments, nor in his metaphysical refinements on objects, ends, powers, and means; but shall leave that task to gentlemen of more industry and more talent than myself. His observations, however, on the position laid down by the late General Hamilton, in his celebrated argument on this subject, appear to me so extraordinary that I cannot forbear to notice them. The position is, that every power vested in a Government is in its nature sovereign, and includes by force of the term a right to employ all the means requisite, and fairly applicable to the attainment of the ends of such power, and which are not precluded by restrictions and exceptions specified in the Constitution, or not immoral, or not contrary to the essential ends of political society. And to prove that the powers of the Federal Government, as to its objects, are sovereign, the following clause in the Constitution is considered as decisive: "That the Constitution, and the laws of the United States made in pursuance of it, and all treaties made or which shall be made under their authority, shall be the supreme law of the land." Now the words supreme and sovereign are synonymous terms; if there be any difference, the word supreme is of the highest import, it being frequently applied to the Almighty himself. But the gentleman from New York (Mr. PORTER) as I understood him, observed that the power to pass the supreme law does not give the Government sovereign power, for the highest law which any Government can pass is a law to inflict the punishment of death. The sheriff who exercises this law, said he, is not therefore possessed of sovereign power. Certainly not; he is only the instrument of the sovereign power, as much so as the axe or the halter with which he executes the sentence. But "the Government is not sovereign because it is made to depend in some degree on the State Legislatures"—if they were to omit to appoint Senators the Government would die a natural death. If they were to neglect it they would violate their oath to support the Constitution of the United States. But "the sovereign power is in the people." The sovereign and the physical power are often confounded together. The people in their collective capacity are as much bound by the immutable rules of justice as each one is in his individual capacity. The people of the United States are under a Constitutional and moral obligation to support the Federal Government—and it is not proper to presume that they will omit to do what it is their duty to do, and found an argument on such presumption.

But, to return to the subject of the bank. If we consider, sir, what are the purposes for which it was established, and what are the privileges with which it is invested, we shall, I think, find that the former are not only Constitutional, but highly necessary, proper, and useful, and that the latter do not interfere with State rights. The Constitution of the United States vests Congress with the power "to lay and collect taxes, duties," &c.; "to pay the debts, and to provide for the common defence and general welfare of the United States," "to borrow money on the credit of the United States, to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States, and to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers." It is, therefore, the right and duty of Congress to facilitate, and to render as certain as possible, the collection of the revenue. It is their right, and their duty, to provide places of safe deposit for the public moneys. It is their duty to discharge the public engagements with punctuality and good faith, and, if possible, to provide the means of transmitting the public moneys from one place to another, as the public exigencies may require, without the risk of loss to the United States. Has not the bank answered all these highly important and necessary purposes? Can they be so well accomplished by any other means? I presume not, for the ingenuity of those who oppose the renewal of the charter—and certainly, sir, they have displayed much ingenuity—has not suggested a plausible substitute. It is surmised that the public moneys may be transmitted from one part to another in specie, which may be carried by land, or sent by water in Government vessels, or, that it may be done by the private drafts of merchants. The objections to these modes are too obvious to render it necessary to enumerate them. It is sufficient to say that each of them would subject the United States to frequent losses, and the Government to constant disappointment. But, it is thought by many that the fiscal concerns of the Government may be conducted through the instrumentality of the State banks; and, in fact, it is the interest of the State banks which excites much of the opposition to the renewal of the charter of the United States' Bank. In my opinion, however, it is an erroneous view of their interest. I apprehend that many of them will sustain a shock from the suppression of this institution, from which they will never recover. How can the public business now done by the United States' Bank be executed by the State banks? Congress have no control over them, are ignorant of their funds, unacquainted with the conditions on which they were granted, and of the principles by which they are governed. Some of them are, undoubtedly, entitled to confidence, but many of them are not. It would be imposing on the Secretary of the Treasury an invidious task and a most unpleasant responsibility to make a selection. In every view which I can take of the subject, it appears to me that it would be the height of imprudence and indiscretion to suppress the Bank of the United States and deposit public moneys in the State banks. If, however, the privileges conferred, and necessarily conferred on the United States' Bank are unconstitutional, then it is our duty to suppress it. Let us candidly consider what these privileges are. The greatest, in my opinion, is, that its bills are receivable for duties. I do not know that any one has pretended that Congress transcended their powers in conferring this privilege. It is this, however, and this only, which gives its bills a circulation throughout the United States; it is this which enables it to transmit large sums from one extreme of the Union to the other, as the exigencies of the Government require. Nor do I see how this necessary privilege could be conferred on the State banks. Certainly, it would not be safe to give it to all of them, and if you were to select a few it would excite the most serious discontents. Besides, it is necessary that the banks between which this intercourse is to subsist, as that of drawing upon each other, should have a common parent to regulate their affairs, and to secure them from ruin from unexpected and, of course, unprepared for drafts. It is necessary, in fact, that there should be such an institution as the United States' Bank, and the only question is, how shall it be established? By the State Legislatures, or the Federal Government? But, it is said that the establishment of branches in the different States is a violation of the State sovereignties; and the gentleman from New York (Mr. PORTER) says it is so, because the States have laws against usury, and that the banks make more than lawful interest upon their capital, and thereby violate the law of the States. This objection applies to all banks. Now, so far are the banks from having practised or encouraged usury, the suppression of it may be considered as one of the best effects of their establishment. The United States' Bank is restrained by their charter from letting their money at a rate exceeding six per cent., and I believe that this is not usury in any of the States. In some of them the legal rate of interest is higher. Their profits over six per cent. are what they make as bankers, and not as money lenders. It is said to violate the State laws because the persons and private property of the stockholders are not made responsible for the payment of its notes. This is the case with every artificial person. He is not accountable in his private capacity for the notes which he gives, or the contracts which he makes as such. The stockholders of the bank may be considered as public agents, and, as such, it would not be reasonable to subject their private fortunes to the payment of its debts unless they abuse the trust reposed in them. Such a responsibility would render it impossible to establish the institution; nor is it necessary for the public security; for it is next to impossible for a bank with such funds to become insolvent if its affairs are honestly and judiciously managed. If they are otherwise, no guards will afford security to the public.

It appears to be thought by many, that, because the State Governments have a right to incorporate banks, therefore, the United States' Government has not the right. Now, it is an implied power in the State Governments, for there is no such power expressly delegated to them in any of State constitutions. They assume the right because it is not prohibited to them. Upon the same principle has the United States' Government the right to establish a bank, provided it be necessary to the accomplishment of the purposes for which the Government was instituted. I again inquire, Mr. Speaker, if the fiscal operations of the Federal Government do not require such an institution? Has not the experience of twenty years fully evinced its utility to Government? Have not the public moneys been safely kept? Have not large sums been continually transmitted from one place to another as the public exigencies have required, and without loss to the United States? Why, then, suffer an institution which has done so much good—which has proved so safe and so useful—to run down, and trust to precarious and unpromising substitutes? But, while I am anxious to have the charter of this bank renewed from a full conviction that the fiscal concerns of the Government cannot be managed with convenience or safety in any other way, I feel infinitely more anxious that it should not be suppressed at this time, on account of the community at large. Such an event must, in my opinion, be productive of the most distressing consequences.

Perhaps there has never been a period when our merchants were more embarrassed than they are at present, and when it was more difficult to raise money. They have large funds in England, but at present there is no demand for exchange upon that country. They have large quantities of imported merchandise, but the prices of most articles are merely nominal. The bank has seventeen millions of dollars due to it from the United States and individuals. It has to the amount of five millions of dollars in gold and silver in its vaults. There is due to it from the State banks about two millions of dollars on their bills and on deposits. It owes about fourteen millions of dollars, payable on demand, and it will probably be very soon called upon for this money. To fulfil its own engagements, therefore, it must immediately call for seven millions of its debts, and within a short period for the remaining ten millions. And this last sum must eventually be paid in specie. Whence is this specie to come? From the vaults of the State banks, if it be there. For the payments to the United States' Bank will be in bills of the State banks. These bills will be immediately sent to those banks to be exchanged for specie; thus they, instead of having it in their power to aid the debtors to the United States' Bank, as some erroneously suppose, will be obliged to call on their own debtors; and every specie dollar taken from a bank may, and probably will, oblige it to call for two or three dollars of its debts. It does not appear to me unreasonable to suppose, that, by compelling the United States' Bank to call in the seventeen millions of dollars due to it, we shall compel the State banks to call in as large, if not a larger sum. How these payments are to be made, and what effects are to result from such a state of things, I pretend not, sir, to sufficient discernment to foresee. It will probably produce a general suspension of the payment of debts and an almost total stagnation of business. It will greatly depreciate the value of every species of property, and thereby reduce many persons to insolvency who flatter themselves that they have much more than enough to pay their debts. It will raise an enormous demand for money, and, of course, throw many persons into the hands of the griping usurer. It will distress all classes of people except the moneyed capitalist. If, in addition to this measure, our non-importation act should go into effect, thousands must be overwhelmed by ruin. The shock may first be felt in the seaport towns, but will ultimately extend to the remotest villages in the country. I deem it, sir, a very unfortunate circumstance, that our paper circulating medium so greatly exceeds the amount of our specie; that so large a portion of it is the representative of lands, houses, and merchandise, instead of being the representative of gold and silver. But this is not the fault of the Federal Government; it is owing to the numerous banks which have been instituted by the State governments. This furnishes to my mind a strong argument against the institution of banks by the States, and in favor of the power being vested in the Federal Government, which superintends the affairs of the United States. As I have before observed, our paper circulating medium dangerously exceeds our specie; should we adopt a measure which will affect its credit, it will produce consequences which none of us can foresee. On the other hand, by continuing the bank, we tread upon perfectly safe ground; twenty years experience of it has proved that it is calculated to answer all the purposes for which it was established. It has proved very useful to our merchants and to the community at large, not only by furnishing loans, but also by supplying a medium which circulates throughout the United States, and thereby renders it much easier for the merchant of the Northern States to purchase the productions of the Southern States. It may be truly said, that it has aided the agriculture, the commerce, and the manufactures, of our country. Its affairs have generally, if not uniformly, been conducted with fidelity and ability. Yet we are about to suffer this valuable institution to fall. We shall thereby compel the Secretary of the Treasury to have recourse to untried, troublesome, and hazardous expedients for the management of our finances, and we shall probably lead many of our fellow-citizens into ruinous speculations. It is absurd, after the experience we have had, to ascribe to it any great political influence. It was established by the Federal Republicans when they were the ruling party. It has always been under their management. Yet, with this monstrous engine in their hands—this engine which is to govern the Government—their political opponents have gained an absolute and uncontrollable ascendancy. Continue it, sir, and you will probably do much good. Suppress it, and you may bring on incalculable evils.

Mr. W. ALSTON said, that the motion to strike out the first section was undoubtedly a fair way of attacking the principle of the bill; but as the same motive, even if he did hereafter vote against the bill, would not govern him as it had other gentlemen, he begged leave to state the reasons why he should vote against the motion. It has been contended, said he, by gentlemen who have gone before me in this debate, that the Constitution did not authorize Congress to continue this charter, or to have created it in the first instance. I am opposed to this doctrine of the restriction of our powers, because I believe, if practised upon to the extent that gentlemen of great talents contend, the Government itself cannot get along. I do not believe that gentlemen can put their finger on the Constitution and show their authority for a number of acts which we are compelled to pass, any more than they can put their finger on the particular passage which authorizes the granting this charter.

Sir, we are met on the threshold of this question by the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. BURNWELL,) on Constitutional grounds; and I will take the argument of that gentleman alone, and I think can prove that he himself has given up the Constitutional question. In the clause which many gentlemen have called the sweeping clause in the Constitution, I find these words: "Congress shall have power to make all laws necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof." The gentleman, well satisfied that this clause confers the power, attaches to it, to make it the more important, the word "absolute— ly" before he is able to give any weight to the construction for which he contends. I have examined the Constitution over and over again for the word absolutely, and can find no such word. Where, then, does the gentleman get it from, but from the very same source that he charges on the favorers of the Constitutional right to pass the law? It is by implication that he calls in the aid of the word absolutely before necessary. With what propriety, then, can he refuse to others the exercise of the same right that he himself has taken? If gentlemen have the right to interpolate this word, why may we not as well interpolate others? It is denied that the doctrine of implication can apply with regard to granting charters. If it can apply in any way, why not in this way? If I can show to the House that it might apply in some cases, or it will be impossible that you can execute the object of the Constitution, why may it not as well apply in the case of granting charters as in any other. I ask gentlemen to put their finger on the clause of the Constitution which authorizes them to pay away one cent of the public money? How do they get at the power but by implication? You have a power by the Constitution to pay the debts of the United States—but that part which provides for the payment of debts, means debts already contracted, and owing at the time of the adoption of the Constitution; that, too, is in the sweeping clause, which gentlemen will certainly not avail themselves of. But you have not the power expressly given to create a debt, other than the clause which authorizes you to borrow money on the credit of the United States; but none will contend by this you are authorized to make contracts and go in debt. There is an important clause of the Constitution, which gives to the United States power to call out the militia of the States for particular purposes. Show me the spot in the Constitution which authorizes the payment of the militia. Not one. The power to call them out implies the power to pay them. It inevitably follows, that the power to lay and collect taxes and raise a revenue implies the power to take care of it. Will gentlemen pretend to deny it? What is the argument of gentlemen on this point? They say it is true that a bank is necessary for the safe-keeping and paying the debts of the United States; but, say they, the banks of all the States are open to you. How does this doctrine apply to the United States? Have not the States themselves denied the connexion of the State and Federal Governments? Can I quote a State which does not afford an example of this disposition? The seat of a gentleman of high standing in the Legislature of Virginia was vacated merely because he was a contractor for carrying the mail. Will then the State of Virginia, who is so jealous of your influence over her officers, permit you to exercise that influence by placing your money under officers created by her? Let gentlemen examine this question. The argument will not bear them out. In the State which I represent, also, a law has been passed to prevent a person from holding any office or appointment at the same time under the State and Federal Governments. What right have the directors in a State bank, appointed by the State, to contract with the General Government to keep its money? I deny their right.

Putting the State banks out of the question, it is necessary that we should create means by which we can transfer the money of the Government without expense, hazard, or loss. I will state a case. We have an army in the city of New Orleans, which must be paid. By paying the money at Baltimore or Philadelphia, it is transferred to the paymaster at New Orleans without costing you a cent. Is not this convenient, expedient, necessary, to comply with the interest of the United States in the case I have stated? I do not believe it possible, taking the ground that they have the right to place money in the banks of the individual States, that such a connexion between them could ever be established with the same ease, convenience, and safety, as at present, to pay, in the different parts of the Union, money which the United States are bound to pay. I ask the question, Will a bank in North Carolina trust a bank in New Hampshire? No; but the State and every individual in it would trust the Bank of the United States. You could not establish a connexion between North Carolina and New Hampshire so that either would trust the other. The establishment of the Bank of the United States affords, in this case, a facility useful and absolutely necessary, in my opinion, to carry on the measures of Government. How will putting down the Bank of the United States have an effect to lessen the quantity of paper in circulation? If I could think so, I would join the gentleman most seriously; but the very contrary, in my opinion, would be the effect. The Bank of the United States and its paper serves as a controlling power, keeps the State banks in proper bounds, and prevents them from issuing a vast quantity of paper which would inundate the country. They are very confident, if they issue too much paper, that there will be a run upon them, because the interest of the United States' Bank and the State banks do not at all times go hand in hand. At this time it certainly restrains the circulation of State bank paper.

It is said, sir, that the States are not compelled to do particular acts which they are required to do. To be sure, the States have the physical power, but they are bound by the same solemn oath to carry into effect the Constitution of the United States, that the members of this House are. It may as well be said that the State Legislatures may, if they choose, refuse to appoint electors to vote for President and Vice President, or elect Senators; but the obligation upon them is as strong as upon any other department of the Government, as it is upon the members of this House to perform its duties. They have taken a solemn oath, and must perform its obligations.

Sir, there is one part of this Constitution, which, in my humble opinion, gives the power completely. It is a part of the Constitution which I never heard any gentleman mention, nor any writer on the subject. I may put an erroneous construction on it, but, if I am correct, the conclusion is inevitable. In the 10th section of the first article, it is said, "No State shall coin money, emit bills of credit, or make anything but gold and silver coin a tender in payment of debts;" and the interpretation which I give to it is that the United States possess the power to make anything besides gold and silver a legal tender. If this, then, be the correct construction, it is a clause which I have never before heard relied on. If what I conceive to be the fair interpretation be admitted, it must follow that they have a right to make bank paper a tender. Much more, then, sir, have they the power of causing it to be received by themselves in payment of taxes. If they have power to make paper of any description whatever receivable in payment of all debts whatever, can any one deny that they have a power to make it a tender in payment of taxes or debts to the United States? After admitting the power, will you place the exercise of it in your Secretary of the Treasury, or in the hands of fifteen or twenty men whom you call directors? But I might not have voted against concurring with the committee in striking out the first section of the bill, if I stood on this ground alone.

To the bill, in its present shape, I should have no hesitation in giving a decided negative; but there is a plan on which I would vote for the renewal. Sir, I ask gentlemen, who have voted against it on Constitutional ground, to meet me on this point—the plan is, that the additional stock shall be taken wholly by the United States; that they shall be bound to distribute it among the individual States, having respect to their relative numbers, at its par value. The States would take it, if they think proper; if taken there is an end to the violation of State rights. In a plan of this kind, a distinction is brought to the mind of every man, whether he will prefer the interest of the great body of those people who are represented in the State Legislature, or whether he will support the interest of a few who think proper to incorporate themselves for the support of a bank. The true question is, whether the emoluments of the banking system should belong exclusively to a few, or collectively to the whole United States. I therefore hope the first section will not be stricken out. In discussing the detail such a plan would be more interesting than any other can be to the States. The advantages of such a system must be seen. The anxiety evinced for the renewal of this charter and the credit of the State banks altogether, in consequence of the money made by the banking system, is then done away. The money arising from the profit of the banks will belong to the States in their individual capacity, and the taxes of every individual are lessened in proportion to its share of the capital. Let gentlemen bring the question home to them; let them examine how it concerns their constituents, and put the question, which of the two will interest the great body of the people the most?

Putting down the charter of the United States' Bank will not put an end to the banking system. Cast your eyes about you at what has taken place at the last sessions of the State Legislatures? Has one of them adjourned without establishing a bank? It is bank paper as much when issuing from State banks as when from the Bank of the United States. There is no difference. If this question had not been attacked on Constitutional ground, if it had been left merely to expediency, I should not have troubled the House on the subject. I know too little of the concerns of a bank to think of making a speech on the details alone. But I know how much interest moves us on this question. When you place money in the State banks, you give a complete license to the State banks to issue what they please. What was the loss of paper money during our Revolution? Did it not fall on those who had given credit; and are we prepared to meet such a shock as that? Could we have stood it in any other cause than that in which we were engaged? Here let me enter my protest against the banking system altogether. But we have it. Is not the consequence more dangerous; will not the loss ultimately be greater, to let the State banks issue paper at will, than to control them by the Bank of the United States?

If the doctrine which gentlemen advance about putting the finger on that part of the Constitution which gives power to carry on the Government itself be true, we may as well quit legislation altogether. You cannot go a single step without calling in the aid of implication. When a means is necessary and expedient, when the operations of Government cannot as well be carried on in any other way as by it, then it is necessary, and, being necessary, is Constitutional.

The House adjourned without coming to a decision.

MONDAY, January 21.

The SPEAKER presented a memorial of the Legislature of the Indiana Territory, stating the extreme scarcity of money within the said Territory, and the reasons of such scarcity, and praying that the land laws may be so amended as not to exact interest from the date of purchase on the several instalments not punctually paid for lands purchased of the United States.

On motion of Mr. HUBBARD,

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be laid before this House such information as he may possess respecting seizures, captures, and condemnations, of the ships and merchandise of the citizens of the United States, under the authority of the Governments of Europe or either of them, which has not been heretofore communicated.

Mr. HUBBARD and Mr. BIGELOW were appointed a committee to present the said resolution to the President.

On motion of Mr. HELMS,

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be transmitted to this House a return of the Army, with the stations at which garrisons are fixed, and the strength of each garrison; also, the state of the recruiting service, and the progress that has been made therein since last session.

Mr. HELMS and Mr. TRACY were appointed a committee to present the said resolution to the President.

On motion of Mr. McKINLEY,

Resolved, That the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures be instructed to inquire into the expediency of altering or repealing the second section of the act, entitled "An act to annex certain shores and waters to the district of Mississippi, and to authorize the building of a custom house at New Orleans," and that they have leave to report by bill, or otherwise.

Mr. POINDEXTER presented a petition of the Legislature of the Mississippi Territory, praying that the said Territory may be admitted as a State into the Union, on an equal footing with the original States; which was read, and committed to the Committee of the Whole, to whom is committed the report of a select committee on that subject.

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES.

This subject was called up, and Mr. NEWTON made a motion to postpone the further consideration of it indefinitely, but withdrew the motion until more members should come in, the House being thin. A short time afterwards—

Mr. GARLAND said that on this very interesting subject he thought the House ought to act understandingly and prudently. He wished that they should not precipitate the Government into difficulties from which it would be difficult to extricate themselves. He wished they should take at least a little time to reflect; that his friend from Virginia (Mr. LOVE) should be permitted to go on and take out his letters of administration, as proposed on Saturday, and see what could be done. If the gentleman could show that the Government could conveniently carry on its fiscal operations without the bank, Mr. G. said he should be ready to go with him. But, until that was shown, he did not wish a decision to be precipitated. He therefore moved to postpone the further consideration of the bill till the first of February. There would in the interim be time to see how they could form their plans, and how they would be able to conduct the fiscal operations of the Government. If a suitable substitute should be offered for the purposes of collecting and transferring revenue, it would be the means of reconciling many gentlemen to vote against the bank. He hoped therefore the postponement would be agreed to.

Mr. NEWTON said the House had had ample time for reflection on this subject. He did not believe that any alteration would be wrought in the opinions of members by a postponement. Gentlemen ought to recollect that the subject had been under consideration for three or four years past. Every one had revolved it in his mind. Sir, said Mr. N., I know these moneyed institutions. I know what sort of things they are; and, after the time that we have had to consider the subject, I think it all important that we should come to a decisive determination. Let me tell you, sir, that intrigue and artifice will wear away the best principles. Ample time has been given for it already. I am for laying the legislative axe to the root of the evil; I am for immediately deciding this question, and turning to some other business; and for this purpose move that the further consideration of the bill be indefinitely postponed.

The motion of Mr. NEWTON supersedes that of Mr. GARLAND.

Mr. LOVE said he rose principally at this time to ask for the yeas and nays on this question. He thought, with the gentleman last up, that it was highly important there should be an immediate decision, and he would add to the reasons already offered in favor of it, another. It is now three years, said he, since Congress were called upon, in the most imperative terms, to act upon this subject. In the petition of the stockholders, three years ago, it will be recollected that it was stated that unless a certain assurance was given that the charter would be renewed, they must immediately commence a curtailment of their discounts, &c. We have now progressed to within about six weeks of the time when this institution will cease to exist, and yet we find, by an inspection of their accounts, that they stand very nearly in the situation in which they were at the time the subject was first brought before Congress. If this company were not to have their charter renewed, the sooner they know it the better. On the part of the Government it is important that an early decision should be had, that they may not run the risk of losing revenue to an immense amount; for who knows who is to administer on the assets of this institution? In consequence of the law now in existence, requiring deposits to be made in the Bank of the United States and its branches, there would soon be within their control, in specie and bonds, an amount of sixteen millions of dollars of the public property. Under present circumstances, it is highly proper that immediate measures should be taken to withdraw these deposits. Every gentleman before this time must have had an opportunity to make up his mind; and I hope the question will be decided without further delay. As the mind of no gentleman in the House could be changed by a discussion, it is to be hoped that the question will immediately be taken.

Mr. TROUP conceived the motion now made to be perfectly proper. He felt, however, under no obligation to accommodate the bank. The act granting an act of incorporation was entirely a voluntary act, and the duration of it limited in the act itself to a term of twenty years. If the bank had acted the part of an ordinary or discreet merchant, it would have taken care, before the expiration of its charter, to have wound up its business and be prepared to meet the event; because the Legislature was not bound to renew it, not having, either by the original charter, nor by any subsequent act, given any pledge that it would do so. The bank not having received any pledge of renewal, ought to have been prepared for its dissolution. If the institution had done what they ought to have done, the Government, so far as it is concerned, would have prepared itself against the event, as he was told it was now about to do, by substituting arrangements with the State banks for arrangements with the Bank of the United States or its branches. Mr. T. could therefore see no difficulty in assenting to this proposition, whether as respected the Government or as respected the individuals concerned in the bank.

Mr. FISK inquired whether it was understood that deposits in the United States' Bank would be transferred to the State banks without the sanction of law?

Mr. WRIGHT.—Mr. Speaker: The importance of this subject, and the great attention that has been paid to gentlemen while delivering their opinion upon it, is a sure guarantee that I also in my turn shall receive the attention of this House, while I deliver my sentiments. I pledge myself, in this exhausted state of the debate, not to consume more of their time than a correct sense of duty to my constituents shall impose.

This subject, sir, is presented to our consideration in a two-fold point of view, as to its constitutionality; and as to its expediency. I will therefore proceed to consider it in that order.

On the point of its constitutionality I shall take the liberty to recall your attention to those parts of the Constitution on which its advocates have seemed to rely. The gentleman from Maryland (Mr. KEY) cites the 1st art. 8th sec.: "Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, imposts, duties, and excises, to pay the debts, and provide for the common defence and general welfare of the United States." He also read the 1st article, 9th section: "No capitation or other direct tax shall be laid, unless in proportion to the census or enumeration hereinbefore directed to be taken." However, not yet himself satisfied with being able to derive an authority from these sections, he calls in aid the last paragraph of the section, "Congress shall have power to make all laws necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof." The gentleman insists, that the power to lay and collect taxes, &c., &c., and the sweeping clause, empowering Congress to make all laws necessary to carry that power into execution, will authorize Congress to grant a charter to this bank; that it is necessary to the collection of taxes, that Congress provide by law the means whereby the taxes should be paid. I had always presumed that the power to lay and collect taxes, to provide for the general defence and common welfare, only authorized Congress, under the limitations of the Constitution, to provide by law for those purposes, by directing whether the tax should be a direct or indirect tax, or by capitation; and that their powers extended no farther than the specification of the objects, if the tax was direct, and the rate at which the specific articles should be valued; in the case of a capitation, what should be paid by the head; and in case of indirect taxes, what should be the duty on the several articles taxed, and, in either case, to direct the mode of ascertaining and collecting the same, by whom to be ascertained, and by whom collected, and to whom paid. But I never did suppose that this power, even aided by the sweeping clause, could be conceived seriously to extend to the providing means to those who had to pay the tax, whereby they were to be aided in the payment. Such a construction would as well justify the passing a law compelling the culture of land in a particular way, whereby the crops might be increased; as the farmer cannot pay his tax, unless he raises produce for sale; or indeed it might be extended to compel him to use plaster of Paris to improve his crop, and facilitate the payment; which I should deny, even if the tax was made payable in produce.

The same gentleman seems to have relied on the article "That no capitation, or direct tax, should be laid, but in proportion to the census," as forming an exception to the powers of Congress; and I presume means to infer, as this bill will not be a capitation tax, that Congress may pass it, under their power "to lay and collect taxes," and the sweeping clause to carry their specific powers into execution. Sir, the Convention never intended that Congress should have or exercise the power to establish banks, or they would have made use of apt words to have vested them with it. Bank, sir, is a technical term, and if they had intended that power they would certainly have used that term. When it was intended to give any power, we find the Convention had no difficulty in expressing it; as, Congress shall have power "to coin money and regulate the value thereof, and of foreign coin"—and here let me remark, is an express power "to coin money," which, if we were left to legal construction, would be an affirmative pregnant that they should not emit bills of credit. But, sir, we need not rely on construction to prove what powers Congress have not, as one of the amendments to the Constitution provides, that "Congress shall have no power that is not expressly given." And to give a power by expression is to use apt words for that purpose; and it of course becomes necessary to the power in Congress to establish a bank, that such a power should be given by such specific terms, as would unequivocally, and without construction, convey the right.

As to the sweeping clause, "to pass all laws necessary to carry into effect the foregoing powers of Congress," the letter of this section confines its operation to the specific powers of Congress, previously enumerated; and can in no sort create constructive powers, or be construed into a creation or extension of power. Sir, if a doubt can remain of its harmless and inoperative nature, I trust it will be removed by a reference to the second volume of the Federalist, page 202. "It is expressly to execute these powers; that the sweeping clause, as it has been affectively called 'authorizes the National Legislature to pass all necessary and proper laws. If there be anything exceptionable, it must be sought for in the specific powers, upon which this general declaration is predicated. The declaration itself, though it may be chargeable with tautology or redundancy, is at least perfectly harmless." Here we find one of the framers of this instrument, when defending this article, called the "sweeping clause," from the charge of its being used to extend the powers of Congress, or to embrace other than the specific powers, himself confining it to the express powers, and indeed declaring that it gave no power, was a mere tautology. Yet gentlemen seem to think that it is an important delegation of power, and confidently quote it as such, and indeed if their construction of it were indulged, it would discharge us from every Constitutional obligation, that we, in our discretion, might suppose the public good required, but I trust the good sense and patriotism of this House will never suffer it to substitute discretion for expression, their will for the law.

An honorable member from North Carolina (Mr. ALSTON) has, with some confidence, cited the tenth section of the first article: "No State shall emit bills of credit, or make anything but gold and silver a tender." He urged this denial of the right to the States to emit bills of credit as a perfect prohibition of the States to grant bank charters, and insisted that bank notes were bills of credit. He spoke of this section as a discovery of his own, not noticed by anybody before him as applicable to the case. Sir, the gentleman certainly misapplies the term, "bills of credit" to "bank notes." The term "bills of credit" was surely intended to express and prohibit the emission of paper money, which had been emitted by the States and by Congress, during the war of the Revolution, and had so depreciated as to impress the Convention with the propriety of prohibiting their emission in future. By a recurrence to the proceedings of the old Congress, and the laws of the several States, it will be found that the term "bills of credit" was technically used for paper money; nor can there be less doubt that bank notes have also their technical meaning, as the paper issued by bank directors, and neither of the terms "bills of credit," or "bank notes," could by men of legal intelligence be used for the other. "Bank note," and a "bill of credit" are terms so well known to the law, that in legal parlance neither could be substituted for the other. On a prosecution for counterfeiting either, the other could not, I apprehend, be given in evidence. I must therefore insist that the gentleman's construction of the Constitution is incorrect. But, sir, if it was correct, and the States could not grant bank charters, would it follow that the Government of the United States would possess the right? I presume not, unless that article of the Constitution which declares "that all powers not granted to Congress are reserved to the States or the people," shall be blotted out of the instrument, or totally disregarded. Sir, I hope we have not already arrived to that lust of power; and I trust the present case, when its expediency comes to be examined, will not seduce any member of this House from his regard to this hallowed instrument.

Sir, the Secretary of the Treasury, (A. Hamilton,) at the time of the passage of the law establishing the United States' Bank, and who may be called the father of it, labored with unceasing assiduity, in every stage of it, to give it a legitimate existence. We see him, sir, insisting on the power to grant this charter, as conferred by the section that authorizes Congress to lay and collect taxes, and by the sweeping clause, "to pass all laws necessary to carry the preceding powers into effect," anything in his opinion, in the "Federalist," before cited, as to the harmless quality of the sweeping clause, to the contrary notwithstanding. Sir, we see him driven from these stands by the Attorney General, (Mr. Randolph,) and by the then Secretary of State (Mr. Jefferson,) the last of whom insisted that a proposition in the Convention to authorize Congress to grant corporations, had been rejected; which so thoroughly closed the case that we find Mr. Hamilton, although he questioned the authenticity of the document relative to the rejection (by the Convention) of the articles alleged to have been rejected, taking post behind that article of the Constitution, that "Congress shall have power to dispose of, and make all needful rules and regulations, respecting the territory, or other property, belonging to the United States," and insisting that the shares of the stock, contemplated to be subscribed by the United States, would bring the law, granting the charter, within that section which authorized the United States to make all needful rules and regulations respecting the property of the United States. But this would not justify the renewal, as Congress have sold their stock. Thus, sir, we find the advocates of this power in Congress to grant a charter to the Bank of the United States, fixing on a variety of the sections of the Constitution, from whence they infer we have the right; and although by the express letter of an amendment to the Constitution, Congress can exercise no power not expressly or specifically granted, yet these gentlemen insist we have the right, although they cannot agree among themselves on the article by which it is specified, and indeed each is an authority against the other, that the power is not granted at all; and although they all agree on its being Constitutional, they are as much at a loss to fix on the article by which it is made so, as the ladies of Strasburg were to decide on the composition of Sterne's celebrated nose; though they all agreed it was a noble nose.

The gentleman from Maryland says, Congress have, by the law authorizing a branch of this bank to be established at New Orleans, recognised their right to grant a charter; and insists that this ought to be considered as an authority to that purpose. Strange that the gentleman's zeal should so transcend his judgment as to induce him to press so futile an argument. Congress, at the time of passing that law, had a right to make any law necessary for, and beneficial to New Orleans; it was then a territory, and by the positive provisions of the Constitution, Congress have the power to make all "needful rules and regulations respecting their territories or other property;" they have exclusive legislation over it, and may make any law that a State could, as to its government, as well as any law authorized by the Constitution to be passed by Congress.

Sir, by this charter, the directors of this bank were authorized to fix branches in every part of the United States; and when Congress became the purchasers of New Orleans, they considered it a portion of the United States, and of course that the directors of this bank had the right to establish the New Orleans branch bank, and felt no hesitation to declare it by law, as they had a perfect Constitutional right to make all needful laws for their territories; of which the Orleans Territory then was, and yet is one. Yet, sir, this act of good faith in the nation, to this bank, is pressed as an authority to bind this House to consider the constitutionality of this question as settled; but the good sense of this body will secure the United States from the calamity of re-chartering this bank, and committing the best interests of this nation to its foreign and domestic enemies.

Now, sir, having presented this view of the unconstitutionality of this question, I must beg the further indulgence of the House, while I present also my view of its inexpediency.

Sir, this charter is very nearly allied to the funding system; they had a coeval conception, and the same progenitors. They were conceived in sin, and born in iniquity. The funding system was founded in the basest of frauds, to the best of men, the war-worn soldier, whose necessities compelled him to part with his certificates, the price of his blood and toil during an eight years war; and out of which the arch-speculator, availing himself of those necessities had trepanned him at half a crown in the pound. These certificates, sir, were funded to the holders with their interest at par, and with other certificates for supplies for the Army and Navy, which had also depreciated, were funded at par. And although it was ably contended that the certificates granted to the original holders only should be funded at par, and that those held by speculators should be funded at a certain exchange, yet, sir, such was the influence of that well organized band, under the auspices of the then Secretary of the Treasury, that no discrimination could be effected whereby Congress might have been justified in paying the poor soldier for his loss, by being obliged to part with his certificate at less than its nominal value; a loss occasioned by the inability of Congress to pay them at the time agreeably to their contract; a loss, by Congress forcing upon them these certificates, and their total inattention to the payment of them, for many years, and until they were possessed by the hopeful band of speculators who were the active agents of this system. As an evidence of its corruption, the Continental bills of credit which had been issued from time to time were to be funded at one dollar in the hundred. They, sir, were as a circulating medium in the hands of the people, who, however honestly they might have received them for supplies to the Army and Navy, at the same time, and at the same price that their neighbors furnished them supplies, for which they took their certificates, which this system funded at par for the benefit of speculators, while the holders of the bills of credit were funded at one hundred for one. Could, sir, anything but corruption have prevented the discrimination between the original holders of the certificates and the speculators; or have induced the funding of certificates (for supplies furnished at the same time and the same price) at par, that denied it to those holding the bills of credit?

This banking system was partly made up of these corrupt materials of the funding system, which composed a portion of its stock; was illegitimate in its conception, partial in its establishment, and corrupt in its administration; is a mammoth moneyed aristocracy, violative of the Constitution, of unlawful origin, under the control of foreigners, who have proved their principles, by the selection of its directors, all Federalists. This stock was to be subscribed at a short day in Philadelphia, convenient only to that neighborhood; it was partial. When, in Maryland, a bank is to be established by law, the proportion of each county is allotted it; books are opened, and the stock subscribed for in each county; and why were not books opened in each State, and their portions of the stock allotted to them as in Maryland? Sir, when we consider that the directors of the mother bank in Philadelphia are elected under the influence of foreign stockholders, to the amount of upwards of seven-tenths of the whole capital, we are not left much to conjecture, why these twenty-five directors are all of a particular political complexion, nor why a list of them, and of the directors of the branches, as required, has not been furnished, as an agent here had it in his power. Sir, I should have been glad of the list, as being pretty well read in the biography of the people of this country, I should have been enabled to have pointed out, I have no doubt, a number of traitors to the Revolution, Burrites, and embargo-breakers; the whole phalanx being at every stage of Republican Administrations of this country, with few exceptions, opposed to every measure of those Administrations. I am a little surprised at their temerity in asking and expecting a renewal of that charter by which directors have used their influence corruptly to control the measures of the Government, and the elections of the patriotic favorites of the people. We have seen a petition, signed by a number of the merchants of Philadelphia, addressed to General WASHINGTON, to ratify Jay's memorable Treaty, a number of whom were known to have been its bitter enemies, and it is a well-known fact, that the reason assigned by them for that act was, that they were induced to subscribe it under the threats of these bank directors, that if they did not, they need expect no more accommodation at the bank. We have seen at Baltimore their influence exerted in the memorable election between General Smith and Mr. Winchester, where Edward Johnson, now Mayor of Baltimore, and a bank director of the State of Maryland, and Mr. Matthews, now and often a bank director, were put out, because they had the presumption to think for themselves, and the temerity to vote for General Smith. These gentlemen were of unblemished reputation, and equally entitled to respect with their successors. I have not a single doubt but they did not suit the directors of the mother bank; they had supported a patriotic soldier of the Revolution, a sin of too deep a dye to be forgiven by this Britannic chosen band, who have lately put the seal to their principles in the election of Evan Jones, now president of the branch bank at New Orleans, who succeeds a gentleman of republican principles. This Mr. Jones is said to be a refugee from the United States at the commencement of the American Revolution, and a British officer, during that period, who has been lately more than suspected to be one of Burr's chosen band. If at a time when the directors are soliciting the renewal of their charter, they can thus outrage every principle for which our patriots bled, and prefer the patricide to the patriot, at a time when the eye of the nation was fixed upon them—what, I ask, after a twenty years' renewal of charter, may they not be expected to do, or how, in the case of a war with Great Britain, might they not be expected to act? How would a patriot of America be expected to act in supplying funds to our enemies to prosecute a war against this country? It would certainly be a treasonable adhering to our enemies, giving them aid and comfort. But, sir, we are told this is a harmless institution, all important to the fiscal concerns of the United States; influenced by no motives but the common good. Strange, indeed, would it be, to ascribe to the stockholders of seven-tenths of the capital of this bank, (reported by the Secretary of the Treasury to be foreigners,) and known to be Englishmen, a disposition friendly to this country. Sir, here is a strong foreign influence on the moneyed concerns of this country. Money has been correctly called the sinews of war; and are we to suppose that Britons are not as much attached to their country as Americans are to theirs, or that the strength and influence of this institution will not be put in full operation against us when it has been committed to the care, and put under the direction of men known to be in hostility to the best interests of this country?

Gentlemen on the other side, however, insist that there is no improper influence to be apprehended, and deny it to be a party question, although it is well known to have originated in party, under the auspices of the great Federal leader, Alexander Hamilton; although it has been conducted by directors of the mother bank, exclusively Federalists; and although every Federalist in this House is now its advocate, it is said to be harmless. I think, sir, the placing in the hands of twenty-five directors, elected by stockholders seven-tenths foreigners, to have the direction of twenty millions of dollars, when money is admitted to be the sinews of war, particularly when we consider their political complexion, and retrace their political conduct, cannot be safe to our republican institutions, on the score of its moneyed influence. But when we consider the patronage of these directors, who, by the charter, have a right to establish as many branches in the United States as they please, say one to each State, with the appointment of thirteen directors, a president, and seven officers to each branch, with as great accommodations as directors, and salaries to their officers averaging a thousand dollars a year each, making upwards of one hundred and seventy thousand dollars to their officers, and more to their directors—sir, this is a patronage greater than is possessed by the President of the United States. And will any gentleman who regards the solid interest of this country be disposed to give this aristocracy, organized as it is, and composed of such materials, the key of this Treasury with its privileges? I had always supposed that the Treasury of this country ought to be in the hands of Representatives of the American people; they are said to hold the purse-strings of the nation's treasure, and not that body who now directs this bank. Have they not denounced the Administration and every measure of the Government, and supported its most inveterate enemies? But suppose them to have been correct in all their measures, ought the nation's Representatives to give to foreigners, knowing them to be such, the immense advantages flowing from the renewal of this charter, or to one set of her citizens this benefit, which they have enjoyed for twenty years, in exclusion of her other citizens, who, to say no more, are equally entitled to the favors of Government?

If, sir, we have the power and feel it necessary to the fiscal concerns of the nation to have a National Bank, the eight million two hundred thousand dollars held by foreigners in its funds ought to be withdrawn, and that share of stock distributed among the States, having an eye to stock already held by citizens; so that the proportion of each State, agreeably to the relative census of the States, might be apportioned and subscribed, whereby the establishment might be purged of its foreign influence. But, it is said, these foreigners will send their gold to England. Can any man of sound judgment suppose they would transfer their capital to England and take four per cent. in England, and that in paper, when they can loan their money in this country, at six per cent. and get the interest in specie?

Sir, there can be no possibility of their exporting their stock in specie very speedily, when you take a view of the late report of the Treasury; they will not have specie to meet the specie engagements of the bank. Sir, this institution was established by the Secretary of the Treasury, without a bonus or any solid advantage to the United States. He well knowing what had been the engagements of the stockholders of the Bank of

H. OF R.

England, at its establishment, and frequent extensions in its accommodations to the British Government; and that the derangement in its fiscal concerns had forced these extensions on that Government. He also well knew that when the two insurance fire companies, "The London" and the "Royal Fire Insurance Company," were established with a capital of four hundred and fifty thousand pounds sterling each, they gave as a bonus to the British Government one hundred and fifty thousand pounds each, and yet this experience was not turned to the benefit of the United States; but this charter was granted without any benefit but to speculators, who were holders of the funded debt, which was made a part of the stock of this bank. Sir, in the provisions of the law for the establishment of this bank, whose capital was to have been ten millions of dollars, the stockholders were so favored, as to be permitted to go on as soon as four hundred thousand dollars were paid in, (one-twenty-fifth part of the capital,) and thus on that small sum they proceeded to business and received an interest on fifteen millions of dollars; and so much in conclave are its concerns, and so much under the control of men of a particular political complexion, all the directors of the mother bank at all times have been Federal or worse, many of them Tories or monarchists; so that, as to its secrets, it might be compared to the inquisition, and being under such control I have ever doubted the statement of its funds. Sir, the humiliation of having such an assemblage of characters selected by foreigners to select directors for the branches in each State has ever been truly grating to the honest feelings of Republicans, and violative of the rights of the States, to whom an independent Republican Government has been guaranteed.

Sir, there can be no necessity for this bank. The State banks are abundantly sufficient to supply every requisition, if the United States deposits are made in them. This goes all lengths to defeat the arguments of gentlemen, predicated on the principle of necessity, as vesting this power in Congress. There are banks in Baltimore alone with a nominal capital of eight millions two hundred and eighty thousand dollars, four millions nine hundred thousand dollars of which is paid in; and if a nominal capital of the United States' Bank of ten millions of dollars, with four hundred thousand dollars only paid in, could begin and progress in business, is it possible to doubt that the banks of Baltimore, with four millions nine hundred thousand dollars paid in, already in operation, could not go on, with the deposits of the United States, and extend their business, so as to give every necessary accommodation to individuals and the public? Can there be any magic in the United States' Bank? Or can any honest American feel a predilection to its foreign stockholders, or to their hopeful selection of directors? I trust not. Therefore, there can be no cause of alarm; no danger to the fiscal concerns of the nation. But, sir, many of the States have banks, and will no doubt conduct them as honestly and impartially as the United States' Bank has been conducted, and under the direction of men the United States may as safely trust, and on whom the public may as confidently rely for accommodation; unless, peradventure, some gentlemen might repose more confidence in foreigners, than in their own citizens; but I hope and trust there are none such within this sanctuary of the liberties of the nation. We have been told by a gentleman from New York, (Mr. Fisk,) that agriculture, commerce, and manufactures, will receive a vital stab by suffering the charter of this bank to expire. This is a groundless phantom, produced by the feverish fancy of this gentleman laboring under the bank mania; but, sir, if agriculture, commerce, and manufactures, were to feel it, in the extent suggested by the gentleman, I trust those classes of our fellow-citizens would bear it with fortitude, when they reflected that it could not be renewed but by a violation of the Constitution of the United States—a violation of the rights of the States, to whom is guaranteed an independent Republican form of Government, and perhaps a violation of our independence, for which the best blood of our heroes was shed on the altar of liberty. This charter is a cancer on the body politic, which I hope we shall suffer the hand of time to eviscerate and eradicate, and no longer suffer any foreign agency in the regulation of the internal affairs of this country; and that we shall preserve our fiscal concerns from the influence of those whose interest it is to destroy them. But we are told, by the same gentleman, that the Secretary of the Treasury, whom he calls the Chancellor of the Exchequer, has reported this bank as necessary to the fiscal concerns of this country; and I suppose, by giving the Secretary of the Treasury the title of Chancellor of the Exchequer, he wished to impress this House with the powers of that officer in England, to give an imposing influence to the Secretary here: and while he advocates the interest of these foreign stockholders, he so far forgets himself as to introduce into our Government a Chancellor of the Exchequer; but I hope we shall exercise our own judgment, and be satisfied with our own Government, organized as it is, disregarding the principles of foreign Governments, and the interest of foreign stockholders. Sir, we are told by the same gentleman that Congress sold to foreigners two hundred thousand dollars of the stock in this bank but a few years ago; and, therefore, we ought to renew the charter. Sir, the purchasers knew the tenure by which this charter was held, and the precise moment of its death; they bought it as it was, a perishable article, and the selling of the stock by the United States ought to have been considered as the tocsin of its dissolution, at the time appointed for it. The claim to renew the charter on that ground, is as ridiculous as for a man who has bought a horse, on his death to demand another. We are told of the vast inconvenience our merchants will experience by not having an universally circulating medium; how, say they, can money be paid by a Bostonian at New Orleans? Sir, money is not paid in large commercial transactions, and, if it were, would it not be an easy matter, if a merchant has Boston bank notes, to get the specie for them, and send that to New Orleans? How, I ask, would he do if he wanted the money at the Havana, or any foreign port? And why cannot he do the same at New Orleans? Sir, this is the common lot of merchants? But, sir, if the gentleman has Boston United States' branch bank notes, could he get gold for them at the New Orleans branch bank? No, sir, and a gentleman who had five hundred pounds of the United States' mother and branch bank notes, might have to travel to every State having a bank, to get the specie, as neither will give specie for the paper of the other, and are to that purpose foreign to each other. Indeed, it has been suggested, as a practice, to secure the bank from a pressure for specie, to circulate the Eastern notes to the West, and so, vice versa, whereby the holders, on the fourth of March, will be put to great inconvenience in procuring specie for them. Sir, the people of England had no national bank till the year sixteen hundred and ninety seven, less than a century before the establishment of this bank, and they were enabled to conduct their great commercial concerns, to great advantage; and as the United States had an extended commerce before the establishment of this bank, I trust her merchants will be able still to conduct advantageously their commercial concerns, without our sacrificing the Constitution we are sworn to support, or being tributary to foreigners, whose interests I never can respect, when in collision with that of the American people.

Mr. Boyd said he was unwilling to give his vote on the question of indefinite postponement, without offering to the House, and those that he in part represented, his sentiments. I shall vote, said he, for the postponement; and, should that vote not prevail, then against the bill in its present form, and every other in which it may be presented to me for a renewal of the charter of the Bank of the United States, predicated on the original grant; because to my mind it is unconstitutional. And here, Mr. Speaker, you must allow me to go back and take a look at the time and manner of its creation, and how it originated. To my mind it was created in aid of the funding system—and what was that debt so created, not contracted? Was it for the redemption of the bills of credit called Congress money, that paid your Army in the field; fed and clothed them for years? No. Was it to redeem said bills that were paid to the farmer for his flour, beef, teams, hay, and supplies to the Army? No, no, sir. How then? Why, after those bills had so far depreciated that the farmers were unwilling to receive them, then certificates were given at the comparative price of those depreciated bills. Then, again, it became necessary to liquidate those certificates down to specie value. Were they called in then? No, no, sir; no redemption yet—and let me tell you, sir, it was that paper and credit that placed you in that chair, and me on this floor. Well, next the Constitution is formed, and Congress set themselves about paying the debts of the United States, and some part of the several States' debt. Mr. Speaker, how was it done? Runners go out in every direction, to purchase those liquidated certificates, and they succeed, at 2s. 6d. in the pound value up to 8s. All the certificates funded did not on an average cost the purchaser more than five shillings in the pound. Now, sir, the bills called Congress money, are all, or next to all, sunk in the hands of the holders, and fifteen shillings in the pound of the residue. Now, sir, an act of general justice takes place! The said certificates are funded at 20s., or their nominal value to the speculator; and an interest of six per cent. per annum given to him; to pay which, duties are laid, and money borrowed to pay the interest in advance of the revenue. A charter is now granted for a bank of ten millions of dollars, seven and a half millions of which was to be this aforesaid State paper, and two millions five hundred thousand in specie; and when a small part of that was paid in, they were allowed to begin their discounts and issue their paper to double the amount of the whole capital! viz: twenty millions; these certificates drawing six per cent., making seven millions five hundred thousand of the stock. Now, this part must, according to this statement, give to the stockholders eighteen per cent. for the deposit of this State paper, and twelve for the residue. Now, Mr. Speaker, I will ask where was the redemption for these bank notes so issued? Surely not in the bank, for that was seven and a half millions State paper as above, drawing six per cent. Not in cash, for that was not supposed to be there. Therefore, to my mind, this was a great deception; swindling I will call it. Ah! but, say some, by this means you were furnished with a capital and enabled to carry on commerce to a great extent. I deny the fact; our capital was the produce of our soil and industry. Banks, at best, are no more than a convenience to merchants; and I respect honest merchants; they are useful and necessary, but I do not include bank stock jobbers, or men calling themselves merchants without a capital, mere drones in the hive. No, sir, the latter is a moth to the Commonwealth.

It appears to me, that this scheme of banking is an evil in its operation something like the faro table, always in its operations, at each round, depositing six per cent. to the stockholders—for what? The exchange of a note discounted, and the note so lodged the best of the two! Ah, and is this indeed the capital of our country? Sir, I am lost in the chicanery. The banks enable us to overtrade on a false capital; depreciate our property; demoralize our citizens, and take or send the gold and silver out of the country. Let me state this a little further. I will suppose a line drawn at a distance from the sea of fifty miles, the whole length of the continent. I would ask, if the cultivation of that tract of country would be equal to the maintenance of themselves and those collected in the cities? I believe not. Then, again, let me suppose that, on an average, the whole length of our country be cultivated to the distance of two hundred miles from the seaboard. Then, it appears, that the average distance that we have to take all our transportable produce is one hundred and twenty-five miles. It is believed that the cultivated distance is, on an average, nearly four hundred miles, which will enhance the price of transportation mostly by land to the cities. Now, sir, at the general price, one-third, and, in some cases, one-half, is expended in getting the produce there. But this is kept out of sight, and much said about high and great prices obtained by the farmer. It is nominal, not real. It is paid them in depreciated bank paper. Sir, I do contend that not only the bank paper is depreciated, but that, by the means of its abundance, the gold and silver is depreciated. One dollar, eight years since, was worth more than one dollar and fifty cents is at this day. Besides all this, I ask, is there cash in their vaults to redeem their bills? No, no, sir, not for one-half. Thus, sir, are the people swindled out of their property to support gambling and chicane. Is this what enhances property and gives a capital to carry on commerce? No, for myself, I think not. It is the product of our soil and our industry that is the capital, and on that we do and ought to trade; and that trade ought to be internal, turned to our own manufactories in a great part. I do not say that banks are not convenient and useful to a certain degree; but I do not think that the advantage is equal to the disadvantage. I am well aware that such sentiments will be treated with ridicule; but, sir, that does not intimidate me; they are my sentiments, and as such I give them, without the least fear of intimidation, having in view the happiness of my country; and I will venture to say, that the day is not far distant, if we progress as we have done with banks, that the country will experience an universal shock from this false capital. Before you, sir, are propositions for charters of incorporation within this District for banks to the amount of four millions. Can there be a want of capital? If there is, how is this stock to be furnished?

H. OF R.

Bank of the United States.

Mr. Speaker, we hear from Richmond, Baltimore, and Philadelphia, much said against the renewal of the United States' Bank charter, and I agree with them; but, I believe, from very different principles. The profits of this bank have been, from its issues and the deposits of the revenue and private individuals, immense, and they want the cards in their own hands to play the same game. I think they are not entitled to much credit. The odds consists in this: the one is against the Constitution, the other not; the principle is the same in both.

Mr. Speaker, if we must have a National Bank, let it be so in reality. I shall not attempt to go into the detail of such an institution. It is not my purpose; but I think that it might easily be done by making a portion of our public lands the foundation of such part as the United States should choose to subscribe or hold; the bank to be created in the District of Columbia, and to extend branches into such States as, by law, would choose to accept them. Sir, I had much more to say on this subject, but I perceive that the House is impatient, and I do not wish to detain it, and shall add no more.

Mr. McKEE.—Residing as I do in a part of this country, remote from the scene of bank operations, I had determined to say nothing on the subject, contenting myself by giving a vote, flowing from the honest convictions of my heart; but the extraordinary manner in which this discussion has been managed on the part of the opposers of the bill, by attempting to make it a party question, has compelled me to commence my defence of the vote I expect to give on this motion. So far as I know, or believe, my suffrage in favor of a renewal of the charter of the United States' Bank is in conformity with the views and wishes of the people whom I have the honor to represent; and any change in their sentiments which might be effected by the frequent appeals to their passions and prejudices, made in the form of argument, it becomes my duty to correct.

We are arrested in the threshold of this discussion by a Constitutional objection, by which it is alleged that Congress do not possess the power of renewing this charter. I had thought this question long since settled, not alone by those who originally granted the charter, but confirmed by Mr. Jefferson and the votes of a Republican Congress. I have been led to this opinion by a recurrence to the act of Congress of the 23d of March, 1804, by which the President and Directors of the Bank of the United States are authorized to establish offices of discount and deposit in any of the Territories or dependencies of the United States. A gentleman has said, this was a power possessed originally by the bank. If so, for what end was this law enacted? It must either have been enacted from an opinion that the charter could not, without this aid, be extended to New Orleans, or that it was proper and necessary, in order to the well management of the fiscal concerns of the country, that this institution should be extended to New Orleans. Either case answers my purpose; for, if the bank could not, without this act of Congress, establish an office of discount and deposit at New Orleans, (which seems to be the better opinion,) then the passage of a law extending the influence, the power, and the profit of the bank, cannot be considered in any other light than a tacit and full acknowledgment, on the part of Mr. Jefferson and the Republican Congress, that the charter was within the pale of the Constitution. For, sir, can it be supposed, that Mr. Jefferson, and Congress, who were more republican in 1804 than at any other period, would have extended, bolstered up, supported, and cherished an institution, originally obtained by a violation of the sacred charter of our political rights? No. Surely it is impossible. And if, sir, this office of discount and deposit was induced to go to New Orleans, because it was necessary and proper to be sent thither for the better management of the collection of taxes at that port, this circumstance admits the only fact necessary to be in proof to establish the power of Congress to pass the law.

If, sir, any additional proof could be wanting to show that the power of Congress, under the Constitution, has been considered sufficient by this Administration, to authorize them to grant the charter in question, it is abundantly furnished by the act of Congress of the 24th of February, 1807, for the punishment of frauds committed on the Bank of the United States. By this law Congress have subjected the citizens of the United States to capital punishment, for counterfeiting the notes of the United States' Bank. Now, if Congress, by the Constitution, have not the power originally to grant this charter, the notes of the bank were certainly issued in violation of the supreme law of the land, and Congress had no power whatsoever to pass a law making that criminal which was in itself no crime, and could not, by any conception whatever, be considered as a violation of any law of the United States. It seems to me to be perfectly paradoxical and absurd to say that any institution, having no legitimate right to issue paper, nevertheless has a right to the interposition of Congress in their behalf, making it a crime against the United States to counterfeit this paper, which was issued in violation of the supreme law of the land. Under this act of Congress the citizens of the United States have been deprived of their liberty as well as subjected to heavy fines, by the decisions of your courts. A citizen of Kentucky has been doomed to confinement in the jail and penitentiary house for a violation of this act of Congress, and he was not relieved from the fangs of the law by the President, (Mr. Jefferson.) How are these things to be reconciled on any other ground than by admitting the Constitutional validity of the original act granting the charter?

But it has been stated that this charter, when originally granted, operated in the nature of a contract, and that Congress could not repeal the act of a former Congress granting a charter, and hence the power to make, and propriety of passing, the act in question. This idea is altogether fallacious, because it is an indispensable requisite to all contracts that the parties thereto shall be able to contract. If the Constitution vested no power in Congress to make the contract, it was absolutely void; and if the Congress of 1807 were thus impressed, they could not and would not have passed the law in question, and therefore I infer that they considered that the Constitution had vested Congress with the power to grant the charter.

In addition to this, we find that the present Secretary of the Treasury, under the auspices of Mr. Jefferson, made a report in favor of the renewal of the charter of the United States' Bank, in pursuance of a resolution of the Senate passed on the subject. This report called forth no animadversions from any section of the country; and I have ever understood that, if this question had then been brought forward, it would have passed by a large majority of Congress. These circumstances have led me to suppose this question had received the ratification of every party and of every Administration, and, what is still of more importance and higher authority, the sanction and confirmation of the sovereign people, and therefore considered as an adjudged case, tested by experience.

I shall not consume the time of the House by any enumeration of the powers of Congress, arising from the Constitution itself, with a view to prove that Congress originally had the power to pass the law granting this charter, and still possess it, because this ground has already been occupied with great ability, and the power of Congress to pass the bill clearly shown, and, any remarks which I might make, would only be a repetition of the arguments of others. I shall, therefore, content myself by answering some objections made to the bill.

It is said the bank will be a thorn and a viper in the bosom of the United States, which will ere long, sting the political liberty of this country to death. This is a strong charge, and, if it be found true, it must be conclusive against the bill. But, let us examine this bold assertion by the test of reason and experience; this charter was given by Congress twenty years ago; since that time the Constitution and the political liberties of this country have been in the hands of our political opponents, and are now in our hands unimpaired. The country has, in the latter period, been prosperous beyond example; agriculture has prospered, commerce has flourished, internal improvements have increased, the people have enjoyed peace and prosperity, security and happiness, in a degree infinitely superior to that of any other nation on earth. No deleterious consequences have grown out of this institution, affecting the security or liberty of the citizen or the country. It is said, and truly, too, that ours is a Government of experiment, none similar to it ever having existed before. Here, then, is the test of experience in favor of this institution, and why discontinue it to try some devious and unknown track?

But, sir, suppose there is something of truth in this statement: I ask if State banks are not equally as dangerous to the political liberties of the States, as this bank can be to the United States? And if the political liberties of the States are stung to death, I ask where will you find the liberties of the United States? I believe they will sink with the liberties of the States. But, if gentlemen are really serious on this subject; if they believe that banking is fraught with thorns and not with roses, and wish to return to the state of native simplicity which existed in the pure ages of ancient Greece and Rome, I will unite with them as far as we have power, in plucking up by the roots this monster, and make a common bonfire of the charters of every bank in the nation. To do less would not cure the evil, if any exists.

But it is said that this institution will destroy Republican principles and Federalize the country. This bank, as I have already stated, was in operation in Federal times, and, notwithstanding its influence, those times have changed. Experience, the best possible test of human affairs, does not bear gentlemen out in this assertion. On examination we find, that the States of Rhode Island, Connecticut, and Delaware are the only States in the Union who are represented in the Senate and in this House exclusively by Federalists—yet there is not now and never was a branch of this bank in either of those States. But there is a branch bank in Georgia, South Carolina, Virginia, Maryland, New York, and Massachusetts, and the mother Bank in Pennsylvania. The two first are exclusively Republican States, and those parts of all the others (except Massachusetts) where those banks are seated, are represented on this floor by Republicans; whence then are found the facts to prove this assertion—or do gentlemen pursue a recent example, set by a certain great man, of giving opinions, when, with the same breath, it is acknowledged there exist no facts on which they are founded.

R. OF R.

The foreign capital employed in this bank is a ground of great alarm to some gentlemen. In answer to this objection, I would ask, if it ever has been, or if it is now the interest or the policy of the States or the United States to exclude foreign capital from being received and employed in your country? Do you find any provision in the charters of the State banks, prohibiting foreigners from becoming stockholders? Is there any provision in those bills from the Senate, establishing half a dozen banks in the District of Columbia, prohibiting foreigners from becoming stockholders? To all these questions you are compelled to answer in the negative. So long as the profits of agricultural pursuits or commercial enterprise furnish the adventurer with a good profit over and above the price he has to pay for the use of the capital employed, just that long will he continue to employ it; and, if the capital is not to be found at home, application will be made for it abroad; and whenever capital becomes redundant at home, you will then exclude foreign capital. Before that time the attempt would be unavailing; for capital, like air or water, will seek its level. I have thought that foreign capital in this country would have had rather a salutary tendency, inasmuch as it would interest men of influence in the preservation of the peace and perpetuity of the Government. Mr. Jefferson must have been thus impressed; or how could he have permitted a sale of the bank stock of the United States directly to Englishmen—and he was certainly not chargeable with a predilection in favor of British influence. There is in England a class of men favorable to the prosperity of this country; and I have always understood that it is these alone who have interest in our funds. Besides, if this foreign capital is fraught with all those evils which gentlemen picture to themselves, the argument holds good against State banks, and goes to prove the necessity of their destruction also.

The gentleman from Maryland (Mr. WRIGHT) has made some heavy charges against the directors of the United States' Bank and their management. I had thought it universally understood and admitted, that the management of this great moneyed institution had been exemplarily correct, and I have not before heard anything of the kind laid to their charge. But, even admitting the charge to be true, it only proves, what may I believe be alleged and proved against every human institution administered by man, viz: that the institution, as well as the administration thereof, is imperfect. But I ask if the directors of three-fourths of the State banks in the United States are not Federalists; and therefore why not put them down in mass?

I beg leave to notice an argument which has been resorted to by all the opposers of the bill, when they have been told that the bank was both necessary and proper to the convenient and advantageous management of the public revenues. The answer has uniformly been, that this difficulty could easily be obviated by the agency of State banks. This, sir, is certainly begging the question; because an admission that bank agency is necessary to the collection of your revenue, and proper to be used in the management of the moneyed concerns of the Government, is an admission of the only fact necessary to be in proof to show conclusively the power of Congress to pass the bill in question. Besides, do not all the unhappy consequences, which, it is said, await this bank, attend the depositing your money in State banks? Will you not thereby give a circulation to the paper of the bank where you make your deposits greater than heretofore? and, by increasing the circulation of their paper as well as by aiding them with your money to make more extensive discounts, you increase the profit and value of the stock. This circumstance will create an anxiety with all the State banks to obtain your deposits, and hence the United States, if they are so disposed, can operate through those favorite banks as effectually on the people of the States as they could by the United States' Bank. You have all the evils of the United States' Bank without any of the advantages; you also throw into circulation a heterogeneous mass of paper, that nobody knows anything about, issued by establishments of whose solvency you know nothing. Will the gentleman from North Carolina or the member from Massachusetts willingly receive their per diem in their own State paper? I believe they would not—yet the effect of using State banks for revenue purposes will be to impose this paper on the people of the United States.

It is a rule, sir, which I have prescribed to myself, in the management of the concerns of others which may be committed to my care, in any character, to conduct them in such a manner as to produce no individual distress or loss, which may not be fully compensated by an equivalent certain public good; and I shall not relinquish the observance of this rule on this occasion. We are informed by various gentlemen, who are charged with the representation of the more commercial States, that great individual distress will be the certain consequence of a refusal to renew the charter of the United States' Bank; and that the distress will fall with accumulated weight on those who have poverty and the frowns of fortune to struggle with, is evident; and when I commiserate the woes felt by the citizens of every part of our country, my attention, as it ought, is particularly drawn to the losses and distress which will be felt by my immediate constituents.

JANUARY, 1811.

Bank of the United States.

H. OF R.

If this charter is not renewed, it is my deliberate opinion that the farmers of Kentucky will sustain a loss thereby to the amount of near $200,000; and I will now attempt to show that this opinion is not altogether chimerical. I am unable to state with any great certainty what is the amount of circulating medium of the United States; nor indeed is it necessary for me to state with great accuracy the precise amount. I suppose the whole circulating medium of the United States to be upwards of $50,000,000, and that of this sum the Bank of the United States circulates one-third. It is a fact frequently stated in this House, and which stands undenied, that money or circulating medium is scarcer in the United States at this time than it has been for several years past, owing perhaps to the unproductiveness of commercial enterprise, or, if you please, to the natural increase of population, and the proportionate increase of demand for money. By refusing to renew the charter you throw out of circulation one-third of the money of the country. The necessary and inevitable consequences of this act of the Government will be to diminish commercial enterprise in the same proportion, and consequently ship-building and ship-repairing will be diminished in a like proportion, and the materials for this service will not be wanting. By letters recently received from very intelligent merchants of Lexington, Kentucky, I am informed that 6,000 tons of hemp will have been raised in that State in the present year. The ship-owners are the consumers of this article, for not a pound of it goes abroad, and from six to nine thousand tons of hemp is the quantity consumed in prosperous times in the United States. These 6,000 tons of hemp, together with what will be brought to the market from other States, will furnish an abundant supply for the present year, even admitting it to be a prosperous year. By the refusal to renew the charter you lessen the demand one-third at least, and consequently you diminish the price of the article in the same proportion. But, sir, this is viewing the consequences arising out of the rejection of this act in the most favorable light. If the refusal to renew this charter should, as some gentlemen apprehend it will, bankrupt not only many individuals, but also some of the State banks, a general alarm may take place, which would for a time put an end to all credit and to all business. The consequences of such a state of things are much to be feared and much to be dreaded by every portion of the community.

It has been stated that the United States' Bank can be dispensed with in the collection of your revenue, and in the management of your moneyed concerns. I wish to know how gentlemen can make this statement. I perceive that General Hamilton, the first Secretary of the Treasury, appointed since the adoption of the Constitution, in his argument on the subject, decidedly declares that the bank is necessary for the collection of the taxes and management of the fiscal concerns of the United States; and Mr. Gallatin, the present Secretary of the Treasury, makes substantially the same declaration to you in his report on this subject.

[Mr. WRIGHT observed, that Mr. Gallatin had, in conversation, said that the moneyed concerns of the Government could be well managed without this bank.]

If Mr. Gallatin has so said, he then says one thing, and reports a different thing, and is therefore inconsistent. But I take his official report as the best evidence of his opinion; and these men having been charged with the management of the revenue for many years, and having the knowledge acquired by experience, certainly should know what is necessary and proper for the convenient and well management of the affairs of their department; and are therefore better authorities on the subject than any member of this House.

As to the remark made by some gentlemen, that this is a party question, I have only to observe that, if Federalists do right, that can be no sufficient reason for me to do wrong, merely to oppose them; and if the suggestion that this is a party question is to prevail against reason and common sense, and parties are thereby to be marshalled against each other under the banners of some leader, then, indeed, anything that can say ay, or no, is perfectly qualified to be a member of this House, and intelligence is laid aside as useless and unnecessary. Against doctrine of this sort I protest. And perceiving, as I think I do, great political as well as individual inconvenience and distress awaiting a refusal to renew this charter, which is not compensated by any correspondent public good; and perceiving, also, in the destruction of this institution, a want of stability in your institutions which is a partial verification of the predictions of the enemies of republican government, which we ought to refute by our acts—I shall, therefore, vote against the indefinite postponement of this bill, reserving, however, to myself the right of subsequently examining the details thereof.

MR. BARRY.—Mr. Speaker: The measure now under consideration is certainly important. It involves principles interesting both as they relate to the General and State Governments. The solicitude manifested for the renewal of the charter; the deep concern that is felt in some of the States; the serious and solemn manner in which this subject has been considered and acted upon by their legislative councils; the general agitation it has occasioned in the public mind, has not failed to command my most serious attention. I should, nevertheless, have been content to have left it to the discussion of others abler and more experienced than myself, satisfied with giving such a vote as would comport with the honest conviction of my understanding. But the debate has taken an unexpected course to day. The remarks of my colleague (Mr. McKee) will not permit me longer to remain silent. As it is my lot to differ with him on this great question, I must claim the indulgence of the House for a few moments, while I endeavor, in as concise a manner as possible, to state some of the reasons by which I am actuated.

The baneful effects to result from the dissolution of the bank, the ruin that is to follow in its train, have been portrayed in the most glowing colors, in a manner calculated, as it was no doubt designed, to awaken and alarm our fears. I shall not now enter upon this branch of the subject.

If, as I am most seriously impressed, the Constitution does not authorize us to pass the bill, there is at once an end of the question. It is, Mr. Speaker, immaterial what consequences may result. No pressure of calamity, however great, can warrant a departure from, or violation of, that sacred instrument.

It has been said that this is a party question. The remark is just, so far as the principles which separate and distinguish the two great political parties in the United States shall be made to bear upon it; not that the declaration of any man can make it so. It is measures, not men, that should govern.

It will be recollected that early in the history of our Government the country was divided into two great political parties, the one endeavoring to extend and increase the powers of the General Government, the other attached to the State authorities, and exceedingly jealous of their rights. Under this state of things the Constitution of the United States was framed. Soon after the Government went into operation under it, these parties again displayed themselves in the rules they adopted for expounding the Constitution, the one contending for that kind of interpretation which would possess Congress with the most ample powers, sufficient to do whatever political expedience might dictate in providing for the common defence and general welfare.

This latitude of construction was considered by the other party as dangerous; that it would tend to consolidation; that in this way State rights would be encroached upon and their sovereignty impaired. They contended that the power of Congress was limited; that it must be confined to those powers expressly delegated, and to such as were necessary and proper to carry them into execution. That this mode of construction resulted necessarily from the nature of the General Government, but was settled beyond all doubt by that clause in the Constitution which provides, "that all powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States or to the people;" that to step beyond the boundaries thus fixed, would be to enter upon a field of power no longer capable of being defined. Such has been my understanding of the views of the two parties; the one called Federal, the other Republican, or Democratic if you please. I speak of parties as they were at the period I allude to.

It is remarkable, that, upon this very subject, in the year 1791, when the bank charter was granted, we find the most distinguished politicians of that day, who were on the Republican side, opposing it; and they did it under the guidance of those sentiments that had originally given rise and character to the party. For although they did not admit the utility of the banking system, yet the great ground of opposition—the strength of their argument—was directed against the power of Congress to pass such a law. It was, sir, upon that occasion that Mr. Madison, then a member of Congress, made that perspicuous and luminous argument that has been so justly celebrated as defining and marking out the proper limits of power assigned to the General Government. I have thought proper to make these preliminary remarks to show what was the understanding of this measure at the time of its adoption. That it was then protested against as unconstitutional. Two articles of the Constitution seem to be mostly relied upon by those who are in favor of the renewal: That which gives to Congress the power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises; to pay the debts and provide for the common defence and general welfare of the United States; or, in other words, the power by which Congress is to regulate the financial concerns of the nation, and that which gives the power to make all laws necessary and proper for carrying into execution the powers vested by the Constitution in the Government of the United States.

It has already been shown by gentlemen who have preceded me, by a course of reasoning to my mind unanswerable, that the clause which enables Congress to pass all laws necessary and proper to execute the specified powers, must, according to the natural force of the terms and context, be limited to the means necessary to the end, or incident to the nature of the specified powers; that this clause was in fact merely declaratory of what would have resulted by unavoidable implication as the appropriate and as it were technical means of executing these powers. It was further contended, that the true exposition of a necessary mean was, that mean without which the end could not be produced. If this doctrine is correct, it puts the question at rest—as it has been most clearly shown that a bank is not a necessary mean according to this exposition. I shall not dwell longer on this head, considering it as already exhausted by argument. The word "proper" is, in my mind, an important and operative word in this clause of the Constitution. The incidental power to be exercised must not only be necessary, but proper; that is, it must be appropriate, and confined to the end in view. If it goes beyond it; if it involves the exercise of a power that tends to create a distinct and substantive thing, which, in its important operations, is entirely distinct from, and independent of the power to the execution of which it was designed as a mean, it would most certainly be improper. Such an exercise of power would, in truth, be usurpation, and the end proposed becomes a mere pretence for the unwarrantable assumption of power.

To enable Congress to collect taxes, offices of deposit merely would be sufficient. But instead of confining the incidental power to be employed to the object it is designed to accomplish, you introduce a new system of policy, that has no more connexion with the management of the revenue than it has with the power to borrow money on the credit of the United States, with the power to regulate commerce with foreign nations among the States, and with the Indian tribes, or than it has with the power to raise and support armies, or provide and maintain a navy. The power to establish a bank applies equally as an incident to all the above-named powers, and is not strictly appropriate to either, nor is it confined to all of them collectively. If, under such pretence, you can erect corporations, your power in this respect is unbounded.

By this act you form a society of individuals, invest them with extensive and exclusive privileges, who, instead of being employed as auxiliaries in the fiscal arrangements of the Government, set up for themselves and go on upon a system of money making. They issue notes that become a circulating medium and forms a new species of capital. The institution carries with it a train of officers, influence, and patronage. It gives rise to an act of sovereign power, that no Government should ever be permitted or can derive by just implication—that of punishing those who may counterfeit the notes of this bank. Thus introducing into our code of laws a system of criminal jurisprudence never contemplated by the Constitution.

It will be seen, as we progress in this inquiry, how this measure is calculated to affect the State rights and to infringe upon their sovereignty.

If it is good policy to establish banks, and I am inclined to think it tends, when properly regulated, to promote the interest of society, the States will surely have a right to claim the benefits that may result from it—because this right they never have parted from. The profits arising from discounts, the advantage to accrue from public and private deposits, and the many facilities this kind of institution affords to society, belong to the States, and ought to be exclusively under their control. The objects of State policy are infinitely more numerous than those of the General Government, and deserve equally to be promoted.

It is said that the States are at liberty, if they choose, to establish banks; this does not remove the objection; if the right is impaired, it is the same in principle as if it were denied. A branch bank of the United States will always have a predominant influence. They will have the benefit of a large capital; but the great source of influence results from its connexions with the mother bank, and a confederacy of branches co-extensive with the United States. They all move in concert; and, by combining their influence, would at any time be enabled to overwhelm and destroy the small State establishments. There can be no stronger evidence of the weakness and the dependence of the State banks upon that of the United States, than the alarm that some of them now feel at its expected dissolution. It is said that no danger of this sort is to be apprehended; that those who have had the direction of the United States' Bank, have conducted it properly, and with liberality. This affords no guarantee that they will continue to do so. Bank directors have the same passions and prejudices that other men have; the same feelings of jealousy and rivalry exist in corporate bodies as with individuals; the same struggle for power and disposition to oppress. State rights require the guardianship of the Constitution; they are not, I trust, to be left to the mercy of a bank directory.

It would, sir, be less objectionable, if the Bank of the United States diffused its benefits equally throughout the different States. But instead of this equal and just distribution, it will be found to be confined and partial in its operations; its benefits will be principally confined to the seaports; it can only be made to operate indirectly upon the agriculturist and manufacturer. The direction of this institution will be entirely in the hands of commercial men; all its power and influence will be lent to them. This, combined with the power their wealth naturally gives them, has heretofore, and will continue to give them a decided ascendancy in the Councils of this nation. It is believed that this kind of influence has had its effects in producing our existing embarrassments with foreign nations. Sir, the slightest attention to our public acts will show that there has been a great predilection for commerce; that it has met with almost exclusive protection and support; whilst little or nothing has been done for the internal industry of the country—large sums of money have been expended for the promotion of commerce, whilst our infant manufactures have been suffered to pine and languish. The enterprise embarked in this way, never having experienced any kind of encouragement from the General Government. It is time to remove the causes that gave rise to this partial influence.

The power of the States is affected by this measure in another important respect. By its means, individuals, who are mostly foreigners, hold large estates in stock, without being in any way subject to the control of the State government, or paying any tax for its support. Is it just that such exclusive privileges should be conferred? Is it proper that these men, not the most meritorious, should be entirely exempt from the burden of taxation, whilst the true citizen is bound to yield his personal and pecuniary aid?

Another formidable objection that presents itself, is the connexion of this institution with the Government—a dangerous source of influence and power. When the people have to pay taxes for the support of Government, they feel and understand what is going on. If they should be burdened with high taxes, unless a good reason can be assigned for it, they will remove their agents and appoint others who will act upon a better system of economy. But give to the Government a bank with a large capital, and you afford a facility of borrowing, and a source of supplies utterly incompatible with the genius of Republican institutions. Loans may be had to enable the Government to pursue their projects; expensive establishments may be created and kept up in this way, that the people never would have tolerated, had they been directly called on for their contributions. The ease it would afford of getting money would be the cause of repeated applications to this source; and we may readily perceive how a debt thus created will be constantly accumulating. Upon this subject we have the light of experience to guide us. The English nation presents a sad example. It is true the proposed capital is too small to create much clamor at present—but renew this charter, and it will be augmented as convenience shall dictate. The capital of the Bank of England was small at its first establishment, but it increased gradually as the exigence of the Government required.

Sir, whenever the Government shall have become largely indebted to this bank, it will have acquired an influence over our councils, the idea of which is humiliating; an influence that would not only be degrading, but one that would endanger our liberties, by subjecting us to the control of a moneyed aristocracy. Permit me now, sir, to notice a few of the arguments that have been advanced in favor of renewal. It is said that the practice of this Government is against the rule of construction we contend for: as an example, the act concerning light-houses, beacons, buoys, and public piers, has been cited. This is referred to the power of regulating trade. This act is in truth only a mean to carry into execution a power; it is distinguishable at the first glance from the power to establish a bank. They only tend to promote commerce; they are strictly necessary and properly confined to the object. They go no further than the end in view, not at all impairing the rights of individuals or of the States; besides, there is nothing in them uncongenial with the nature of our Government.

It is further contended that the law now at tempted to be renewed has been sanctioned by the States, and acquiesced in by the people. That, although it might not originally have been necessary, it has now become so. I can see strong reasons why this act granting a charter should not be repealed, although unconstitutional. The system had been introduced; a pledge was given to the stockholders; they invested their funds upon the faith of its continuance for twenty years; it was a contract for that period; to have violated the public faith would not perhaps have been consistent with sound policy. There is a difference between repealing the law and suffering it to expire. The stockholders have not even the color of a claim upon us for the continuance of the charter after the expiration of twenty years. The contract has been fulfilled and completed. They are or should have been ready to close their business. Sir, if this doctrine of acquiescence is correct, many other obnoxious laws, that have been the cause of much heat and ferment throughout the nation, might in the same way be proven to be Constitutional, and might hereafter be received for the same reason. It is one of the first principles of a representative government, that a subsequent legislature have the power to change the measures of a preceding one; and it often is necessary they should do so. No State has ever sanctioned this law by a direct declaration to that effect. Their approbation has been inferred from their having passed laws to punish counterfeiters. Sir, the States cannot repeal an act of Congress; they could not prevent the circulation of the notes of this bank. It was therefore essential to pass such laws in order to secure and protect their own citizens from fraud and imposition.

It seems clear to me that an act of Congress not originally Constitutional cannot be made so by any lapse of time. If in 1791 it was unconstitutional, it must be so now. The Constitution does not change with the times. A Republican Administration should not be permitted to exercise a power that they would have denied to the other party. The love of power is natural; man is prone to abuse it. I confide much in those who are at present at the helm, but I will not trust them beyond the limits of the Constitution. "With unremitting vigilance, with undaunted virtue, should a free people watch against the encroachments of power, and remove every pretext for its extension."

The evils to result from the dissolution of the bank, have, in my opinion, been greatly exaggerated; but, sir, this alarm, if real, impresses my mind differently from what it does that of some others. The deep interest excited; the feelings that have been awakened; the memorials constantly flowing in upon us, show the important bearing of this institution and the great interest it has already created.

If we look forward to a period when this charter is to expire; if ever we intend to shake off this illegitimate offspring, now is the lucky moment; its embrace though strong is not deadly. Although some of its advocates threaten, and endeavor to coerce us into the measure by the alarm they have excited, the stockholders yet approach in the respectful attitude of memorialists; we are yet at liberty to act freely; but if this charter is renewed, depend upon it we shall not be able hereafter to stop its progress. Pretexts will not be wanting to extend its limits and augment its capital. The poison already tasted would soon reach the vitals of this Government; our efforts hereafter for relief will be fruitless; they will only serve to irritate and inflame, until at length it will be found that we must tamely submit.

MR. FINDLEY.—That Congress have a right to refuse the renewal of the charter of the bank, or to modify it as they think proper, is admitted on all sides. He himself wished the bill to be much changed from what it is at present. He would be even willing to join in rejecting it, for the sake of trying an experiment, if he was not convinced in his own mind that the experiment would cost too much. We know how far and how well the present bank has answered the intention and the end for which it was instituted. But, supposing another National Bank to be instituted, (which he knew was the wish of some members who were opposed to the present one,) very great distress, both public and private, must take place in the mean time, without a certainty of being better served in the end.

Whatever might be said on the ground of expediency against renewing the charter, he had been much astonished to observe the bill so much opposed as being contrary to the Constitution. When the law for incorporating the bank passed, it was opposed in the House of Representatives by a minority—about one-third of the members voted against it. Though he was not then a member, yet he attended to the discussion, and he knew that those who led the opposition were equally opposed to all State banks, of which there were then but three, in the United States, and none of these were instituted "to promote the regular, permanent, and successful operation of the finances of the State," as some of them at least have since expressly been. He was sure that the Bank of North America (the first that had been incorporated) was, perhaps, from the circumstances of the times, considered rather as injurious than beneficial to the State; therefore, that a bank should be useful in conducting the revenues of the United States, was at that time, in the opinion of many, at least doubtful, or a mere theory. But, no sooner was the experiment fully made, than all parties acquiesced in its constitutionality and usefulness. Its constitutionality has been recognised by all the branches of the General Government, through all the changes of parties and Administrations. This could be made evident by numerous instances.

It is true, an honorable member from New York (Mr. PONTRE) has denied this, and alleged that the reason why it was acquiesced in, or not repealed, was, because it was a contract which it was necessary on the part of the Government to fulfil.

Mr. F. said that a contract contrary to the Constitution was void in itself, especially where no consideration was given; that our courts of justice, who were judges, both under the law and the Constitution, would set such contracts aside—much more an act of incorporation for which no valuable consideration had been paid, as the consideration only consisted of the services that were to be rendered, and which, if contrary to the Constitution, ought not to be accepted. So far, however, have the courts of justice been from setting this law aside, that both Federal and State courts have, under the authority of both the Federal and State laws, made decisions for its protection. Or, if it had been contrary to the Constitution, Congress ought to have repealed the law by which it was granted. There was a precedent to that purpose in this country. The Bank of North America was incorporated by Congress at a period of alarming pecuniary distress; but knowing that it had no authority to give it effect, Congress recommended the incorporation of it to the several States. Pennsylvania and Delaware only complied with the requisition—the charter gave an exclusive monopoly in perpetuity. Another company, in 1784, applied for a charter. The Bank of North America opposed their claim with success, in right of their charter. The succeeding Legislature considered the exclusive right and the perpetuity to have been granted in violation of the Constitution, and therefore repealed that charter, and afterwards granted a limited charter to the company. Political parties have changed since the United States' Bank was incorporated—those that now prevail have been the majority about half the time—yet, so far have they been from repealing the charter, that they have extended its powers and availed themselves of its accommodations. It was a mistake to consider the authority to incorporate the bank to be a separate and distinct power, and therefore not granted to Congress. It was not even, as some members have called it, a constructive power, or power by implication. It was inseparably included in the powers expressly granted, as the means to accomplish the end; for it is in all cases admitted, that where an object or duty is enjoined, the means of accomplishing the object or of performing the duty are included. This is too plain to require proof or illustration.

The powers vested in Congress, or the duties enjoined, are, to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, &c.; to pay the debts of the United States, &c.; and the object prescribed is the public good and general welfare of the United States. They have also the power to provide for raising and supporting an Army and Navy, and for borrowing money on the credit of the United States.

Surely no member will say that the safe-keeping—the most cheap and certain manner of collecting the revenues, and the most expeditious and the least expensive manner of transmitting them to the destined places, and paying them to their appropriate uses—are not included in the before-mentioned powers. If they are not, the powers themselves are a nullity, because they cannot be executed. Custom-house bonds are by law lodged in the banks for collection.

It is admitted that these powers included a choice of means, and a discretion in the application of them, as they did in the various objects of taxation. Congress might have instituted numerous offices of deposit, and paid high salaries, and required sureties equivalent to the risk; and they might have employed public officers sufficiently protected to transmit the money to the various places where it was required, and to pay it to the appropriate uses. To this method no doubt nations had resorted before banks were introduced; but surely this method would be more unsafe, more uncertain, much more expensive, and attended with much more delay, than the agency of a bank, whose capital gave sufficient security, and whose paper is in great circulation and credit. Therefore, whatever might have been the different opinions before the experiment was made, yet, having been successfully made, it is evident that it was the best means to accomplish the end.

The honorable gentleman from New York, however, has admitted that banks are necessary and proper for collecting, transmitting, and safe-keeping of the revenue, but alleges that the State banks are sufficient for that purpose. This, Mr. F. said, as he understood it, was giving up, in a great measure, the point. If the use of banks is necessary to carry the revenue powers into effect when this charter was given, and when there were no banks south of Philadelphia, and it is believed but two east of it—there not being State banks sufficient at the period when the charter in question was granted, in any degree adequate to the purpose—the Bank of the United States was a necessary means or instrument for executing the revenue powers vested in Congress, and therefore not contrary to the Constitution. If at that time it was not, then it may be asked when it became so?

The State banks are not by their charters in any degree responsible to Congress; they are not obliged to inform it of the amount of their capital, or their debt, or paper issued, or of their deposits. Surely no member would agree to deposit the revenues of the United States with, or transmit them through, institutions of the solidity of whose credit they were not well informed. He did not mean, however, to say that it was not possible to select such a number of State banks as would be sufficiently safe for deposits, or that such a connexion of these banks might not be formed as would make them responsible for the safe and speedy transmission of the revenue, and give the necessary information to Congress of the state of their affairs. Yet, supposing this was all completed, this union of banks would be in so far a National Bank, subject to the same objections, and to the following defects: The notes of all these banks would not pass through the whole United States, and the continuance of the charter would be at their discretion, and on the terms prescribed by the respective States. Indeed, it would occasion such a competition between the different States and the United States, in conducting their respective revenues, as might be inconvenient.

He did not mean to depreciate the State banks; many of them are worthy of the highest confidence, as far as their power and operations extend; but surely it will not be said that all of them are so. The paper of some of them is well known to have depreciated; the paper of many others is current, but to a small distance; they will not carry many of the members of this House from their homes to this place; the paper of none of them will pass throughout the United States.

Mr. F. said, there had been an unusual liberty taken on this question of introducing party epithets. He did not really know what that had to do with the question. The parties connected with all banks are the men that have money to vest in them for their own profit and at their own risk, and those who have credit, on which they receive accommodations from the bank; and there is a third party, who have neither money nor credit, and who have no interest in banks further than the accommodations received from them sometimes enable their employers to pay their wages the more promptly. You may call these parties Federalists, Republicans, Aristocrats, or what you please, but those who have the most money and are the greatest stockholders will eventually have the direction of the banks, and those who have the greatest credit will obtain the largest accommodations. We know of some banks instituted by one political party, which has come under the direction of another; they purchase the stock in market. We find indeed great opposition to the renewal of the charter of this bank, but not a single charge of misconduct, except the alleged appointment of two improper directors in a distant branch. Surely the bill might be so amended as to give reasonable security against such appointments. He was but little acquainted with the branches, but he had heard no complaint against the direction of the mother bank, and was well assured that the Republicans of Philadelphia had as liberal accommodations, and that as much of much of their paper was discounted there as in any other bank, which, if the charter is not renewed, they must then redeem.

Congress is vested with the power of receiving money on loans, and consequently of providing the best method of procuring loans; and it is universally admitted that banks are the best sources from which to receive loans, without delay, without difficulty, and at moderate interest, and for no longer time than the loan is necessary. In the early stages of our Government our revenue was small, and our debts and expenses great. In addition to these we soon became involved in a tedious, very expensive Indian war. It continued five years. During this period numerous loans were made from the bank, till more than three-fifths of the whole capital was loaned to the Government at common interest, payable at discretion. Another crisis of difficulty and expense arrived, viz: hostilities with France. Money was wanted; the bank could advance no more, it had already loaned too much. The Government was obliged to open books for a loan at eight per cent. interest, irredeemable for ten years; but few years had passed before money could have been borrowed at a reduced interest for its discharge; nay, but a few years had passed till it could have been discharged at the Treasury, if it had been redeemable; much of it, as well as bank and other stock, was sold to purchasers in Britain and Holland.

It is believed by many, that a loan might be made to a large amount now on better terms; but when he considered the great drain of specie from the country during the last year, the losses in Europe and the unusually small amount of specie imported, or that was in the vaults of the different banks, he thought there was little encouragement to try the experiment. Such loans must be of a money that would pass throughout the United States for all payments.

Mr. F. said, that having entered more largely on a former occasion into this question, he did not intend to detain the House now. He had, as much as he could, avoided repeating what he had formerly or what others on the same side of the question had expressed. He had, therefore, avoided mentioning the public and private distress that must result from the immediate dissolution of this bank. Even admitting that the specie stock purchased by foreigners, believed to amount to $7,000,000, should not be immediately removed from the country, yet it would be diverted from its accustomed uses; and, instead of giving relief as at present, might speculate upon our distresses. He believed, that suddenly calling $15,000,000 of current medium out of the usual circulation could not avoid in any country being the cause of at least a great proportion of both public and private distress. Therefore, he could not by his vote support the measure. It will have other inconveniences, which have not been mentioned. When the bank winds up its business and makes a transfer to trustees, it is not by charter obliged to call in its notes from a circulation that is widely extended throughout the United States. The holders indeed will have their remedy at law against the trust, but this may be a tedious and inconvenient remedy for many note holders.

JANUARY, 1811.

Bank of the United States.

H. OF R.

It has been asserted by more than one member, that the institution of the bank was the foundation or source of the party spirit that has unhappily prevailed in this country. He wished, before he sat down, to correct this mistake, passing what prevailed before the Government took place. It was the funding system, in the manner it was conducted and the extent to which it was carried, and the consequent speculations, that was the source of that unhappy party spirit; but especially the assumptions of the State debts before they were liquidated or the amount known, and which, after having been once rejected, was carried by a very small majority; as a fund for this debt, the excise and other unpopular internal taxes became necessary. It is well known that about $3,500,000 of this assumption is yet due to the United States from the States that were paid that much more than enough, and which no method has been, nor probably can be found, to recover. Unfortunately, almost every session some measures are so conducted as to keep alive, if not promote, that ruinous party spirit by which our national character is degraded, and our measures embarrassed. He questioned much, if rejecting the bill without attempting to amend it, is calculated to allay that unhappy party spirit.

When Mr. F. had concluded, a motion was made to adjourn, and carried, 54 to 51.

TUESDAY, January 22.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed two bills, entitled as follows: "An act concerning the communication by water along the Northern confines of the United States, and for other purposes;" and "An act to incorporate the Union Bank of Georgetown;" to which bills they desire the concurrence of this House.

Mr. SMILIE presented to the House a resolution of the Legislature of the State of Pennsylvania, instructing their Senators and requesting their Representatives in the Congress of the United States, "to use every exertion in their power to prevent the charter of the Bank of the United States from being renewed, or any other bank from being chartered by Congress, designed to have operation within the jurisdiction of any State, without first having obtained the consent of the Legislature of such State;" which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

11th Con. 3d Sess.—23

The resolution is as follows:

The people of the United States, by the adoption of the Federal Constitution, established a General Government for special purposes, reserving to themselves; respectively, the rights and authorities not delegated in that instrument. To the compact thereby created, each State acceded, in its character as a State, and is a party; the United States forming, as to it, the other party. The act of union, thus entered into, being, to all intents and purposes, a treaty between sovereign States. The General Government, by this treaty, was not constituted the exclusive or final judge of the powers it was to exercise; for if it were so to judge, then its judgment, and not the Constitution, would be the measure of its authority.

Should the General Government, in any of its departments, violate the provisions of the Constitution, it rests with the States and with the people, to apply suitable remedies.

With these impressions, the Legislature of Pennsylvania, ever solicitous to secure an administration of the Federal and State Governments, conformably to the true spirit of their respective constitutions, feel it their duty to express their sentiments upon an important subject now before Congress, viz: the continuance or establishment of a bank. From a careful review of the powers vested in the General Government, they have the most positive conviction, that the authority to grant charters of incorporation, within the jurisdiction of any State, without the consent thereof, is not recognised in that instrument, either expressly, or by any warrantable implication: Therefore,

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, in General Assembly met, That the Senators of this State, in the Senate of the United States, be, and they are hereby, instructed, and the Representatives of this State, in the House of Representatives of the United States, be, and they hereby are, requested to use every exertion in their power to prevent the charter of the Bank of the United States from being renewed, or any other bank from being chartered by Congress, designed to have operation within the jurisdiction of any State, without first having obtained the consent of the Legislature of such State.

Resolved, That the Governor be, and he hereby is, requested to forward a copy of the above preamble and resolution to each of the Senators and Representatives of this State in the Congress of the United States.

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES.

The House resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee of the Whole on the bill for the renewal of the charter of the Bank of the United States; the motion for indefinite postponement yet under consideration.

Mr. McKIM.—Mr. Speaker, the subject now under discussion involves an important Constitutional principle, which presents to my mind an insuperable objection to the passage of the bill. It is not, however, my intention to enter on a discussion of the Constitutional principle which has a bearing on the bill. That part of the subject has been ably and critically discussed by my honorable friend from New York, (Mr. PORTER,) and by other gentlemen, who have spoken on the same side of the question. On this part of the subject, sir, I will only observe, that a former Congress having decided the Constitutional question for themselves, by passing the law to incorporate the bank; the tribunals of the nation having sanctioned it, as it respected themselves; or the several States having, without rebellion, but not without murmuring and complaint, acquiesced in such decision, cannot quiet my conscience, nor satisfy my mind on the subject. The question now recurs; I have to act on it, and I must decide it for myself.

I will now endeavor, sir, to submit to the House a few desultory observations, which have for their object to explain some of the practical operations of the banking business; to show the probable effect of the dissolution of the bank charter, and to answer some objections which have been raised against its being suffered to expire.

It has been urged, as a motive for the renewal of the charter, that the concerns of the bank have been conducted with impartiality to persons of different political opinions. In answer to this, I beg leave to read part of a speech, said to be delivered on the floor of this House, and reported in one of our public papers; and also a letter from a gentleman in Baltimore, to whom the speech alluded: "It had been asserted, (says his speech,) during the last winter, that the branch bank in Baltimore had accommodated only one particular class of political gentlemen. He (Mr. STANLEY) had it from good authority, that a distinguished Republican house in Baltimore, of which a member of the Senate was partner, had obtained a greater portion of discounts than any other merchants in that place."

The letter to which I alluded, is in the following words:

"DEAR SIR: Will you have the justice to state to the House of Representatives, as early as you have an opportunity, and in direct contradiction of the unfounded assertion contained in the enclosed, that the Republican house in Baltimore, of which a member of the Senate is a partner, has received but two discounts from the branch Bank of Baltimore, to wit: one of nineteen hundred and sixteen dollars and fifty-five cents, and one of eighteen hundred dollars; the first on the 14th of April, and the second on the 14th of May, 1798; although the transactions of the house with that bank amount to nine hundred and thirty-six thousand three hundred and twenty-two dollars and fifty cents."

[Here Mr. STANLEY explained. Perhaps it had not been his good fortune to be understood in the remarks which he presumed were alluded to by Mr. M.'s correspondent. It was his meaning, if not his words, that, although partiality had been charged in the distribution of the favors of the branch bank of Baltimore, he had been informed from good authority, that of its discounts, more than one-half had been obtained by gentlemen of politics opposite to those of the bank; and that, in the purchase of bills of exchange, this bank had purchased a larger amount from the house alluded to, (Smith and Buchanan,) than from any other house in Baltimore.]

I am satisfied, said Mr. M., with the explanation. I have not introduced the speech and letter, so much to support my argument as to do justice to my friend; nor can I vouch for the correctness of the report.

It has been stated that nineteen or twenty millions of dollars are due to this bank, whose charter is now about to expire; that, if the charter is not renewed, it will produce great distress, and general bankruptcy will ensue; that the bank, in winding up its concerns, can receive nothing but specie, which will exhaust the resources of the other banks and individuals, and thereby produce a result the most disastrous to the mercantile interests of the nation. This statement is incorrect. By the returns from the Treasury, it appears that no more than $1,318,024 was due to the bank; and that the bank is indebted to the public and to individuals, in the sum of $11,542,320; and all the offsets it had against the heavy debt, are the above sum, due from different State banks, of $1,318,024.

Mr. M. illustrated this position by the following detailed statement of the account, which he read in his place:

The bank owes to Government for deposits	$2,493,362
It owes to individuals for deposits	3,891,680
It owes for its notes in circulation	5,157,378
Total amount of its debts	$11,542,320
Deduct from the amount of debts due by the bank, its only offset	1,318,024
Leaving a net balance of debts due from the bank, of	$10,140,296

This, sir, is the present situation of the expiring bank, by its own showing.

Gentlemen have involved this subject in obscurity, by supposing the fifteen millions of dollars, held by the bank in discounted notes, as a debt due to the bank. Sir, there is not one cent of these notes due, except a small sum that is in suit. If these notes were really due, it would materially change the state of the account. It would then possess the means of spreading terror, if it was disposed unnecessarily so to do; but we must take the account as it is; and if we would know how it stands at any particular time, we must judge of it as we do of a race, by viewing both sides at the same point of time. Judging in this way, we find that this bank now owes a net balance of upwards of ten millions of dollars.

Now, sir, I would ask, can any gentleman believe that it will be in the power of a bank, thus heavily indebted, far beyond the extent of its present means, to spread such terror, and produce such distress, as has been stated, when it is deprived of the public and private deposits, of which it will be deprived, when it is known that the charter will not be renewed? It is true, that, while these funds—the debt it owes—and a continuance of the public deposits, are suffered to remain in its possession, it may do much to create distress; while these funds are in its hands, it can employ the whole pecuniary resources of the nation to coerce other banks and individuals into its measures, if it were so disposed.

I wish it to be clearly understood, that I do not mean to say, or to insinuate, that this bank had unnecessarily used coercion, to create distress, or to obtain the object of its wish—a renewal of its charter. But while these funds remain in its hands, they produce this effect. They render it a measure of prudence and necessary precaution in other banks not to issue their paper, to aid the customers of this bank, or others indebted to it, to retire their notes; and this operates powerfully on my mind as a reason for urging a speedy decision of the question. I am of opinion, if this question is settled, let it be determined as it may, that all the difficulty and distress resulting from the probable dissolution of the charter will soon be dissipated, and things then resume their usual course. If the charter is not renewed, the expiring bank will lose its power of holding other banks in check, by the withdrawing of public and private deposits; which, being placed in other banks, will increase their means of giving aid to those who have paper to retire from the expiring bank. This bank having now no other than its own natural means, will no longer be an object of dread to other similar institutions; they may now freely lend their aid to relieve the distressed, and their increased means will be adequate to the object.

It has been suggested that the capital of this bank, owned in Europe, will be remitted in specie, if the charter is suffered to expire; and that such a drain of specie would be severely felt by the banks, at this distressing time in our commercial concerns. There is no necessity for remitting this capital in specie; and I do not believe one dollar would be so remitted, because it will not be the interest of the proprietors that it should. Exchange is low; I believe bills might be purchased at  $7\frac{1}{2}$  a 10 per cent. below par; and if remitted in specie, the freight and insurance could not be less than five per cent. A remittance in specie would then be  $12\frac{1}{2}$  a 15 per cent. less favorable than to remit in bills. Men are usually governed by their interest in transactions of this kind; and I do believe that the managers of this stock, if it is to be remitted to Europe, would remit it as other gentlemen do, in bills. But if it must be remitted in specie, it is probable there is some unknown cause, operating on remittances generally, that gives an advantage to remittances in specie; and if this be the case, the whole amount of our imports from Europe will probably be thus remitted. The amount of our imports from Europe, annually, is probably not less than eighty millions of dollars; and if specie must be shipped off to pay for these imports, it will not add much to our distress to let the bank capital go with it; but I am of opinion that one dollar will not be shipped to pay this stock.

It has been stated by my honorable colleague, whom I do not now see in his place, (and I regret that I do not, that I might be corrected, if I misstated what he said,) that fourteen millions of dollars would be thrown out of circulation if the charter of this bank was suffered to expire; that the bank discounted fourteen millions of dollars; and, therefore, must have issued its notes to that amount in payment for the discounted paper. This is incorrect; one-half of the discounted paper, it might be fairly estimated, was of what is denominated accommodation notes; and for this portion of the discounted paper no money goes out of the bank after the first renewal; but, on the contrary, money is brought into bank in this part of the business to pay the interest, or discount, on these notes. I beg leave to explain to the House the nature of what is termed accommodation notes. They are notes for which no value has passed; they are given by the maker of the note to accommodate the receiver of it, on an understanding between them, that, when due, it will be taken up by the person who received it; and discounts on this kind of paper are in the nature of a permanent loan, so long as the person accommodated requires, or as it may be convenient for the bank to continue it, the note being renewed every sixty days, and the interest paid thereon. But the proposition is equally incorrect as it relates to the notes discounted; which were given on some actual transaction in business; notes are not issued by the bank to the amount of the real paper it discounts; money is constantly coming in for notes that fall due; and, in the course of trade, it frequently happens that the money paid in one week, on discounted notes, is the next week, by various windings and changes, again in bank, to discount nearly a like amount.

The real diminution of the circulating medium that will result from the dissolution of the charter will be five millions of dollars. The report from the Treasury, laid on our tables, states that the bank has five millions of dollars of its notes in circulation, and these, of course, will be paid off and destroyed when the bank ceases to act; and as it will then receive no more deposits, the means of other banks will be enlarged; whereby they may issue an increased amount of notes, perhaps nearly equal to the extent of the diminution that will result from the decease of the charter.

I will repeat, sir, what I before said. When the question of the charter is settled, the difficulties and distress that now exist will soon cease, and an accommodating disposition will then take place; the expiring bank will relinquish its pretensions to receive nothing but specie in payment; it will see the necessity of receiving payment in the paper of other banks that are in credit; it will receive payment in such bills as other banks and individuals receive freely. And why will it do this when it has a right to insist on specie? Because it will be urged to do so from interest and necessity. It has a large debt that will be shortly falling due from its customers, and how will they be able to pay if the bank shall draw all the specie into its vaults, and keep other banks in check, so that they can afford no aid to its customers to retire their notes when they fall due. The specie cannot be wanted by the expiring bank. Every object of winding up, remitting, and paying its capital, can be managed to equal advantage without it; and will this bank, without a motive, and in opposition to its own interest, endeavor to produce distress by thus unnecessarily drawing the specie into its vaults? Certainly it will not. But if it should act so unadvisedly, who is to be the greatest sufferer? Who has a greater interest than itself in facilitating the payment of debts? None have a greater stake at hazard than this bank, and I venture to say, that none will be more disposed to promote the general convenience and prosperity than it will be. I have no fears of this spectre of misery and distress that has been artfully conjured up to alarm us into a renewal of the charter.

My honorable colleague (Mr. KEY) has made an eloquent display of the benefits of banking establishments in our agricultural improvements, our manufactures and ship building; and that, if this bank was put down, the effects would be severely felt in the reduced price of produce, and in our improvements generally.

I accord most heartily with the honorable gentleman as to the benefit of banks to a reasonable extent. No one is more perfectly convinced of the benefits resulting from them than myself; but I deny that such injurious effects would be produced by suffering this charter to expire. Is there no other bank but this one, founded on foreign capital, and administered more or less under foreign influence, that can produce and perpetuate these benefits? Surely there are others as capable, and as much to be relied on as this. The capital of this bank forms but a small portion of the aggregate bank capital of the nation, and if its charter should expire, the benefits mentioned will not be lost. No specie will be destroyed, or sent out of the country by its dissolution. Specie is the basis of bank capital, and if we have specie to meet them, we can easily make bank notes enough without the aid of this bank. The bank notes that will be thrown out of circulation are all that will be lost by the dissolution of the charter; and if we have specie, we can soon supply their place. There is no scarcity of paper among us.

The charter of this bank was granted for a limited time; the privileges and immunities it granted were great. The interest it yielded on its capital, and its credit, are liberal; and the increased value the charter gave to its stock was great. This stock, originally only ten millions of dollars, soon became worth fourteen millions under the charter; the company have enjoyed these benefits in the fullest extent, without molestation; their chartered rights have not been infringed or violated; and the charter is now about to expire by its own limitation. And this valuable inheritance of benefits about to descend, with the death of the charter, to the people of the United States, it will become their joint property. About seventenths of the present stockholders are foreigners; and, shall we, the guardians of the rights and interests of the American people, perpetuate these benefits to foreigners, by a renewal of the charter to them, in preference to those whose interests we have been chosen to protect? Persons unconnected with the public business might, perhaps, wink at such an act; but if we, in our representative capacity, should do it, will it not be to record our infamy?

Under these impressions, Mr. Speaker, I am prepared to give my vote for an indefinite postponement of the bill. But, if the section stricken out in Committee of the Whole shall be reinstated, and the bill shall come to a final vote, I must record my name against its passage.

Mr. GOLD.—Mr. Speaker, although this question has long engrossed the consideration of the House, I must ask the indulgence of the House to the observations I may offer. I will not trespass on your patience.

The question of expediency, together with various extrinsic topics, I pass by unnoticed; on these let the judgment and not the feelings of the House, which have been so much addressed through ex parte statements and suggestions, determine.

On the great Constitutional question, involved by the bill on your table, it is the fruit of my best reflections—it is my deep conviction, that the agency of a bank is necessary to the administration of the finances of this country; that it is eminently necessary to the great exigencies of war. This is the test; on this pivot rests the question. In coming to the conclusion I have, sir, I disclaim the doctrine of implication of powers—of constructive powers—now rendered so odious and so unjustly imputed to those who maintain the constitutionality of this bank; I ask only the application of a plain simple rule, which is as old as first principles; as extended in its operation as the empire of law; to be found in all codes, applicable to all instruments, as well to conventions between States as to the contracts of individuals.

It is, that with the end is given, inseparably given, the means; that, with the express powers given to this Government, is also given the means necessary to carry the Government into successful operation—not merely to move the wheels, but to give an effectual impulse, necessary to the exigencies of the country. When gentlemen survey the extended Department of the Treasury, the wide theatre of the public expenditure, commensurate with the United States; the daily transmission of moneys (to satisfy the public demand) in every direction, to the furthest limits of the Union; to the frontiers; to your garrisons; to places with which there is no commerce, on which bills of exchange cannot be obtained; can they avoid seeing the Treasury involved in the utmost embarrassment by withdrawing the aid of a banking institution? Such embarrassment, to my mind, is inevitable.

But, sir, if doubts could exist as applicable to a state of peace in the great and trying emergencies of war, there is not, I did hope, room for diversity of opinion; the necessity of the institution, in my conception, is eminent, is indispensable. Money is the sinew of war; for want of it, to satisfy a needy, discontented army, the most important operations of a campaign have been arrested, and the most disastrous results produced. Our own country, sir, the patriotic army of the Revolution, and one more patriotic, I fear, we shall never see, furnished one if not more instances of discontent and actual mutiny, for want of pay, (for want of that which this institution could so promptly furnish,) which was not appeased without resort to military execution.

However pacific in its policy, let no nation promise itself continued exemption from war; history gives no assurances of this kind; no wise Government, in its policy and institutions, ever lost sight of a state of war. In case of internal dissensions, in public convulsions, the prompt aid of a bank may be equally necessary. It is the observation of a distinguished writer, who had well considered the events of the Revolution, that the independence of this country was, in no small degree, indebted to the Bank of North America.

But, it is said, that the best resort of Government is to the purse of individuals, that this source will be found abundant. It is, Mr. Speaker, on public emergencies, in times of public convulsion, under the severe pressure of war, when ready supplies of money become indispensable to Government, and it is at such a period that alarms spread, and distrust seizes on the community; it is then that the moneyed man withdraws himself, places his cash in a strong box, and, not unfrequently commits it to the earth, beyond the reach of Government. We have no power of drawing the Jew's teeth; no resource in a forced loan.

In the course of debate, on this bill, it is not a little amusing to observe the desperate efforts, the contradictions, and inconsistencies, which gentlemen, in their zeal, fall into. At one moment it is most strenuously insisted, that nothing short of an express provision, in the Constitution, to create corporations, can warrant the establishment of a bank; the next moment it is admitted, and strange, indeed, had it been denied, that, if a bank be a necessary mean for the execution of the delegated powers of the Government, then must it be Constitutional.

The most fruitful source of error, Mr. Speaker, is in the palpable misinterpretation of the term "necessary" in the Constitution; it has been reiterated again and again under this head of the argument, that a mean to be necessary, must be absolutely, indispensably so, without which the operations of the Government would be arrested. Now, sir, all this is contrary to the sense in which that adjective is used by the most approved writers, and in direct violation of the elementary principles of our language. If gentlemen will take the trouble, and I invite them to do it, to recur to the best writers and philologists, they will find the term used in a sense implying only what is needful, or requisite, and not what is extremely so, or indispensable; and why, sir, should it be extended beyond the above limits? Is it not an adjective of comparison—for the argument has carried us back to the schools? Is it not in every day's use, and correctly so, that one thing is "necessary," another more so, and a third indispensably so? Have we not seen here, upon this floor, a member rise, and call for the order of the day on a bill "necessary" to be acted on; another member call for one more necessary, and a third for one absolutely and indispensably necessary? And yet, sir, gentlemen continue to urge upon us, that "necessary," in its positive, uncomparative state, imports the superlative—means indispensable. Such arguments, sir, not only prostrate the bank, but subvert the very foundation of language. Again, sir, it is said that no mean is given by the Constitution, if the operations of Government can possibly be carried on without it. Is this dishonor to be done sir, to the memories of those wise men who framed our excellent Constitution? Was it the height of their high ambition, the fruit of all their labors, to give the country a limping, halting Government, to move with a snail's pace, to give to the wheels an impulse, the least possible, competent to move them? Upon this argument, sir, the Government itself ought not to have been established at all, as without it the country might have subsisted; we might, probably, have defended our territory and retained our liberties, at least for a considerable period; we might have moved up and down, and consumed the acorns of our forests. A higher ambition moved the worthies who laid the foundations of this goodly fabric of Government; and I will not hesitate to honor them so much as to say that they intended to give to the Union a Government for attaining the highest degree of political prosperity of which the condition of the States and the nature of a Federative compact is susceptible. Such, sir, in my apprehension, was the object of the Constitution, and, I beg leave to add, that this object may be carried into effect without touching the rights, the interests, or happiness, of those States. Nay, sir, the best interests of each and every State in the Union imperiously demands of Congress, in despite of all the covert movements of State banks and State politicians, independently to carry into effect the bill on your table. Let us not, sir, shut our eyes to the quarter from whence danger threatens, to the interests and ambition of States, who, assuming a control or influence over the representatives of the people, would, in effect, dictate to you what course you are to pursue. Here, sir, at this period, lies the danger to the Constitution. We are arrived at a crisis when it is considered almost an act of hardihood to vote on this question in opposition to the wishes of the State to which a member may belong, signified by a resolution of the Legislature. If this influence, sir, is to prevail over the Councils of the Union, then, indeed, are we degraded, our sovereignty lost, and all the weaknesses and maladies of the old Confederation returned again upon this body politic. I repeat, sir, if this bank shall fall, it will owe its fate to the baneful influence of individual States, governed by their own banking interests, over the Councils of the Union.

The argument, sir, in support of the constitutionality of a banking institution, as a mean necessary to execute the Government, is greatly strengthened by the consideration that the jurisdiction of the Government over the specified subjects of its cognizance is sovereign.

In the division of power, certain subjects of legislation remain with the individual States for their sole and sovereign jurisdiction; other specific subjects are, by the Constitution, committed to the exclusive cognizance of the Government of the Union; all legislative power over those subjects is not only given to Congress, but expressly denied to the States. With these plain landmarks before him, I was not a little surprised to hear my honorable colleague, (Mr. PORTER,) in a speech of so much method and ingenuity, contend that the Government of the Union was not sovereign in anything; that sovereignty was to be found alone with the people. To the people, sir, we always bow with respect; it is among first principles that all power flows from the people, and is to be exercised for their benefit and welfare; the people are the legitimate source of all power, and it is from them the Constitution is derived: but, sir, the moment the Constitution is formed, and the Government established, the original sovereign power of the people is parted with; it is transferred to the Government, and all interference with its exercise is lost, except through the medium of elections. Need I refer to a host of writers on civil society and Government for all this? The result is inevitable, that the power of this Government over the objects specifically and exclusively committed to its jurisdiction, is full, entire, and sovereign. The principle of my colleague would give us a Government of men, not of laws, the very definition of despotism. This view, sir, repels the strict, the narrow, meagre rules of interpretation which have been applied on this occasion. Another position of my colleague is equally unfounded. He insists that the Government of the Union and the respective States have a mixed or combined jurisdiction over the same subject-matter; and hence a new restriction in created on the power of Congress. What, sir! is the power given to Congress, and the means to execute it reserved to the States?—for such is the application and consequence of the argument.

The very face of this proposition involves contradiction and inconsistency; it would make the Constitution a felo de se, and annihilate the Government. We are carried back again into Egypt; to the old doctrine of dependence and requisition of the Confederation upon the States. Such, sir, is the extent, such the desperate efforts of argument to cut down the powers of this Government and prostrate this institution.

I cannot, sir, pass over another argument against the bill without notice. It is said that the banks of the States may be resorted to in the administration of the finances. Here, sir, by this argument, the whole question of constitutionality is given up, for the very necessity of the resort to State banks maintains the agency of a bank as necessary in administering the Government; it is on this pivot, necessity, that the whole question turns. In steering clear of Scylla the argument is lost in Charybdis. This necessity of bank agency is so indispensable to the Government, that gentlemen look with fear and trembling upon the intermission of a day between the expiration of the charter of the present bank and the new and gladdening reign of State banks. It has been stated on the floor of the House, that arrangements are already making with State banks for the accommodation of the Government. Preparations are in forwardness for celebrating the nuptials of these State damsels, who, with little modesty, attend in the ante-chamber eager to rush into the arms of Patronage in the Treasury. Do ye not discern the signs of the times? Are the policy, the co-operation, and active movements of the State banks not seen? While the United States' Bank is going down, do you not observe the wreckers hovering on the coast?

But, sir, this great question of constitutionality does not depend on the occasional existence or non-existence of banks in the States, but on the intrinsic power, given by the Constitution, without regard to the extrinsic, contingent, and uncertain co-operation of State Legislatures.

What the future policy of the respective States would be; whether State banks would be established, able and willing to aid this Government, and safe depositaries for the revenue, could not be foreseen by the framers of the Constitution. Such an argument, resting on such contingencies, would at one period make a thing Constitutional, which at another would be unconstitutional.

To all those who are averse to a multiplication of banks and bank stock, permit me to observe that the States stand ready to fill up, by new banks, the vacuum or space left on the expiration of the United States' Bank, as rapidly as the motion of fluids under the principles of hydraulics; nay, sir, some have already anticipated the event by a litter of banks, and hence, sir, we have witnessed the struggle of a parent's affection to protect the offspring.

It only remains, sir, for me to call the attention of the House to the past.

It is now twenty years that this bank has been in operation, in constant intercourse and correspondence with the Government under all the revolutions of parties; during which period we have the concurring testimony of all the States in the Union in support of its legitimacy, deducible from their acquiescence and satisfaction; for, sir, after the agitation excited by its creation had subsided, I have not been able to find among all the projects for amending the Constitution, that a single State has touched the power that created this bank. No, sir, this viper in our bosom (to use the impassioned language of gentlemen in opposition to the bill) has lain harmless; harmless, did I say? like a good genius it has administered to our wants and promoted our welfare.

Can the candid mind resist the conclusion, that the people are with the bank? Shall I remind you, sir, that this institution received its existence from the hands of the greatest and best of men; and under the Presidency and with the entire approbation of Washington; that the Constitutional question was decided at a period auspicious to fair inquiry; at a period when party spirit was much less virulent and destructive; that some of the most distinguished supporters of the present Administration concurred in its establishment? Shall this question of constitutionality never be at rest?

MR. JOHNSON.—MR. SPEAKER: I had determined until yesterday to be silent on this occasion, and I extremely regret the necessity which has compelled me trespass upon the exhausted patience of the House upon an almost exhausted subject. I am opposed to the renewal of the bank charter of the Bank of the United States, from the strongest sense of duty which can be felt by the Representative of a free people—I believe it palpably unconstitutional to renew the charter, and, if it were Constitutional, it is inexpedient, and improper.

It is absolutely necessary that the House and this nation should understand the real question before us—for arguments have been advanced upon premises which do not exist, and remarks predicated upon a case which is not embraced by the bill. This makes it my duty to call the attention to the real question, that we may not dwell longer upon supposed cases. This is not a struggle on our part to repeal any act of corporation, or to deprive any citizen of any vested rights claimed either by nature or by any political act; but an exertion in favor of equal laws and equal justice to all the people of the United States, to prevent monopolies from being given to a moneyed aristocracy, unknown to the Constitution and dangerous to the liberties of the people, and subversive of the State sovereignties. Twenty years ago, Congress in express violation of the Constitution incorporated a bank, called the Bank of the United States—to continue twenty years, which will expire the third of March. It was granted by those principally who have assumed the name of Federalists and who advocated the incorporation of the bank as Constitutional, upon the odious doctrine of implied powers; and which was opposed by those who have since supported the character of Republicans. This very measure was the first that laid the foundation for the two great political parties who have since that period agitated and divided this country. The charter granted in 1791 will expire the third of March, and the stockholders and those under their influence have petitioned Congress to renew the charter for the term of twenty years more. Will we encourage this moneyed aristocracy and continue this privileged order in the bosom of our country twenty years longer? They have had the exclusive advantage of accumulating wealth and money for twenty years, and they are not satisfied. They wish a renewal of the charter for twenty years to come. Thus, sir, the present Congress have before them the same question which was determined in 1791, viz: to incorporate the stockholders of the United States' Bank twenty years from the third of next March. We are absolved from all obligations on this subject but those of duty to the people; the question stands on its original merits and demerits; for the lapse of twenty years cannot sanctify a breach in the Constitution, nor the acquiescence of the people make that expedient and proper, which is hostile to liberty, equality and justice. Thus absolved from all obligations to promote this institution, from such considerations as have been urged, I am to consult the good of the people.

First, to incorporate the stockholders of this bank, and, thereby continue in existence a moneyed aristocracy and a privileged order of men, is a violation of the Constitution of the United States; that Constitution of union which binds the States together, and which we are individually bound to support by a solemn appeal to heaven.

It cannot be unpleasant to trace back to its source the union of the States. It brings to the patriot's mind the events of the American Revolution. It was in this glorious Revolution that the union of the States had its origin—at a time when we were distracted by domestic faction and threatened with a foreign Power, when in fact we were invaded by a British army, and our political existence was threatened. Thus, while General Washington was at the head of our forces in the North, the sages in Congress were planning articles of confederation as early as June, 1776. Before the Declaration of Independence a committee composed of a member from each State was appointed to draw up articles of confederation by which the States should be bound to each other.

These Articles of Confederation were finally adopted by all the States in 1781. Until which time Congress was the Type of Union, and the rallying point for the States. So great was the influence of these men who conducted us safe through the Revolution. This summary will give us the objects of the union of the States. It was not for the purpose of interfering with State rights—for the purpose of regulating the laws of credence, and the laws of descents, of creating county court-houses and jails, opening State and county roads; this would have been impossible; it would have been an assumption of power destructive to every principle of independence. It was, on the other hand, for the great and mighty objects of common security from foreign enemies and domestic treason and insurrection that the Union was formed. The objects of the Union are confined to those great matters of the Confederacy which could not be effected by a single State. We should, therefore, confine ourselves to those objects of the Confederacy, that we may not weaken the bonds of the Union by a usurpation of power not given to us by the Confederation—a union sacred in its origin, cemented by the sufferings of the States, strengthened by habit and affection, and sacred in its objects of common security against external danger and internal commotion. The Articles of Confederation being the first written bond of union, let us examine the system and point out its defects, that we may more easily see why the Articles of Confederation were abandoned for the present Federal Constitution. The Articles of Confederation gave to the old Congress the powers enumerated in the present Constitution. The objects of both instruments were the same, the powers principally the same, but different in the execution of those powers. The powers of confederation were Federal in extent, and Federal in their operation. The resolves of Congress therefore, under the Articles of Confederation, had no other force than recommendations to the different States. If men were wanting, the States were required to furnish their quotas. If Congress wanted money for the great objects of union they could lay and collect no tax; they could only recommend the States severally to furnish the requisition. But Congress had no power to force the States to a compliance. And the States could, as many of them did, refuse to furnish the requisition of men and money demanded by Congress. Thus the powers of the United States were Federal in extent and Federal in their operation. The old Congress had no Judiciary—because that would have been unnecessary, as their resolves could not be enforced upon the States in their sovereign capacity, or upon the property or persons of individuals. In this state of things, when commerce languished, when under British influence we were engaged in a bloody Indian war; and our ports and frontiers in British possession, and the States refusing to furnish men and money and comply in all things with the resolves of Congress, although under Constitutional obligation to do so; it was agreed by all that the Articles of Confederation wanted revision and amendment; the States sent their deputies for the purpose of forming a more perfect instrument of union between the States. This was a great and a delicate trust.

Thus the present Constitution originated from the defects of the Confederation—embracing the same great objects of common security; and the powers of both instruments are limited and Federal. In fact they are both a grant of specified powers, and powers not granted to Congress are reserved to the States or to the people. We discover the same objects and powers in the two instruments of union; differing in their operation upon the States and the people. Congress has the power to lay and collect taxes, and to operate upon the person and property of every individual in the United States and with that view Federal, Judicial, and Executive branches were established by the present Constitution, to carry the laws into effect, and to appoint officers to collect the revenue. Congress has a right to raise an army from the body of the people, and to force a draught if necessary. Whereas the old Congress, under the Confederation, had the same right to require men and money for the objects of the confederacy; but these requisitions operated only as recommendations to the States. From this statement we plainly discover the great and only radical difference between the Confederation and the present Constitution. The powers now exercised by Congress can be enforced upon the persons and property of the people. This operation, and carrying into effect the powers of Congress, is the national and consolidating principle of the Constitution.

Although experience had proven the want of power in Congress to carry into effect the legitimate objects of the Confederation, this national or consolidating principle in the Federal Constitution was a subject of alarm and solicitude to the friends of liberty. This principle was the fruitful source of the most obstinate and rational objections to the adoption of the Federal Constitution; and it was with vast difficulty that the States adopted it. In fact it was adopted under a conviction and promise that amendments would be made, which would leave nothing to doubt or implication—and important amendments were ingrafted accordingly into the Constitution, all tending to demonstrate that we were to assume no power by implication, but confine ourselves to the letter of the Constitution.

To prove that the Constitution should be thus construed, I need only advert to the eighth section of the first article, in which the powers granted to Congress are specifically enumerated, to lay and collect taxes, to borrow money, to regulate commerce, to establish a uniform rule of naturalization, to coin money, to constitute courts of justice; declare war, raise armies, to call forth the militia, &c. And to the tenth section of the same article, where certain powers are prohibited to the States, which had been previously vested in the Congress of the United States, viz: no State shall enter into any treaty, alliance or confederation, nor grant letters of marque and reprisal, coin money, emit bills of credit, or grant any title of nobility, nor lay imposts or duties on imports or exports, or lay duties on tonnage, keep troops or ships of war in time of peace, or engage in war unless actually invaded, or in such danger as will not admit of delay, &c.—and the ninth amendment in these words: "The enumeration in the Constitution of certain rights, shall not be construed to deny or disparage others retained by the people;" which amendment referred to the prohibitions to be found in the ninth section of the first article, and others of the same kind, viz: "The writ of habeas corpus shall not be suspended unless when, in cases of rebellion or invasion, the public safety may require it. No bill of attainder or ex post facto law to be passed. No tax or duty shall be laid on articles exported from any State. No money shall be drawn from the public Treasury except in cases of appropriation by law. No title of nobility shall be granted," &c. And more especially the tenth amendment, viz: "The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States, respectively, or to the people."

The parts of the Constitution recited prove the position taken, that the Constitution is a grant of specified powers; that we can exercise no power not expressly delegated to us by this instrument; that our orbit is circumscribed by the grants of the Constitution, and we should be careful not to usurp authority not given to us. The exercise of authority not delegated, but reserved to the States or to the people, is the very essence of consolidation, which, if enforced by the United States, would lead to monarchy or a despotism. If not enforced, it would convulse the whole nation, and we should see the people quitting their daily avocations; the farmer his plough; the mechanic his shop, to remonstrate against a tyrannical exercise of power. This we have seen on former occasions, not less memorable than this, arising from the same doctrine of implication, and arising from the acts of the very same set of men.

The harmony of the States should not be disturbed. It should not be agitated by the breath of discontent. Its value is more precious than gold or silver. The spirit of union should be cherished by us all in words and in actions. Nothing will produce more happy effects than keeping in the path of our rightful powers; otherwise you generate the most angry passions of the people; you start up the most malignant invectives—order will be disturbed and tranquillity will be interrupted. To produce these unfortunate effects, nothing can contribute more than to disregard the enumerated powers in the Constitution, and exercise tyrannical powers by implication or under some general phrases, such as the "general welfare;" expressions which contain no grant of power, but limited and explained by enumerated authorities; by which construction the power of Congress would be arbitrary and unlimited, as Congress would take upon themselves to judge what measures would promote this general welfare. I wish on this occasion to do justice to the people of Kentucky, by asserting their inviolable attachment to the Union, more especially since in this House its sacredness has been profaned in a manner not to be forgotten. If the people of the West and beyond the mountains have any political idol, it is the union of the States. As the Bible and New Testament are dear to every Christian and true believer, as the basis of his happiness, here and the foundation of his future hopes, so the Union of the States in a political point of view is considered by the people as the surest pledge for the blessing of liberty and the security we enjoy, and the ark of our future hopes and safety. Their union is never profaned by conversations or speculations about disunion. You never hear disunion mentioned in private circles, much less in public bodies. A professor of religion to deny the existence of an over-ruling Providence, would not be more disgraced in the estimation of the real Christian, than a statesman would be disgraced, politically, by even doubting the advantages of the union of the States. The word disunion, as applied to the States, would produce a heart-rending pang in the bosom of a Western patriot, and I hope it would throughout the seventeen United States and their territories. The people are Republican, and they abhor all measures of a monarchical tendency. They know the United States have been governed alternately by the two great political parties in this country. They have a regard for and a confidence in the Republican party—this regard is not confined to the Western States, but extended to every part of the United States. They believe that truth and equal justice will prevail, where the opportunity is equal, and where the people do exercise the power of sovereignty. The people represent, and in fact, the whole of the States have confidence in every part of the United States. As a people they cherish and harbor no jealousy about large and small States, of commercial monopolies, &c. Nor are they thus attached to the Union from selfish and interested motives—no, sir, their attachment to the Union arises from a noble and generous affection, a magnanimous and disinterested display of patriotism, and love of independence. We have given many proofs of this. At a time when this people were agitated and alarmed at the prospect of having some of their most essential rights interrupted, and when they declared their determination to support those rights, the gold and silver of Spain, in the hands of Spanish emissaries, could not alienate the affections of this people, with all the influence of arch intriguers; and the treason of Aaron Burr had as little effect upon the minds of this virtuous and happy people. Any other attempt would be as vain, however well matured. I feel the consolation which arises from a knowledge that I represent in part such a people, whose affections cannot be estranged from the great American family by promises of future greatness, the hopes of golden harvests, or the expectations of governing provinces with the silver mines of Mexico. With these sentiments, I am now to examine for the particular parts of the Constitution and the arguments which have been advanced to justify this measure. It is not contended by any that the power of incorporation is an express power given by the Constitution to the Congress of the United States beyond this ten miles, over which Congress has exclusive legislation. If then this power is not expressly given, I might here stop and deny the right to exercise it. So far from finding any express clause in the Constitution giving this power, the word corporation or bank cannot be found in any part of this instrument of our Union.

We have seen the exercise of great abilities, and we have been entertained with great research by those who advocate the renewal of this charter. But unfortunately these gentlemen cannot agree among themselves. Is this not the strongest proof that the power to incorporate this bank is not given by the Constitution, and does it not demonstrate the danger of constructive powers? One has contended that this power was included in some of the specified powers; another has contended that this power is given by implication ; and a third contends, that it is an instrumental power given to carry some specified power into operation. This is not all ; the advocates cannot agree upon the specified power in the Constitution out of which this power or means arises. One has contended that the power to lay and collect taxes gives this power as a means to execute the specified power, and to support this position it has been contended that this National Bank is necessary and proper as a means to lay and collect taxes, duties, &c. To strengthen this construction, that part of the 8th section of the first article, which says, that "Congress shall have power to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers," &c., has been resorted to ; another has said that this instrumental power grows out of the express power to borrow money—and a third that this power was incident to the power to regulate commerce, and in fact these three great objects are embraced by the preamble of the bill which passed in 1791, which incorporated this moneyed aristocracy and erected this privileged order of men. With respect to the declaration in the Constitution, that Congress may make all laws necessary and proper to carry the express powers into effect, I should state that the framers of the Constitution intended by this declaration to prevent the doctrine of implication, and to leave nothing to doubt. It was introduced through abundant caution against the strides of usurpation, and it should be the last clause to which he should advert, upon which to build the doctrine of unlimited means to carry the express powers of the Constitution into effect. If our means are unlimited, our powers need not be defined, because one as much as the other is a destruction of our freedom and independence. I shall contend that the means by which we are to carry into effect any express authority should be adapted to the end in view ; that it should not embrace other objects not contemplated by the Constitution, although it may be made instrumental in carrying into effect a specified authority. Under this cloak we might conceal our usurpation of power.

I will ask if this National Bank is necessary and proper as a means to carry into effect the power to lay and collect taxes, duties on imports, &c., to borrow money, or to regulate commerce ? If necessary and proper, is this bank confined to any one of these objects exclusively, or to all collectively, or does it embrace a vast variety of other objects, which are the primary ones, in fact, of this institution, and only embracing these powers in the Constitution incidentally, and as secondary considerations ? Sir, it will be difficult to convince the people that it is necessary, in the language of the Constitution, to create a moneyed aristocracy, and a privileged order of men, extending its branches, its influence, and its strength, into the interior of every State, to collect taxes, to borrow money, or to regulate commerce. The primary object of this incorporation was, to promote usurpation of power, to support the dangerous doctrine of implication, and to amass wealth from the labor of the people, and not for the exclusive object of carrying into effect any express authority in the Constitution. Thus, it is evident that this moneyed aristocracy, embracing such a vast variety of objects no ways connected with the execution of any specific grant of power, departs from the letter and meaning of that part of the Constitution which gives the power to carry into effect the specified powers of the Constitution. But now, let us inquire what is the necessary means to lay and collect taxes. If a bank was not intended, I will take duties upon imports, as in that way, we collect our revenue. First, a law must pass designating the articles upon which a duty shall be laid, the amount of that duty, and the manner in which it shall be paid, either upon the delivery of the goods, or upon a credit, by giving bond with security ; and last, to appoint collectors of the revenue, and other officers, to collect and receive this revenue for the United States, with authority to bring suit upon failure of payment. This is a necessary exercise of the power to lay and collect taxes, &c. And where is the statesman who has denied the power as unconstitutional ? Here these means are confined to the object in view, the collection of the revenue ; and certainly, the United States have power sufficient for all the objects of the confederacy, as in the exercise of all the specific grants of authority, Congress may operate upon the persons and property of the individuals of the States to enforce that authority.

It is no argument with me that we are in prosperity and health, and such an institution will not be dangerous. No, sir, establish a precedent in the day of prosperity and it will come upon you in the hour of adversity. This same doctrine of our being unlimited in our means of carrying into effect the grant of powers in the Constitution has already endangered the liberty of this nation. If the doctrine contended for on this occasion be correct, and carried into full force, Congress would be as omnipotent as the Parliament of Great Britain ; the Constitution would no longer restrain us, and the independence of the nation would depend upon the caprice of Congress. Our Constitution would be like the boasted Constitution of Englishmen. And what is that Constitution ? Sir, it is not lettered or defined like ours. It may be changed by Parliament as the Crown party or the people shall prevail. 1st. The great charter of liberty obtained from King John, violently, and in duress, declaring what should be considered the fundamental laws of England ; 2d. the Lords and Commons of England in 1688; 7th. The Act of Settlement at the commencement of the eighteenth century, endeavoring to secure the English subject in his personal liberty, security, and prosperity. These, and the like Parliamentary declarations and statutory provisions, constitute the Constitution of England, which the same Parliament has a right to alter or abolish. I never wish to see Congress invested with a power to change the Constitution, sanctioned by the people in their highest sovereign capacity. The Constitution has vested us with power enough, and if we want more, amend the Constitution in a Constitutional way, and not tyrannically exercise power never delegated to this body. The ground on which we stand is delicate, and the duty we owe the people should teach us caution, more especially when we see men in power too apt to grasp at more, and exercise it oppressively. We should never forget that all power flows from the people; they are sovereign—I hope they will ever remain sovereign in this country. Our safety is with them. They are unambitious, they are virtuous, and have no temptation to overturn those liberties which they themselves enjoy. But this measure is a violation of the Constitution in another respect, by interfering with State rights. This corporation can send a branch bank to any part of the United States without consulting the States or the citizens of the States. Suppose, sir, they should send one of these branches to Frankfort, Kentucky, with a great capital, and under the sanction of the General Government, would it not lessen the profits arising to the State, and to the people of the State from the State bank of Kentucky, as established by the laws of that State? I presume it would. It would contract very much the circulation of the State bank notes, and would, in many other respects, come in collision with State rights. Every State has a right to regulate its own moneyed concerns, to incorporate banks, or not, as interest or inclination may dictate. But in the zeal of some gentlemen to continue this moneyed aristocracy in the United States for twenty years to come, they have denied the right of the States to incorporate banks, and that Congress alone has the power. This doctrine is new to me. When Mr. Madison, and other patriotic statesmen, denounced this measure as unconstitutional, in 1791, it was not contended that the States had no right. It was admitted by the lovers of implication that there was a concurrent right. Thus we behold the progress of opinion to support a favorite measure.

If this bill passes, and the States have no right to incorporate banks, I suppose the State banks throughout the United States must be put down, or burned up, to give way to this great engine of foreign influence. "The States shall not emit bills of credit." This is the prohibition relied on to take the right of incorporation from the States. Bills of credit is another phrase for paper money. The States shall not issue paper money and make it a legal tender. The men of the Revolution knew this. The great calamity which individuals suffered by the paper money demonstrated the necessity. But no man is obliged to take the bank notes of a State bank for the payment of a debt, or in common transactions. It is at his option, and the moment you get a bank note, you may present it to the bank and demand your money. Not so with bills of credit, or paper money, issued and made such by the State. It would be extremely difficult, I presume, for any gentleman to convince the States by argument that they had no right to incorporate banks, and it would be equally difficult to force the States to destroy their local banks for the United States' Bank, owned principally by foreigners. Not only the bank in its moneyed operations would interfere with State rights, but the rules and regulations of the bank, as heretofore established by Congress, have interfered with the laws of the several States in their municipal regulations, as to the tenure of property and the liability of the corporation to pay their debts.

Mr. Speaker, I have said as much as I conceive it my duty upon the unconstitutionality of the bank charter. I am to ask your indulgence while I endeavor to prove its inexpediency and its dangerous tendency to the freedom of this nation. In the hand of a private citizen wealth will at all times have its influence, and may attach to him an importance beyond his merits. But this influence is not so dangerous as to induce a government to interpose and limit the honest accumulation of property by any citizen. And though this wealth may have its influence, it is always limited. It may frequently be in the hands of a benevolent man, and if not of this character, this vast wealth seldom survives the death of the individual proprietor. It is either divided among numerous relations, or squandered by his heir. But not so with a body corporate, extended throughout this vast empire, possessed of a capital of ten millions of dollars, and extending their credit and accommodations to double that sum, notwithstanding their limit to ten millions. It is stated by an advocate for this bank that the stockholders commenced their discounts with about $625,000, and that upon this sum they discounted to the amount of $6,000,000 the first ten months after it went into operation. To divide this ten millions or twenty millions of capital in local or State banks, no serious danger could be apprehended, because the stockholders of one institution would be strangers to all the other stockholders; so of the directors of the different local institutions, and consequently there could be no combination between the different banks. But it is otherwise, and the danger is imminent when you by act of the General Government give unity of action, unity of will, and unity of strength to a moneyed aristocracy, vested with a capital of ten millions of dollars, with power to increase their accommodations to twenty millions, and to send their branch banks into the bosom of every State and Territory. This is not all; your revenue bonds to the amount of millions are deposited with this bank for collection, and the public money deposited in this bank to the amount of millions for safe-keeping. And their notes made payable to the United States the same as gold and silver. Sir, is there no danger in such a monster, fostered by the General Government, and possessing so many advantages by the laws of Congress? Such a bank in its beginning would confine its engagements to the means of payment, but as their credit increases, they engage beyond their means, their vaults are empty, and the institution relies upon its great credit and exclusive privileges. Thus the character of the bank is changed, and it becomes a system of speculation and a political engine to destroy virtuous individuals, or mould the Government to its notions.

I have no knowledge myself about the political workings of this United States' Bank. But if I were to believe the declarations of members on this floor, and complaints from every part of this continent, I must think that this institution has not been silent and indifferent spectators to the reform of the Administration to Republican principles—but they have endeavored to support that party who gave them a charter. I do not, however, introduce this as a conclusive argument against this bank. No, sir, I would equally object to it in the hands of Republicans. It would still be a moneyed aristocracy, too vast and too powerful not to be dangerous to the freedom of the United States. But, without these declarations of political influence exercised by the stockholders and directors of these banks, our own reason would teach us to believe all we have heard of the oppression and partiality of this bank. It is composed of individuals; these individuals have their passions, their feelings, their prejudices, their partialities and their politics, and they will act accordingly. Self-preservation will always induce them to support and keep in power the party who will be most friendly to moneyed aristocracies and their own institution. The influence of this bank is palpable and notorious. We have the evidence from the long roll of petitioners now imploring Congress to renew the charter. If in twenty years this bank is to be the idol of some and the alarm of others—if the solvency of so many individuals depend on it—if ruin and devastation will in the event of its dissolution spread wide in the country—then, sir, it will only require twenty years more to make it stronger than the Government. To induce us to vote for this institution, we have been persuaded, flattered, alarmed, petitioned, and threatened, and we have been amused with the rise and history of the banking system. It originated in Italy, it has travelled through Europe, crossed the British channel to Great Britain, and lastly, it crossed the wide Atlantic to America. And much has been said of the utility of those institutions. Without dwelling upon the utility of banks at present, I could only admit them as a necessary evil, and not dangerous, if left to the control of our State Governments. But the history of those banks which have been quoted, will furnish no argument in favor of a National Bank. We wish no political engine of a moneyed aristocracy. We wish to rest upon the virtue and will of the people.

It has been stated that Georgia is Republican, notwithstanding this monstrous machine has extended a branch bank to this State—and it is stated that Connecticut is Federal, and has no branch bank of the United States. This does not prove that the bank is not a dangerous engine against the liberties of the people; but it proves that the people of Georgia withstood this dangerous influence and deserve more credit. It is a proof of the virtue of that people. If this institution is so necessary and beneficial, why do not the Representatives of Georgia, who have been blessed with this institution, come forward and advocate a renewal of the charter? But you find the respectable members of Georgia opposing a continuance of this evil in every form. In fact the State of Georgia taxed the paper of this bank, and the State was determined by taxation or legislative prohibition to drive this circulating medium from their territory. But considerations of wisdom induced a postponement of this determination until it should be seen whether the charter would again be renewed in violation of the Constitution, and in defiance of our liberties. My colleague (Mr. McKee,) whose opinions I had been in the habit of considering as my own until this unfortunate question which divides us, has stated that in his opinion the dissolution of this institution would be felt by the citizens of the Western country, and that our surplus hemp would not command as good a price. I differ in opinion from my colleague if he supposes the Western country will feel any great pressure from the dissolution of this bank. I grant the people of Kentucky may not be entirely exempt from some inconveniences common on such an event. But our produce will fall from other very different causes. Interruptions in commerce, stagnation in trade, bankruptcies throughout the commercial part of the United States, arising from the bankruptcies in England, which have occasioned the return of many bills from England protested. These are the causes which produce distress, and will continue to produce it until we are a people less dependent on foreign commerce. But believing as I do on this subject—viewing the effects of this great political moneyed institution with abhorrence, I would not vote for it, let the temporary distress be what it may. I would rather see the present crop of hemp brought to one deposit, which would make a bulk larger than this Capitol, and consumed with a lighted torch and ascend to the heaven in smoke as a bonfire, rather than vote for the passage of this law—and sir, the people I represent would justify my vote. They would bear the loss without a murmur; they would act the part of freemen worthy of freedom; they would magnanimously bear the calamity without complaint if their patriotism required the sacrifice. They are a most worthy people. A virtuous people, an enlightened people, a glorious people. Descendants of this great American family, inheriting that spirit of independence which equally sustained our cause under defeat and victory upon all the battle grounds of the Revolution. I will not be alarmed out of my vote by clamor, no matter from what quarter it may assail me. I never will be driven from my duty by alarms and fears. I will stand firm to the cause I conceive to be just, and the people will support me; they despise wavering and temporizing.

If you continue this charter of this bank twenty years more, you can never put it down. No, sir, instead of having petitions which would reach from the Speaker to the seat of the members, you would have them packed upon your table until they would intercept my view in addressing you. Yes, sir, they would rise up higher, and implore that goddess of liberty which presides over the deliberations of this House. We are told that this bank is necessary to the collection, the safe-keeping and the transmission of the revenue to different parts of the United States. It is stated that the State banks are strangers to us, and cannot be trusted with the deposit of public money. I am sorry to hear such a sentiment. It has originated from a panic, an alarm, ideal danger. That great and good man the Secretary of the Treasury has told you otherwise, by his report now before me of date 12th of January, in which it appears that of about $2,400,000, upwards of $800,000 are deposited in the State banks, $75,000 of which are deposited in the State Bank of Kentucky, and I should be sorry if it was not as safe there as in the hands of the United States' Bank, in the possession of foreigners. If State banks will not do, let the United States build vaults for the safe-keeping of the revenue.

But, sir, the alarming consequences which must arise from a dissolution of this corporation—It will deprive us of a circulating medium; it will interrupt commerce and produce bankruptcies. It is to produce the distress of farmers and the ruin of merchants; it is to prevent emigration, and it is to shake the foundations of the Government. This picture gives me no alarm. It is the picture of a wild and distempered imagination. If serious injury will be felt by many in the power of this moneyed aristocracy, I feel and sympathize with the sufferings of those who may be needy without any fault of their own; but something is due to posterity; and even in that point of view, I am not willing to entail upon them the baneful effects of a great moneyed corporation with a capital of twenty millions of dollars, extending their arms of power and influence to every part of the United States, and having the destiny of good men within their control, whenever they receive the nod to exercise their giant power. No, sir, I am ready to see and feel the sad crisis which has been described. If we die with less money, we shall live in more honor and enjoy more happiness. I wish to see whether so much depends upon this corporation. If so, it is the greater reason why the poison should be destroyed. Like the strong man we read of in Holy Writ, let us see if the violent death of this corporate body will pull down the pillars of the Constitution, that another Volney may sit upon the ruins of this capital and mourn the fallen empire of this great and happy Republic.

Mr. SHEFFEY.—Mr. Speaker, it was my intention not to address any observations to you on the subject now before the House, but reasons which I cannot disregard have induced me to request your attention. I am confident, when the importance of the question is considered—a question in which is involved the integrity of a Constitution we all profess to adore, and the prosperity of a country we all profess to love, the House will listen to everything that can be said, not only with patience, but with pleasure.

I have been led to make the remarks which I am about to offer by considerations distinct from the intrinsic merits of the question. In the vote which I shall give, I shall disagree with a majority of my honorable colleagues, whose opinions are entitled to my respect. The sentiments of a great portion of the people of the State which I have the honor in part to represent, so far as they can be collected from the opinions of her Legislature, and my own, do not correspond on this occasion; and I must superadd that no question ever was presented to my mind in the course of my public duty which at first view appeared attended with more difficulty. I have therefore thought it proper to state the reasons of my vote to the House, to enable my country to appreciate them, and my constituents to interpose their corrective should they deem them unsatisfactory. I had hoped that this question would have been discussed, and determined, abstracted from all party considerations; that our attention would have been exclusively directed to the effects of this measure on the community, whose interests are committed to us; and our solicitude employed to keep within the limits prescribed by the Constitution. But we have been invited into a different course. My honorable colleague (Mr. EPPES) told us the other day that we need not to expect that this question would be determined on any other than party principles; that party principles gave birth to the charter of the bank originally, and that that was the first great question which separated the two parties in this country. Was the fact even conceded, the conclusion does not appear to me inevitable that this must now be a party question. At that time it was a matter of speculation and conjecture what means would be "necessary and proper" to give effect to the delegated powers confided to this Government. The light afforded to us by twenty years' experience has banished them, and substituted certainty in their stead. We have now before us the practical operations of the Government, calculated to show the fallacy of reasonings founded on plausible but untried theories. With these means within their power, it does not appear to me that those act inconsistent with their former principles, who now conceive the necessity of a bank as an instrument to carry on the fiscal concerns of the Government, though (unaided by the best of all human guides—experience—) they might have thought different in the infant state of an operation.

But my honorable colleague has committed an error in point of fact in giving the statement to the House that this was originally a party question. I had taken it for granted that the fact was as stated by him; but, on recurring to the Journal of this House for the year 1791, (which I hope I shall be pardoned in receiving as better evidence than his declaration, however implicitly I might rely on him on other occasions,) I find that a considerable portion of the Federal members voted against the incorporation of the bank, and a still greater portion of the Republicans for it; besides, as the measure was then contested on the ground that there was no Constitutional power in Congress to adopt it, which always involves matters of conscience, I cannot submit to the idea that one political party exclusively entertained conscientious scruples when violence was threatened the Constitution. This would be degrading one-half of the American people.

[Mr. EPPES rose to explain: He said he apprehended from the various observations which had been made that he had been misunderstood in what he had said a few days ago. He meant to say that there were from the commencement of the Government two opposite opinions entertained with respect to its powers: One was that they were strictly conformed to the objects delegated; the other was, that there were certain implied powers which the Government might exercise that did not appear on the face of the Constitution; that the latter opinion gave birth to the alien and sedition laws, and the stamp act, and that this was the party principle he meant which gave birth to the bank charter. As to conscience being monopolized by one party he had never entertained any such idea; he knew men of the Federal party who were as conscientious as he was, and as much attached to the welfare of the country.]

Mr. SHEFFEY proceeded: Mr. Speaker, I do not believe that my honorable colleague was actuated by any improper motive in making the declaration he did. During the time I have been associated with him in public life, I have had no cause to believe that he was under any such influence. That the opinions stated by him existed early in this Government, cannot be denied. They are attributable to very obvious causes. On the one hand, those who were the friends of the Constitution were friendly to the exercise of all the legitimate powers confided to the General Government, under the impression that it was necessary to preserve the Union; many indeed suppose that the powers delegated were still too feeble to secure that great object, unless supported by a very extensive and liberal construction. On the other hand, there were those who were apprehensive that the powers of the General Government were of a character calculated to swallow up the State authorities, and subvert the rights of the people. These, after their efforts had been unsuccessful in the conventions of the States, on the adoption of the Constitution, brought with them (with the best intentions) into the councils of the new Government their solicitude for popular rights and State sovereignty, without sufficiently regarding the importance of the Union, and the means necessary to preserve it; and, while some of their political opponents contended for a construction which produced some very obnoxious measures; they, if success had attended their efforts, would have brought the Union to the feeble state in which the old Confederation had left it, and I hesitate not to declare, by this time, we should have been a divided, distracted, and enslaved people.

Much has been said in the course of this debate about State rights, and the offence which will be given to the States, should this measure be adopted. There is certainly propriety in preserving to the States their legitimate authority, and in manifesting a jealousy whenever it is threatened with any infraction, because the rights of the people are then in jeopardy. But let it not be forgotten that every relaxation on the part of this Government weakens the Union, without which the rights of the people are but an empty name. Sir, he who impairs the powers properly belonging to us, is as much the enemy of the people as he who subverts the State authorities possibly can be; he is as criminal who weakens in the least degree the bonds which unite us, as he who places upon our necks an iron yoke to keep us together.

If we should pursue the course which the observations of some gentlemen seem to recommend, not to adopt the bill before you, because it will give offence to the States, and bring us into collision with them; to what a miserable state must this Government, and consequently this Union, be very speedily brought? It is in the nature of man to thirst for power, and to employ all his means to obtain it. From this spirit the State governments are not exempt, but, on the contrary, we have abundant reason to know that it prevails there in an eminent degree. Let it once be established as a principle not to exercise any particular power, because it is disagreeable to some of the States, and I pledge myself that in a very little time you will not be able to exercise any whatever. You will have to recede step by step as they advance upon you, (which they will be sure to do,) until you possess nothing but the shadow of authority; and this Union, the last and best hope of the friends of liberty, must dissolve in its own weakness. Sir, I fear when that is gone there never will be sufficient patriotism and unanimity, nor a sufficient portion of a conciliating spirit to reunite us in any form of government which, while it secures to us the principles of a free constitution, has sufficient energy to maintain itself. The consequences are easily foreseen. We shall be tossed about, divided, and distracted, until we finally share the destinies of other nations—seek repose from the evils of anarchy in the arms of despotism.

A principle, equally untenable and equally productive of mischief, has been advanced in debate, particularly by the honorable member from New York, (Mr. PORTER:) that no power can be ex-exercised by this Government which interferes with the remaining powers of the States. Such for instance is the power of internal taxation. Every cent which we draw from the citizen by virtue of that power, diminishes his ability to pay his taxes to the State of which he is an inhabitant, and consequently narrows the circle of State legislation. And, indeed, cases might be supposed where the necessity of this Government required taxes commensurate with the utmost ability of the people to pay, which in effect would be a total suspension of the powers of the States to lay and collect taxes. Yet can it be pretended that in the amount of public contributions, which it may be necessary to require, we are limited by any other restriction than that which a sound discretion and a due regard to the welfare of the community imposes? The same principle applies to the means which may be necessary to carry the delegated powers into effect; they may be legitimate, though they interfere with the legislation of the States.

Having detained you thus long with the preliminary remarks which I had to offer, permit me now, sir, to lead your attention more directly to the subject before us.

The most important principle involved in this question is, whether the Constitution has delegated to us the power to legislate upon this subject in the manner proposed. It is admitted on all sides that unless that power exists, let the inconveniences and even calamities which will follow the rejection of this bill be what they may, the high duty which we owe to the country not to transcend the limits prescribed to us, is superior to every other, and must imperiously lead us to that result. In order, therefore, to approach the minor question of expediency, it is necessary to ascertain whether by a rational and unbiassed construction of the Constitution this power is fairly apparent, either as directly or indirectly given, either as a power original and express, or derivative and implied.

It has never been contended that the Constitution expressly delegates the power to create banks; but that such institutions may be established as instrumental in giving effect to some one or more of the delegated powers. In the course of the observations which I propose to submit on this part of the subject, I shall attempt to prove that Congress are not restricted in the means to execute the delegated powers, except so far as the Constitution expressly restricts them, but that they may employ any which they deem "necessary and proper" without violating the Constitution.

To enable us to give correct constructions to the acts of individuals and of public bodies, it frequently becomes important that we should consider the time in which they happened, and the circumstances under which the persons concerned acted. In legislation and jurisprudence this is a very general maxim, and seems to me peculiarly proper to be called in aid on the present occasion. It will afford us the best ideas of the evils under which this country labored when the Constitution, under whose authority we now act, was proposed and adopted, and consequently of the extent of the relief which that remedy was intended to give.

Let us then see what was the situation of this country at that period of our history, and what were the causes which led to that great event. It was not the want of a General Government that induced the people of the United States to seek security in the present Constitution, but the want of one with sufficient powers for the purposes of union. That want of efficiency which characterized the Confederation, emphatically styled "a rope of sand," was not the effect of the limited subjects confided to the deliberations of Congress, but the limited means to carry their determinations into effect. On recurring to that instrument it will be seen, as has been stated by an honorable member from Kentucky, (Mr. JOHNSON,) that the subjects embraced are little short of those vested in this Government. Congress was clothed with all the great attributes of sovereignty. They had the power to determine on peace or war; to regulate commerce (through the medium of commercial treaties) with foreign nations; to regulate trade with the Indian tribes; to grant letters of marque and reprisal; to coin money and regulate the value thereof; to raise armies and navies; to borrow money on the credit of the United States; and many other powers of minor importance. Had they had the means to carry their resolutions into effect through the agency of their own Executive and Judicial authorities, and could their acts have reached the people, instead of being dependent for their execution on the will of the States, I venture to say that this Constitution would not have been proposed. It is true that the organization of the Government under the Confederation was greatly defective; yet that was not the cause of its dissolution. It was the imbecility arising from the want of means in the old Congress that assembled the General Convention. It was that which produced the Constitution of the United States, the primary object of which, and of the people who adopted it, was to place into the hands of the new Government means commensurate with the due execution of all the powers confided to it. Is it rational therefore to suppose that under this impulse, under the pressure of the evil which every one felt, and the cause of which every one knew, those who framed and adopted this instrument could have intended that we should be circumscribed in the means deemed necessary to give effect to our measures or (as some gentlemen strangely suppose) be dependent on the States for them? Is it in the least probable that the men selected for their wisdom, perfectly acquainted with the progress of man in every age; who foresaw the changes which the state of society must undergo in this country from the increase of population, commerce, and the arts, could act so absurdly, as to prescribe a certain set of means to carry on the operations of a Government intended not only for the present but for future generations? There are indeed some express limitations which the circumstances of the times and the jealousies of the parties produced, but they being expressly stated proves that the means not interdicted remain entirely at our discretion.

When we examine the various parts of the Constitution with a view to this question, we shall see many reasons in support of the principle for which I contend. The last clause of the 8th section of the first article invests Congress with the "power to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper to carry into effect the delegated powers, and all powers vested in the Government of the United States or in any department or officer thereof." To whom is confided the right to judge what shall be "necessary and proper?" I presume it will be admitted that this right is exclusively inherent in Congress. And if Congress alone have the right to judge of the necessity and propriety of the means, is it not absurd to say that they must judge rightly or they have no right to judge at all? I have always supposed, when a subject is within the legitimate authority of any men or body of men, an erroneous decision upon such subject does not prove a want of jurisdiction, but of correct judgment. On this, like on every other subject, there will be a variety of opinions as to what is "necessary and proper." The majority must determine that question. And, although there may in this, as in every other case, be flagrant abuses of power, for which we are responsible, there never can be any usurpation. It must always be a question of sound discretion, guided by the interests of the Union, and not a question of power; unless, indeed, we should fall in with the fancy of my honorable colleague (Mr. BURWELL) who opened this debate, and interpolate the word "absolutely," so that he could adopt no means but such as are "absolutely necessary," which would leave us, as has been ably demonstrated by the honorable member from Maryland, (Mr. KEY,) without any power at all.

Every subject which is presented to us within the acknowledged sphere of our authority, involves the question whether it is "necessary and proper." If a tax be proposed, which (as the Constitution is expounded by some, and which I believe to be correct) can only be laid "to pay the debts and provide for the common defence and general welfare," it may be objected that it is unconstitutional, because these objects may be provided for without any tax, or without the one proposed. But there can be no doubt that this would be exclusively a question of expediency and discretion.

The Constitution of the United States has universally been considered as a grant of particular and not of general powers. Those powers are the primary or expressly delegated, and the derivative or implied. The character of the instrument precluded the necessity of a "bill of rights," because the question never could arise, what was reserved, but what was granted. The framers of the Constitution were well aware of this, and so were the people who adopted it. It was therefore fairly to be inferred, that whenever there appears a limitation or restriction in the shape of a negative clause, Congress might have exercised the power interdicted, had such clause not been made part of the instrument. By examining this part of the subject, we will be able to determine how far it was supposed derivative or implied powers would extend when not restricted.

The first clause of the 9th section of the first article provides, that "the migration or importation of such persons, as any of the States now existing shall think proper to admit, shall not be prohibited by the Congress prior to the year 1808, but a tax or duty may be imposed on such importation, not exceeding ten dollars for each person."

Among the delegated powers, the right to prohibit the migration or importation of persons into the States, is nowhere to be seen; but it was justly conceived that it was incidental to the power "to regulate commerce with foreign nations."

The second clause of the same section restricts the suspension of the writ of habeas corpus to certain circumstances. There is no express power given to any department to grant it in any instance. But Congress have the power to organize the judicial courts, to which is incident the power to regulate writs and other processes. And as this celebrated writ was deemed the birth-right of the people of the States under the State authorities, as the instrument to release them from arbitrary imprisonments, it was taken for granted that its benefits would be extended to them under this Government, and it was conceived necessary to restrict the discretion of Congress in suspending its salutary operations.

In the third clause of the same section, Congress are prohibited from passing any bill of attainder or ex post facto law. Congress are no where directly authorized thus to interfere with the ordinary course of justice, so as to subject an individual to the consequence of an attainder at their own mere will, without a trial; or to make an innocent act criminal, by a posterior declaration. But they have the power to define and punish certain offences, which would have implied the power to do it in any manner they might have thought proper—hence it became necessary to interpose this restriction.

The next three clauses contain restrictions on the power to lay and collect taxes and appropriate their proceeds, and show that it was considered as unlimited, unless expressly restricted.

The last clause in the same section gives us a more comprehensive idea of the extent to which the framers of the Constitution conceived the implied powers of this Government might be exercised, if not restricted. It provides, "that no title of nobility shall be granted by the United States." The whole context of the Constitution does not afford the most distant hint that the creation of an aristocracy is among the delegated powers. And yet the interdiction to create such a body—the very name of which is so justly abhorrent in this country—was deemed necessary. And why? Because this Government has the power to raise and support armies and navies. It has various important concerns committed to it, in which eminent men may render great and meritorious services. And as it would not have been restricted in rewarding them according to its pleasure, it might, in conformity with the usage of other nations, have conferred distinctions upon them; which, though they could give no exclusive right to office, might be attended with emolument and honor.

If the doctrines which have been advanced upon this floor during the present debate are truly genuine and Constitutional, then does the history of this country, for the last twenty years, present a spectacle the most alarming; then have the operations of our Government been nothing but an uninterrupted scene of usurpation. From its organization, under the auspices of the first of men and of patriots, until the present moment, violation has succeeded violation; the Constitution has been trodden under foot by all parties, and is no longer worth preserving. Sir, I will go further. I venture to say, that if those doctrines are adhered to and acted upon in every instance, this Government is at an end. It cannot adopt the simplest measures necessary for its own existence, and for the welfare of this people, without resorting to means not expressly delegated. If this critical construction prevails, we have no right to disband one single man from the Army or Navy. Congress are expressly authorized to raise and support them; but the power to lessen or destroy them, is not to be seen on the face of the Constitution. We are invested with the power to regulate commerce with foreign nations; but where is the authority to suspend or annihilate it by an embargo or non-intercourse, unless it is implied?

To those who are not carried away by these doctrines, pregnant with so much mischief to this community, it is well worth the trouble to examine the operations of the Government under every Administration. They will be able to ascertain the opinions of men of every party manifested by their public acts, as to the extent of the means confided to us to give effect to the delegated powers. And this inquiry will, I am persuaded, tend to confirm the construction which I have attempted to give to the Constitution.

By the Constitution, a judicial department, with limited jurisdiction, is established, to give effect to the due administration of justice, so far as it is confided to the Government of the United States. Congress have made provision for the punishment of perjury, bribery, stealing or falsifying records, rescue, opposition to the execution of judicial process, and other offences. It does not appear that the particular definition to these crimes, and the punishment designated, are "absolutely necessary." Some other means perhaps more conducive to the end might have been employed; and, indeed, it might be said, that as Congress, by the Constitution, are authorized to "define and punish" certain crimes, it implied a negative to define and punish any other, and consequently those just mentioned. But can it be necessary to waste the time, or insult the good sense of this House, to attempt to prove that in these cases Congress exercised their Constitutional power only?

The power to borrow money on the credit of the United States has been exercised by authorizing the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund to issue certificates pledging the public faith to pay so much money as therein stated, to be sold in the market for what they could bring.

To give effect to the revenue system of the United States, Congress have employed means, which, instead of appearing "absolutely necessary," have a very remote connexion with the object; besides the many penalties and forfeitures which are created, the citizen is subjected to the more arbitrary searches and seizures dependent upon the mere will of the collector; yet, the authority to do this has never been questioned. Under the power to regulate commerce, Congress have erected light-houses, beacons, and buoys; they have established rules for the regulation and government of seamen in the merchant service; they have adopted measures for their protection on the high seas, and in foreign countries; they have imposed a tax to be exacted from them, even when abroad, to raise a fund for the sick and disabled; they have established in this country, within the jurisdiction of the State authorities, and without their consent, hospitals for their reception and support. How remotely connected are all these things with the primary power "to regulate commerce?" Are they "absolutely necessary" to give effect to that power? Or, can it be pretended that the erection of an hospital is more immediately connected with the regulation of commerce than a bank is with the various fiscal operations of the Government? After having gone thus far, let me ask every rational man, could Congress not incorporate the trustees of such an hospital, with a view to give them individuality, the better to enable them to preserve the funds, and administer the concerns of the institution? Unless there is something magical in the word "corporation," it appears to me there can be no doubt on the subject.

That Congress have the right to create corporations, as instrumental to effect objects confided to them, seems to me susceptible of the clearest demonstration. For example: the power "to regulate commerce" includes the power to "promote it by all possible means." Suppose a new branch of commerce should rise into view, which promised great national advantages, but its commencement was surrounded with difficulties, and required resources to which individual enterprise and capital were incompetent, will it be contended that the power which erected hospitals to nurse seamen, because it may have a favorable effect on commerce, cannot incorporate a company with certain privileges, so that while the means of many are united, they can act as one in promoting the same object? As to monopolies, of which much has been said, though I am not a friend to them, yet circumstances may exist in which the interest of the community will be promoted in granting some, if prudently regulated; and, therefore, the power ought to exist. Under the power to regulate trade with the Indian tribes, Congress have adopted a system which, though not a monopoly in name, is one in reality. They have established trading-houses on their own account, and, under the severest penalties, prohibited every person from trading with the Indians without a license from the public superintendent. What is this but a monopoly, an exclusive privilege, vested in the Government and the persons licensed? And in what do these licenses differ in effect from the privileges granted by the incorporation of a commercial company?

By the laws establishing post offices and post roads, various offences have been created, and severe punishment directed, affecting those not in the service of the Government; persons have been exempted from serving in the militia and on juries, who, by the laws of the States, are expressly subject to that service; this is a direct interference with the State authorities, yet its constitutionality has never been questioned.

The Constitution empowers Congress "to declare war," but no express authority is given to preserve peace; yet, can it be doubted that the power to effect that object is implied? With a view to it Congress have passed laws making it criminal to set on foot any enterprise against any foreign nation with whom the United States are in a state of amity, or to hunt upon the lands belonging to the Indian tribes.

Congress have power to call out the militia to repel invasions. An invasion, I understand to mean a military force actually in our territory; yet an authority has been given to the President to call forth the militia in case there shall "be imminent danger of invasion," with a view to prevent it.

The last instance which I shall give, showing the extent to which Congress have conceived their powers reached, is the purchase of the public library. I would ask the sticklers for express powers, where they find the authority for this act? Sir, taking a detached view of the subject, it might be said that we have the same right to purchase houses for our accommodation. The act can only be justified by reasonings apparently remote from the object. To us are committed the great concerns of this nation; it is our duty to be well informed upon every subject that comes before us; in order therefore to be able to get all requisite information, we think a library necessary as one of the means. This course of argument at once proves everything for which I contend.

Such, sir, has been the uniform practical construction of the powers confided to this Government by men of every political description. Sir, the principles, upon which the constitutionality of this question rests, have not only been recognised in every shape, but the measure itself has received the sanction of acquiescence, if not of approbation, for twenty years. Although I do not feel precluded from thinking and acting for myself, yet, fallible as I know myself to be, I am induced to have great respect for the acts of eminent men, whose wisdom and patriotism it would be vain in me to pretend to rival. And believing, as I do, that among the greatest evils which attend Republics, are the instability of public councils, and the want of character and consistency in public measures, I feel it a portion of my duty to entertain some veneration for the acts of my predecessors, supported by time; at least so far as not to dissent from them, unless they appear to me palpably improper.

When the bank was incorporated, the people of the United States with one consent acquiesced; not a single murmur was heard; not a single petition was laid upon your table alleging its unconstitutionality and praying its repeal? Was the patriotism of the community then asleep? Were they less sensible then of the necessity of preserving the great charter of their rights free from violation, or less acute in their perception of its infraction than we are now? Was it left for the Argus eyes of the present generation to discover the deadly powers of this hydra; and to their prowess to rise and strangle it? Sir, I should reason differently. Believing that there was as much intelligence, as much vigilance and patriotism, in the country then as there is now, I am inclined to think that had there been real cause of alarm, it would, according to the usual course of things, have been manifested when the subject was new; and when the public attention was immediately directed to it.

Since the establishment of the bank several laws have passed for the punishment of frauds in counterfeiting their notes; one of them under the late Administration. If the incorporation act was unconstitutional, could any person be punished for counterfeiting the notes of the bank? A person accused must be indicted for having made or counterfeited a note or notes purporting to be the act of the president and directors of the bank. If the law is unconstitutional, then in legal construction there are no such persons; and as well might the accused be convicted of forging a note on some fictitious person, as the note of a bank when none such existed. How has it happened that in all the trials which have taken place, this ingenious discovery has never been made? The counsel, always sufficiently vigilant in the cause in which they are engaged, have never pretended to question the legal existence of the bank; involved in the constitutionality of the incorporation act. The courts, composed of the most enlightened men, and of different political parties, sworn to support the Constitution, have consigned the reputations of men to lasting disgrace, and incarcerated them within the confines of loathsome prisons, where they have been suffered to remain for years; when a single breath from the Executive would have released them, which it was his bounden duty to do, had the act been considered as unconstitutional.

Many of the public acts of the Government might be cited to prove the frequent and uniform recognition of the validity of the incorporation; but I will not fatigue the House with mentioning but one other. As recently as the extra session in 1809, you authorized the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund to borrow money from the Bank of the United States on the credit of the Government. If the incorporation is invalid, then there is no corporate capacity in the president and directors, and they have no power to make a contract to loan the money of the stockholders.

The necessity of a bank to carry on the operations of the Government seems to have been admitted by all who have spoken in opposition to the bill on your table. But they have insisted that a bank created by the United States is not necessary, because the State banks will afford us the same conveniences. This admission, in my humble conception, completely surrenders the question. If a bank is necessary, as instrumental to give effect to our fiscal concerns, ought it not to be completely under our direction? Is the instrument to govern the hand that employs it, or the hand the instrument? The State banks are under the control of the State authorities, who may permit them to accommodate us or not, as they please. Can it be seriously conceived that this is the kind of Government the people intended to establish for the great concerns of this Union, which is to be dependent on the States for the execution of its power? It might as well be contended that we have no right to appoint the collectors of our revenue, because those appointed by the States to collect their taxes would answer all the purposes necessary.

But the honorable member from New York (Mr. PORTER) has said that there is nothing new in the doctrine that we should be dependent on the States for the execution of our measures, because the same principle appears on the face of the Constitution, that the agency of the States is requisite in the elections of Senators, Representatives, and Electors. Was this argument even apposite, I should suppose it a correct answer to say, that the intention of those who instituted the Government was to confine the agency of the States to the case expressly stated; and the present not being one of them, our own discretion was alone to be consulted and our means employed. But the argument has no connexion with the subject. We are dependent upon the States and the people for the organization of the Government; but, whenever it is organized, we are dependent upon our own means to give effect to our powers. As well might the honorable member have contended that we are dependent on the sheriffs of Virginia, who hold the elections and make the returns, and without whose agency no representation could exist from that State on this floor.

The argument which admits the necessity of a bank for the purposes of this Government, but which contests our right to create one, because that necessity is supplied by the State institutions, leads to the very extraordinary conclusion, that what is unconstitutional to-day may be constitutional to-morrow. If the States should abolish their banks, or prohibit them from accommodating us, we would have the right to erect them ourselves; but so long as that is not the case we have not the power. Can anything show in a stronger light the untenable position which gentlemen occupy, than the necessity which compels them to advance arguments which will make this Constitution (intended as the strong bond of Union, the same at all times and under all circumstances) a flexible instrument to be contracted or extended; to be feeble or strong, as the caprice of State power may direct? Call this what you will, sir, it is in reality nothing more than the old debilitated, miserable system of the Confederation. That a bank is necessary for the administration of the national finances is not only admitted by the opponents of this bill, but tested and confirmed by the experience of other countries as well as our own. Does the Secretary of the Treasury in his reports on this subject propose to manage our money concerns without the aid of any bank, in the event of a dissolution of the Bank of the United States? Such an idea has not entered into his imagination, or that of any other man who has the most distant pretensions to any practical knowledge on the subject. Sir, it is the instrumentality of the State banks that must and is contemplated to be resorted to in that event; and the Secretary speaks and writes of the subject in that way. That a bank is "absolutely necessary" I will not pretend to say. There is scarcely anything effected by human power where there is a physical impossibility to do it but in one way, or but by a single mean. The necessity of which I speak is this, that it is more convenient, more prompt, more certain, and less expensive than any system that can be substituted, to collect our revenue; to safely keep our money; to pay our debts; to support our Armies and Navies; and in fact, to give effect to every operation in which money is concerned. Sir, even the inconvenience arising from the expense and hazard of transmitting large sums of money to distant parts of the Union, when the military or other concerns of the Government require it, is very considerable; through the agency of the bank it is done without one single cent expense, and without any risk to the United States. The instrumentality of a bank was deemed proper at this time, when the fiscal concerns of this Government were comparatively but very limited. Congress under the Confederation found it necessary to have the aid of such an institution, notwithstanding they had not the power to "lay and collect taxes," and that necessity gave birth to the Bank of North America.

From the principles for which I contend and the uniform practice of the Government, this inference is deducible; that wherever a power is given to do an act or to legislate upon a subject, all the means, whether remote or direct, to accomplish the object in any manner deemed best, accompany the grant. If this be correct, have not Congress the right, under the power to "borrow money," to adopt precautionary measures, so that a capacity to lend may exist, when the necessity to borrow requires it? "To borrow" sums of sufficient magnitude for the exigencies of the Government, in a country where there is very little capital free from employment in the ordinary pursuits of life, may be very difficult, unless the small surplusses scattered through every part can be united. This tendency banking institutions have in an eminent degree. Under the power to "regulate commerce," Congress have cherished and protected those whose labor contributed to its success. Under the power to regulate trade with the Indian tribes, they have furnished all the means to carry on that trade; and why not, under the power to "borrow money," incorporate a bank, which, while it creates the ability on the part of the institution to loan, by uniting the funds of many, may be so modified, as is the bill on your table, as to make it a condition that shall do so, when the necessities of the Government require it?

Sir, of the effects which the dissolution of the Bank of the United States will have on the community, I am perhaps incapable of forming a correct judgment, as I do not profess to have any very extensive practical knowledge of banking. But it appears to me, without resorting to any artificial means, judging only by the rules of common sense, that they must be very serious, and even calamitous. In a society like ours, comparatively yet in its infant state, I presume it cannot be asserted, with the appearance of truth, that there is a greater floating capital, or a greater portion of circulating medium than its necessities require. Withdrawing then from public use fifteen millions of dollars, at least one third of the whole money capital of the United States, (which it matters not whether it is in specie, or paper answering the purposes of specie) must be felt as a very great inconvenience. The products of the country must diminish in price, because their value according to the present standard will be much greater than the amount of money to purchase. One of two things seems to me inevitable, either that a great portion of the domestic produce will be inactive on our hands, or that the whole will sink in value to a level with the amount of money to purchase.

The merchants will more immediately feel the baneful effects of the dissolution of the bank. Their situation is at this time peculiarly embarrassing. Their property to a very large amount has been confiscated, sequestered, or detained for adjudication, in Europe, in consequence of the nefarious measures adopted by foreign Powers against our commerce; and a great portion is lying inactive in their warehouses for the want of a safe market to which to send it. Having failed in receiving their expected means by remittances from abroad, to enable them to comply with their engagements, they require more than ever the accommodation which banks can only afford. Disappointed in that, ruin must stare them in the face, though they may be abundantly solvent; a general if not a universal bankruptcy will ensue, which, while it falls immediately on the mercantile classes, ultimately affects every department of society. For nothing is more obvious (I wish it was better understood) than that the affairs of this community are so closely interwoven that no material injury can be done to any one great national pursuit, without finally affecting every other. From this impending ruin some may fly for shelter to the money capitalists, who reserve their means to prey on the misfortunes and calamities of their country, and borrow at exorbitant premiums; but though this may parry the evil, it is calculated to make it the more certain.

But we are told that the wants of the merchants can and will be supplied by the other banks. It may be so; but reasoning as I must without the aid of the mysterious elements of logic (for they are perfectly so to me) resorted to by those who pretend to practical knowledge, guided only by the rules of common sense, I should come to a different conclusion. I should suppose that in the present difficult and embarrassed state of our commerce, the whole banking capital in the United States is scarcely competent to supply the necessities of the country; that withdrawing more than one third must leave a great deficiency, which will not only have the effect of leaving those, accustomed to be accommodated by the Bank of the United States and its branches, without any accommodation, but tend to diminish the discounts of the other banks. Sir, this result is very obvious. The great capital, large deposits, extensive credit, and circulation of its paper, enabled the Bank of the United States and its branches from time to time, in the usual course of business, to have considerable claims on the other banks, as balances arising from the intercourse between them, which in ordinary times under the influence of an accommodating spirit are either not rigorously exacted, or received in paper. But when the affairs of this institution are to be finally closed, those balances must be paid in specie, and the specie of the other banks will of course diminish; they must then either curtail their discounts, or hazard their credit by leaving a surplus of paper in circulation beyond the usual means to redeem it; even the suspicion of which prudent and experienced men will never encounter.

Against the Bank of the United States prejudices have been excited and clamors raised in every shape and in every tone. It has been said to be a deadly viper lodged in our bosom, which at some time, if suffered to live, will sting us to the heart; fancy has converted it into a political engine which will subvert our liberties; an association of men who will prostrate our Government. Sir, had I nothing to direct but my imagination, I might perhaps be drawn into this vortex of terror; but there is a much safer guide at hand. These dreadful apprehensions have already been exposed, by the honorable member from Kentucky (Mr. McKee) who so eloquently the other day referred to the experience of the country as a conclusive answer. It is the best test of the effect of an institution. I would not give one single year's experience for all the speculations of all the philosophers and politicians that ever existed; by its salutary precepts let the present question be judged. It will be seen that this pretended viper is a harmless animal; that our liberties and our Government have been preserved, and our prosperity has increased amidst the operations of this fancied dreadful engine. Sir, it will be further seen that the bank, with all its influence in favor of the men formerly in power, could not avert the change which took place in the public councils of this country. After all this, let me ask every rational man what danger is to be apprehended from their opposition to the Government, when their aid and their friendship produced so little effect? The fact is, that practically the bank must always be friendly to the Government, whatever may be the abstract opinions of the individuals composing the stockholders.

Some of the arguments (or rather assertions) which have been uttered on this floor, are strangely inconsistent. At one time it is said that the capital of this bank is mostly the property of foreign stockholders, who thus have improper influence in this country, which ought to be destroyed by putting down the bank. When it is stated by the friends of this bill that it will be a great public inconvenience that upwards of seven millions of dollars in specie should be taken out of the country so suddenly, the same gentlemen tell us that that will not be the case, for that the foreign stockholders will vest their money in other banks in the United States. Is this the way by which we are to get clear of foreign influence, by driving it from its present confined situation, that it may be infused into every concern in this country, and corrupt every part of the body politic? Foreign stockholders either have undue and improper influence injurious to our welfare, or they have not. If not, why this clamor, unsupported by any real danger? If they have, is it not augmenting the evil by extending the circle of its operations?

So much has been said about the improper influence which foreigners have in our country on account of their being stockholders of this bank, that it merits a more minute inquiry; directed not by prejudice, but by common sense, and governed not by assertion but by fact. On looking into the act incorporating the bank, I discover that no person but a citizen of the United States can be a director; that foreign stockholders have no right to vote, either in person or by proxy, for directors. Now, I would ask, without any of those privileges, how is this foreign influence put in motion? Through what channel is it communicated? Sir, the influence is the other way, if any. These men have their interest committed to the care and control of our Government and our citizens, and so long as men feel an affection for their interest, so long something like influence arising from this circumstance may be expected.

The mere employment of foreign capital, instead of being an injury, is a real benefit to the country. It implies a want of a domestic capital coextensive with our necessities, as it is one of the first axioms in political economy, that sufficiently extensive domestic means will exclude the employment of foreign; and, therefore, the existence of a foreign, is proof of the deficiency of the domestic capital. If this idea is correct, the beneficial effects are alone apparent. The foreign capitalist lends us his money, for which he draws eight per cent. as a dividend, which yields us twelve or fifteen; and the tendency it has to promote the wealth of the nation may be exemplified by supposing the case of an individual, who borrows money at six per cent., which, by applying its use to proper objects, yields him twelve. It would make no difference to such an individual whether the person loaning was a foreigner or a citizen; he had furnished the means which made him rich, while without them he might have remained poor. So it is with this nation; we have grown wealthy from a comparatively poor state; in this change the employment of foreign capital has had great agency.

It has been alleged against this bank that it confines its selection of directors to one political party, as well as its accommodations. As to the political complexion of those who manage the concerns of this institution, I have no personal knowledge; the fact may be as stated. Without approving of this course, which I by no means do, I conceive that, in all money associations, those interested may safely be trusted to manage "their own affairs in their own way." The statement that the bank confines its benefits to its own party, if true, certainly shows intolerance, and would be with me highly objectionable. But I have great reasons to doubt the fact. I have been told by one of the directors of the office of discount and deposit at Baltimore, that more than one-half of the amount of discounts was granted there to persons of opposite political sentiments from the direction, and as nothing but suspicion and surmise have been offered in support of the imputation, I am induced to believe that, as it respects other places, it is equally unfounded. These things, however, if even true, would have no effect on my vote on the present question; for, if the objections are valid, they affect not the principles of the institution, but its management.

I have detained you longer than I intended. My apology for occupying so much of your time must be found in the great interest which this question is calculated to excite; a question on which I confess my opinion heretofore inclined the other way; it was, however, like many opinions, formed without a thorough investigation of the object.

Permit me, in conclusion, once more to direct your attention to a subject of the first importance, on which I have already made some remarks. I mean the partialities which have been manifested for State rights and State pretensions. This subject has been presented to us in the most lively and interesting colors. To pass the bill on your table has been deprecated as leading to collisions with the State authorities—to discord and civil war. Sir, if we have arrived at that point when it becomes necessary to inquire what will please the States, and what acts they will permit, instead of what is right; then, indeed, are our proceedings (and even is our existence) a miserable mockery. If we cannot be permitted to think for ourselves, it is much better to close our doors and go home. If we cannot act independently, but only in the character of humble instruments, to register the will of others, let us not act at all. I conceive it a duty equally imperious, from which I have taken a solemn oath not to depart, to oppose the encroachments of the States, as I do not wish to encroach on them. It is as essential that we should exercise the powers confided to us, uninfluenced by them, as it is that they should exercise those reserved to them, without being influenced by us.

If it is seriously wished that this Government and this Union should be preserved, it is time that the spirit of encroachment and control assumed by some of the States should be discouraged. If it is suffered to gain strength by our compliance or acquiescence, it will ultimately subvert that liberty and independence purchased by the blood of our best patriots. Here is, indeed, a viper, much more deadly than the one fancied by the honorable member from New York, (Mr. PORTER,) which, if you do not expel it from your bosom, will surely sting you to the heart—sting you to death. The experience of the two or three last years sanctions the apprehension that the seeds of disunion will be sown by the State authorities. There is no well-grounded fear that any encroachments by us on the States can ever be successful; they have many means to resist them; they who administer the State governments are comparatively numerous and dispersed through every part of the community; hence, they will always be able to collect to themselves and to their measures a greater portion of popularity than we have in our power. The distance of many parts from the operations of this Government, and the nature of our powers, create jealousy. If to these causes are added fear and imbecility on our part, the bonds which unite us must become every day more enfeebled, until this Union shall be destroyed. A Union in which is involved everything dear to freemen, and which I had fondly hoped would endure to the end of time.

The House adjourned without taking a question on the motion.

WEDNESDAY, January 23.

Another member, to wit: from Virginia, JOHN RANDOLPH, appeared, and took his seat.

Mr. EPPES, from the Committee of Ways and Means, presented a bill to amend an act, entitled "An act to regulate and fix the compensation of clerks, and to regulate the laying out certain public roads, and for other purposes;" which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

Mr. MORROW, from the Committee on the Public Lands, made a report on the memorial of the Legislature of the Indiana Territory, referred on the seventh instant; which was read, and the resolution therein contained concurred in by the House, as follows:

Resolved, That provision ought to be made, by law, for the sale of four quarter sections of land in the Indiana Territory to the Commissioners appointed to fix the permanent seat of Government therefor, in trust, for the use of the said Territory, at the same price for which other public lands are sold.

Ordered, That the Committee on the Public Lands do prepare and bring in a bill pursuant to the said resolution.

Mr. MORROW, from the same committee, also made a report on another petition of the Legislature of the Indiana Territory, referred on the twenty-first instant; which was read, and the resolution therein contained concurred in by the House, as follows:

Resolved, That the prayer of the petitioners ought not to be granted.

On motion of Mr. McKEE,

Ordered, That the memorial of William Lambert, of Virginia, presented the twenty-seventh of December, 1809, be referred to a select committee.

Messrs. McKEE, GARDENIER, TURNER, MITCHILL, and QUINCY, were appointed the said committee.

Mr. ROOT, from the Committee of Claims, presented a bill for the relief of Lieutenant Colonel William Dent Beale; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Friday next.

Mr. McKIM also presented a petition of sundry mechanics, manufacturers, and traders, of Baltimore, praying the renewal of the United States' Bank charter; which was ordered to lie on the table.

The bill from the Senate, entitled "An act concerning the communication, by water, along the Northern confines of the United States, and for other purposes," was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Tuesday next.

The bill from the Senate, entitled "An act to incorporate the Union Bank of Georgetown," was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole on the bill concerning the Bank of Alexandria.

Mr. MITCHILL offered to the House of Representatives the report of the select committee, to whom was referred, on the 19th January, 1811, the memorial of John Bioren, W. John Duane, and R. C. Weightman:

"The memorialists inform Congress that they meditate a new, methodical, and corrected edition of our national law, consisting of, 1. All the public acts now in force. 2. The decisions of the national courts thereon. 3. Treaties and conventions with foreign nations and the Indian tribes. 4. Titles of all the statutes repealed, obsolete, and expired. 5. More explicit marginal notes and references. 6. Particular and general indexes to the laws. 7. A separate index to the matter contained in the notes. The whole to be comprised in five volumes royal octavo.

"For the completion of this arduous undertaking, they propose to employ the best editorial and professional means.

"In considering the present imperfect condition of our statute book, it is pleasing to learn that an improved edition is meditated. By the sale of the volumes, it may be conceived that the publishers will be sufficiently rewarded, in the ordinary way of business. But it is also believed, that it will be expedient to furnish the public offices, at least to a certain extent, with these improved copies. For the purpose of receiving this advantage, and of extending, at the same time, a portion of the public patronage to the undertaking, the committee recommend the adoption of the following resolution:

“Resolved, That the Secretary of State be authorized to subscribe, for and in behalf of the United States, for — copies of Bioren, Duane, and Weightman's edition of the statutes, treaties, and conventions: Provided, The same shall be executed in a correct and faithful manner, and in a form and of a price which he shall approve: and that Congress will, by law, provide for the payment of the same.”

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES.

The House resumed the consideration of the unfinished business. The motion for indefinite postponement still under consideration.

MR. CRAWFORD.—Mr. Speaker, a solemn impression of the duty which I owe to the public, and more particularly to that portion which I more immediately represent, can alone induce me, awkwardly circumstanced as I am from habit, to come forward on the present occasion; or support me under the embarrassment I feel, in presuming for the first time to deliver my sentiments on a question of great national importance before a deliberative assembly. The subject having been already very amply examined, I shall confine my remarks to a very few of the most prominent principles connected with the bill. In so doing, I shall manifest my inclination rather than my ability to perform my duty. Indeed, after the eloquent and conclusive argument of the gentleman from New York, (Mr. PORTER,) on the constitutionality of the bill for the renewal of the charter of the United States' Bank, any farther attempt to elucidate that part of the subject may appear equally unnecessary and impertinent. But as some very partial and indirect attempts have been made to set aside his argument, I request your indulgence, while I endeavor to investigate the positions relied on by his antagonists as a means of palming this counterfeit again upon the nation for twenty years longer. If, in this discussion, I depart from the usual form of addressing you, by giving it somewhat of a colloquial form, I must rely upon the liberality of the House for indulging so unusual a claim upon their attention.

As a Representative of the people, then, I assume what has been called an inclusive power to establish a bank, as incidental to the power granted to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, by the Constitution, in section 8th, article 1st, as incontrovertible. In granting this power, it necessarily follows, that I possess all the means necessary to carry such power into effect. It is left to my discretion to employ the best means which offer for that purpose. This opinion is supported by article seventeenth of the same section, which empowers me to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department thereof. If, therefore, I consider a bank as necessary and proper to carry into effect the power to lay and collect taxes, it thence becomes a power growing out of Constitutional authority, and it is my duty to carry it into execution.

Here I am interrupted by my constituent, who objects, that I have failed in the establishment of my premises, and in proving that a bank is the most suitable means to accomplish the end in view. That many other measures more adequate present themselves to his mind; and if taxes may be collected by safer and better means, banks become, agreeably to your own doctrine, unnecessary, and therefore unconstitutional.

This objection I endeavor to surmount, by alleging that banks, by furnishing money, provide the means of purchasing the fruits of my industry; and thus, by bringing more competitors into the market, I am enabled to dispose of my productions with greater certainty, and at a better price. Hence, I am qualified to comply with the demands of Government, without seriously suffering from the pressure occasioned by such demand. Banks, therefore, affording more convenient means of paying taxes, become necessary and proper to their collection, and are therefore Constitutional.

Here, again, my constituent objects, that those who hold bank paper will not part with it without adequate value, in produce or other property. If it should so happen that there shall be little or no demand for such produce, or property, the paper holder will either refuse to exchange his paper therefor, or reduce the price in proportion to the unsaleable or perishable nature of the commodities offered. Nay, having, by his fictitious representative, nearly banished gold and silver from the market, he may feel disposed to take an undue advantage of this withdrawn competition; and thus farther diminish or destroy the capacity to comply with the public demands. Banks, therefore, afford only a problematical resource on which to rely for the payment of taxes. They are themselves the effect, and not the cause, of increased commercial prosperity. The consumption of, and demand for, the articles produced, furnish the true means of meeting all demands, by the equivalent given for such productions. Bank paper stands, by agreement, as the sign only of such equivalent, and not as the thing signified, and possessed of intrinsic value. The thing signified is, therefore, alone essential to the payment of taxes. This is the result of my labor, or of such articles as that labor has been exchanged for. While there is a demand for the products of my labor, there will be no deficiency of means to pay taxes. If this demand ceases, bank paper will not relieve my distress. Banks afford, therefore, only a conditional, and not an absolute means, to favor the laying and collecting of taxes. They are not the best which offer as necessary and proper, and are, consequently, not Constitutional. This argument may be more strongly enforced by tracing it through its various relations and tendencies. The Constitution prohibits the State Legislatures from making anything save gold or silver a legal tender. Hence you may infer that Congress possesses the power to establish a Bank, and make its paper a legal tender. For, if they possess a power to establish a bank, as a means for the laying and collecting taxes, they must also possess the means of making such bank paper efficient. If they possess a power to make bank paper a legal tender, to support the institution of a bank, they possess likewise the means of enforcing this power. The best means of enforcing this power is a standing army.

Congress, therefore, according to your doctrine, possesses the power, in the last resort, to compel us, at the point of the bayonet, to receive their bank paper, as a legal tender; that they may give facility to the laying and collecting of taxes. Such are the dangerous conclusions to which the admission of such arbitrary doctrines necessarily leads—doctrines, to which, I trust, we will neither of us submit, while life remains. But I will now endeavor to show that you possess no Constitutional authority to enforce such tyrannical doctrines. In article tenth, amendments to the Constitution, the doctrine is expressly laid down, that, “the powers not delegated by the Constitution to the United States, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively or to the people.” But the power to erect banks is no where prohibited, by the Constitution, to the States; it is therefore reserved by it to the States respectively, or to the people. Congress therefore cannot usurp this power over the States, so explicitly and expressly reserved, without a flagrant violation of this (not an interpolation as it has been jesuitically styled, but) integral part of the Constitution. This opinion is confirmed by article ninth, amendments to the Constitution, which declares, that the enumeration in the Constitution of certain rights shall not be construed to deny, or disparage, others retained by the people. But the people have retained the right to establish banks—for all banks not delegated to the people, or prohibited to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people. The States and the people have exercised this right. Their power to do so has never been questioned. Every attempt to exercise this power, on the part of Congress, is an encroachment on this right—is a denial or disparagement thereof; and becomes thence a violation of the Constitution. The States are prohibited from making anything but gold and silver a legal tender. They possess an unquestionable right to erect banks—but they cannot make their paper a legal tender. If Congress possesses the power to create a National Bank, they are not prohibited from making its paper a legal tender. This silence may be construed into a power of giving legality to their paper, by making it a tender. It may thus be exercised so as to construe their right into a denial or disparagement of the rights retained by the people.

If any doubts still remain respecting your want of Constitutional authority to create a National Bank, I will proceed to satisfy you that you are clothed with no such dangerous power.

By the Constitution you are merely the servants of the people, acting under a specific power of delegated trust. You are strictly limited to the powers therein delegated, or to such incidental powers, as are necessary and proper to carry into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or office thereof; that is, you shall possess all the means necessary and proper, provided the powers vested in you by the Constitution cannot be carried into effect without such means; or where your power to use such means is not doubtful or limited. In article fifth of the Constitution we are instructed, that—

“The Congress, whenever two-thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose amendments to the Constitution, or, on the application of the Legislatures of two-thirds of the several States, shall call a convention for proposing amendments, which in either case shall be valid to all intents and purposes, as part of this Constitution, when ratified by three-fourths of the several States, or by conventions in three parts thereof, as the one or the other mode of ratification may be proposed by the Congress, provided that no amendment which may be made prior to the year one thousand eight hundred and eight, shall in any manner affect the first and fourth clauses in the ninth section of the first article, and that no State, without its consent, shall be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate.”

If the States and the people were so extremely cautious and guarded in procuring any amendment to the Constitution, will they calmly witness a sacrilegious infraction of its most sacred principles? Will they permit you, by a constructive power, to create rights which deny or disparage those which they have expressly reserved to themselves? Have they not ordered you, whenever your powers are doubtful, defective or limited, to apply to them for the remedy? Have they not explicitly provided the manner in which such remedy shall be applied? They have not permitted you to cut and carve for yourselves. A power is given to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises. You shall have collectors and excise officers as incidental to their execution; you are to provide the safest depositories for them within your Constitutional reach; you must preserve them under your perpetual control by contract; you will be allowed stationery, store room, and house rent, with every other essential accommodation; but as we have reserved the power of creating banks to the States or to ourselves, you can claim no Constitutional power over them, unless within the district over which we have given you exclusive legislation: and this power you are invested with merely as legislators for that district, and not in your capacity of Representatives of the States respectively, or of the people.

But you conclude that the question of constitutionality is settled by precedent, acquiesced in by all the constituted authorities for twenty years.

Bank of the United States.

H. OF R.

Such a conclusion facts will not justify. It is a most dangerous doctrine; it is an abandonment of the State sovereignties, who have for twenty years practically opposed and denied such doctrine. More than three-fourths of the States have, for a large portion of that period, been in the practice of establishing banks within their respective State sovereignties. If they had divested themselves of this sovereignty, by a delegation of such power to the United States, they would never have dared to exercise such a flagrant usurpation of power. Congress could not, without violating their oaths, have permitted this usurpation of their delegated authorities. Upon all other occasions they have been sufficiently jealous of the encroachment of State authorities. Can it be imagined that they would have witnessed such a daring and dangerous innovation, if such powers had been unequivocally delegated? On a subject of such magnitude, no one can believe such improbable suppositions. But it is all-important to the peace, safety, and happiness of the Union, that this subject be fully and fairly met; that it may be set for ever at rest. It is a subject on which we cannot suppose the Constitution was intentionally silent; provided the power was intended to be given by the States. It is one in the exercise of which collision would most frequently occur. The power would therefore be expressly given, expressly reserved; or, an agreement made to share it mutually. If any such agreement exists, it must, from the necessity of the case, be specific, express, and accurately defined and limited. No such compact exists in the Constitution of the United States. Upon this subject there is therefore only one alternative. The power is either expressly given or reserved. It is of too imperious a nature to be sought for by implication, inclusion, or as an incidental means to carry any other power into effect. It has never been contended that any such power is expressly given by the Constitution. If it had ever been parted with, it was all-important that it should have been parted with expressly. If it has been parted with, it can be shown. If it can be shown, it requires no casuistry to support it. Casuistry may involve and obscure, it can but seldom enlighten its subject.

The sole power given to the United States, to coin money, regulate commerce, or make war, has never been questioned. Upon these subjects no State has ever shown a disposition to interfere, either with the powers, or the means necessary to carry these powers into effect. No similar delegation of power on the subject of banking can be shown. It is therefore expressly reserved. For if it has not been so reserved, the individual States have, most of them, been in the daily usurpation of a power which did not of right belong to them; which of right belonged to another, for nearly twenty years. But if they have been in the exercise of a legitimate authority, then have the United States been exercising a dangerous and arbitrary usurpation of power, never delegated—expressly reserved, and practically denied and opposed by the States, during the whole of that period. Those who advocate the power of the United States over this subject must yield the sovereignty of the individual States. They must show this yielding of sovereignty, otherwise their power is a usurpation. They have not shown any such delegation of sovereignty by the States. They never can show it, in this Constitutional instrument. It is therein expressly reserved. For, "the powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people."

Obligated thus to abandon my Constitutional position, I endeavored to rally my scattered forces, on the extensive field of expediency—I expatiated on the immense advantages resulting from a common circulating medium, the facilities afforded thereby to our fiscal and commercial relations, and the stimulus given to industry by a large foreign capital. My constituent suddenly arrested my progress, by observing, that it appeared idle to consume our time in castle-building, while we possessed neither the power nor the materials, to erect them. For, when the Constitutional authority is denied, no expediency can justify such an assumption of power. Such an assumption would, if acquiesced in, break down all the mounds raised by the people for their protection against the lawless encroachments of power. It would remove those landmarks, set up by them for their guide; and whenever such encroachments would be attempted, expose them a defenceless prey to their enemies. I will, however, offer a few observations on the subject of expediency; and hope to show you that, even on that ground, you are exposed to defeat. As to the fiscal operations of the country, they may be readily and safely conducted through less dangerous channels; by a different modification of means, within Constitutional reach. A large foreign capital is equally susceptible of being injuriously, as of being beneficially employed. We had better remain unemployed, than use means to promote industry which may only place us more completely at the discretion of foreign Powers; by giving them the discretion of, and command over, our industry. It cannot be questioned, that the large foreign capital in our country has been highly instrumental in deluging our country with unnecessary and extravagant articles of foreign growth and manufacture. These foreign gewgaws have nearly destroyed our economical and simple habits, as an agricultural people; and rendered us tributary to those foreign Powers, whose meretricious arts have inveigled us into such prodigal consumption of their commodities. The same funds have been employed to retard our progress in manufacturing for ourselves—lest we should become in reality independent, and disobedient to our task-masters; whose artful policy has nearly banished gold and silver, by the introduction of their fictitious capital, that they might thus disarm our energies—if the expiring embers of personal liberty or national independence should again rekindle, and nerve our arms and animate our hearts against every insidious or per-fidious encroachment upon the dearest rights of freemen.

Again, I endeavored to arrest the glowing progress of my constituent, by directing his attention to the numerous memorials on our table; painting, in fascinating colors, the beneficial operations of this institution on our country, and its Government: and, shading the back ground of the picture in sombre colors, with the ruin which a refusal to re-charter the Bank of the United States must bring down on the devoted heads of our State banks, and our commercial cities—and which threatens to extend its desolations to every description of our citizens.

What, my friend! exclaimed my constituent, have these basilisks so fascinated you, by their legerdemain artifices, as to deprive you of the evidence of your senses? Have you not, from the same description of people, numerous representations which boast a redundant capital? So redundant as to induce them to vest their superfluity of wealth in speculations upon British manufactures, and other articles of British commerce, by anticipated remittances? Is it unreasonable to trace these contradictory statements to the same impure source? May not this redundant wealth consist of national or mercantile deposits, in the National Bank, granted to such special friends as trade in British commodities, to favor their immense importations, and destroy our infant manufactures, that they may shackle our commerce in foreign fetters? May not the fictitious capital of the same institution be employed to coerce American citizens—the friends of American prosperity and independence—into a renewal of their favorite bank charter? To this rational solution of memorials so contradictory in their nature, I could offer no satisfactory reply—I gave up the cause as hopeless, on American ground. As an American citizen, I can never yield my assent to a measure, so apparently pregnant with mischief to the rights and liberties of my constituents. I cannot thus betray the confidence reposed in me as a representative of the American people, or violate the oath which I have taken to support the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. GARLAND said he was sensible of the anxiety of the House on all sides to take this question, and it was with extreme reluctance that he now trespassed on any portion of their time; but, as he should probably on this question give a vote different from that of most of his colleagues and many of his political friends, with whom he had been accustomed to act, he trusted that he should stand excused for the small portion of time that he designed to occupy. In the view, said he, which I intend to take of this subject, it is not my intention to go into a critical examination of the Constitutional ground on which it is conceived this subject rests. I am willing to believe that those who made the Constitution understood it in all its bearings, and the spirit in which it was adopted; and as many of the persons who were members of the Convention were in Congress in 1791, when the charter of the Bank of the United States was granted, I cannot be so uncharitable as to believe that they would have been the first to violate its sacred principles. I am willing to believe that they possessed as much understanding and patriotism as we do, and, therefore, believe that they would not have been the first to violate the sacred principles of that instrument. In this opinion I am strongly supported by the conduct of the different States, the most of whom have passed laws for punishing, and have consigned to imprisonment the counterfeiters of the notes of this bank. I presume it will not now be contended that all the States have united in carrying into execution an unconstitutional law, and that the United States have, at different times, and under different Administrations, recognised its legality and enforced its principles for nearly twenty years. It does appear to me, Mr. Speaker, that the uniform acquiescence of the country in a measure for such a length of time, should put the Constitutional question at rest, and, for the sake of something like stability in our proceedings, this should be considered as an adjudicated case, in which the law and Constitution seem to have been settled by universal consent. But, Mr. Speaker, I will call your attention for a single moment to the eighth section of the first article of the Constitution of the United States. It will there be found that "Congress shall have power to lay 'and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, to pay the debts and provide for the general welfare of the United States, and to pass all laws 'which are necessary and proper for carrying 'the foregoing powers into execution." I shall attempt to show from this clause in the Constitution that Congress have ample power to pass the bill for extending the charter of the United States' Bank; and this I expect to do, without calling in the aid of the general grant of powers as contained in the Constitution—from which some gentlemen seem to turn with such disgust—and in discussing this point, I shall attempt to reason on things as they now exist. Congress have imposed duties and imposts, which, from their nature, must be collected in the different States. Then, connected with the right of laying is the right of collecting, and with the right of collecting is that of deposit and transmission, in that manner which is best calculated to carry on the fiscal operations of the Government; and the proper inquiry for this House is, How can these objects be best effected? Will not a bank be most desirable, on many accounts, and one, the paper of which shall be well known and well circulated throughout the United States? This bank will receive your money and transmit it to any part of the United States where it may be wanted at the risk and expense of the bank. By this means, the expense of collection will be lessened, and the money transmitted to any part of the United States, so as to enable the Government to pay the debts and provide for the general welfare. In this point of view I consider the bank necessary and proper; and if it be necessary and proper, then the plain language of the Constitution is satisfied, and is not made to depend on being absolutely necessary, as gentlemen seem to argue. And whether this is done by one individual, or by the incorporating of a number of individuals, is not material on the present question, only as it relates to effecting the object, and that will be best effected by the incorporating of a number of individuals, extending their offices of discount and deposit from one end of the United States to the other, all linked together by common interest and duty.

But some gentlemen say that this will be a corporation, and that all corporations are anti-Republican. This is a naked assertion, and is unsupported by any kind of evidence. The propriety of granting acts of incorporation is made to depend on the object to be accomplished thereby; and, to my view, republicanism has nothing to do with the present question. This is only the means necessary to carry into effect one of the specific grants of power contained in the Constitution. But it has often appeared to me that the word "republicanism" is used in this House as a kind of watchword, without any appropriate meaning or application to the subject under consideration, and in this case it seems to be addressed to the feelings of members more than to their judgments. But, sir, will it be said that to collect and transmit the revenue of the United States free of expense is an anti-republican measure? I presume not. Is any man's rights invaded, or are the great principles of equal liberty destroyed? I presume not. Then what can republicanism or anti-republicanism have to do with the present question? It does appear to me that it can have nothing.

But, gentlemen say, they can furnish us with a substitute to carry on the fiscal operations of Government. And what is that? One gentleman tells us to collect the revenue in specie and ship coastwise; and another tells us that the State bank paper will answer all the purposes of the Government, and that the State banks will be safe places of deposit for your revenue. But have not these gentlemen furnished you with strong arguments against both of these plans? They tell you that you need not be under any apprehension of the specie being carried out of the country; that the risk would be so great that no man in his senses would attempt it, and, notwithstanding they recommend it to this House as a course to be pursued by the Government. They also tell you that State banks are not to be trusted; that they carry on a kind of licensed fraud, and issue their notes to a large amount without having any specie in their vaults. If this be true, then, I presume that they would be very improper places for the reception and safe-keeping of the public revenue, and, therefore, should not be resorted to. And this is not the only objection to State banks. Their paper will not circulate generally throughout the United States; there will be a different value stamped upon it in different parts of the country, and it might well be refused by the creditors of the Government. In addition to this, they do not form and keep up that chain of connexion throughout the United States that would enable them to transmit the money to such places as the demands on the Government might require.

Then, Mr. Speaker, if the Bank of the United States shall be put down, (a measure which I consider almost certain,) your revenue will be payable in specie, and nothing else can be received agreeable to the existing laws of the land. And have gentlemen given themselves time to consider where this specie is to come from? Have they reflected that, from the best data on which we can form a calculation, there are less than twenty millions of dollars in actual specie in the United States; a sum not more than sufficient to meet the demand of the Government in one year of commercial prosperity, even if it was in your power to unlock the chest of every miser, and to bring into circulation every cent of actual specie now in the United States? And this, you well know, will not be in your power. And was it in your power to bring into the Treasury of the United States the whole amount of specie now in the country, and in that way were you able to discharge the demands of the Government for one year, what will then be left to give currency to the bank paper as a circulating medium in the country? To give currency to bank paper, it must carry with it a belief, at least, that there is, in the vaults of the bank from which the paper issues, a sufficiency of actual specie to render to you a dollar in specie for every dollar in paper which you return them. But, Mr. Speaker, this impression cannot be made in the present state of things. It will very soon be known that the Treasury of the United States has gathered into its vaults all the actual specie in the country. This being the case, there can be no specie in the vaults of the bank. Of course, the paper will cease to circulate, or, if it circulates at all, it will be at a rate below its nominal value.

But, sir, will those gentlemen who advocate the doctrine that State bank paper shall be receivable in discharge of the revenue tell me who is to make the selection from amongst the banks; whose paper is to be received? Do they mean to throw the responsibility from their own shoulders on the Secretary of the Treasury, and make him individually liable in case the bank should fail? I presume not. This would be an unreasonable responsibility. And if this is not the case, the public revenues will be exposed to great risk, and frequent losses will be the certain consequence. In addition to this objection, if the Secretary of the Treasury is to be left at his own discretion to take such State bank paper as may suit his mere will and pleasure, without any individual liability, do you not at once give him a decided control over all the moneyed institutions of the country, and an influence greater than what is possessed by all the rest of the Government besides, and that at the risk of the loss of the revenues of the United States? I am willing to admit that I have the highest confidence in the integrity and talents of the present Secretary of the Treasury, but we do not know how long he may hold that office, and we know not who may be his successor; and if there was a certainty that he would continue to administer the fiscal concerns of the Government, still, I contend that it would be unwise and unsafe to place so much power and influence in the hands of any officer of the Government that is so far removed from the people, and to whom he feels no kind of responsibility.

But, sir, if the Government refuses to receive State bank paper, as I presume they will, then it must depreciate, and will no longer be a circulating medium in the country at its nominal value. We shall then witness the strange phenomenon of a country, with an export trade worth upwards of seventy millions of dollars annually, without one single cent in circulation that will be a tender in the payment of debts or receivable in the purchase of produce at its nominal value. How far this will comport with the interest of this nation is for those to determine who preside over its concerns. It has always been my opinion that the true interest of a nation consisted in her having a circulating medium at least equal to her export trade and one year's revenue; and, if she did not possess that in actual specie, it should be the wisdom of Government to create an artificial capital equal to those objects—and that it should be so secured as to possess the confidence of the nation. Without this circulating medium, the spirit of industry will be checked, agriculture will no longer flourish, and a universal stoppage of payment must take place. I hope gentlemen will at least take time to reflect before they draw down on their country those direful evils, and will not suffer their minds to be occupied too much by party feelings, which in my opinion have nothing to do with the present question. But some gentlemen seem prepared to denounce every man who does not give his negative to the bill under consideration. Sir, considerations of this kind will have but little weight with me. I know no party but the people; I know no interest but the public welfare; and I shall, on this and all other questions, which are presented for my decision, give such a vote as in my judgment is best calculated to promote these great objects; and if I err, I shall have the consolation that I have independently exercised my best understanding and that I have not been the blind follower of any political party.

But, Mr. Speaker, I will take gentlemen on their own ground for a moment, and see how this measure will operate. They say that the State banks will go on to issue their paper and it will continue to circulate as usual; but, sir, let it be recollected that by the dissolution of the charter of the Bank of the United States, about seventeen millions of dollars are at once taken out of circulation, which is equal to one-fifth of all the floating capital of the United States. Then, independent of the individual distress which this must produce, it will reduce the value of all produce and property in market in the proportion that the sum taken out of circulation bears to the whole sum now in circulation. I presume that such a state of things cannot be desirable; for although you may by your measures reduce the price of tobacco, flour, hemp, &c., still you will not be able to procure a bushel of salt or a pound of sugar for less than what it is now selling for. But my honorable colleague (Mr. BORWELL) seems to think that this would be very desirable. He says it would reduce the price of labor, and in that way the farmer and planter would be forced to abandon his agricultural pursuits, and become a laborer in some manufacturing institution, at low wages, and thereby enable the manufacturer of this country to undersell the manufacturer of Europe. To my mind this appears to be a wild theory, at war with the best interest of the country. I consider agriculture as the fountain of wealth in this country, and commerce and manufactures as the handmaids, and I never can consent to the depression of the former for the benefit of the latter. It would be with extreme regret that I should see the independent cultivators of the soil obliged to abandon their farms and take up their residence in a workshop, and become the dependants of some lordly tyrant, instead of being the independent cultivators of the earth. In addition to this, I have always considered the agriculturist as the best citizen; as entertaining more rational ideas of liberty, and being more strongly attached to the independence of his country; and it is on agriculture that we must rely for wealth in time of war, and it therefore has a primary claim on the patronage of Government.

The gentleman from New York (Mr. PORTER) has told us that, inasmuch as the friends of the bill under consideration have relied on different parts of the Constitution, therefore no one part gives us the power. The singularity of this idea is manifested to the weakest capacity, and the fair deductions very apparent; I presume, that if the measure can be supported and justified under different views of the Constitution, it proves that the measure is abundantly justified on Constitutional grounds, and that it is in unison with the general principles of the instrument. And shall we be told, because it has the support of many parts of the Constitution, it is weaker than if it had only one? To exemplify my idea, suppose a proposition in arithmetic that by many modes of calculating you could arrive at the same result, would it be said that this was less true than where you could only come at the result in one particular way? I presume not. But Mr. Speaker, if any measure could derive strength from the inconsistency of its advocates or opponents, then, sir, I am persuaded that the opponents to the bill have done as much in its favor as its friends have. I beg you, sir, to recollect the different grounds on which the opposition have relied. Some gentlemen are opposed on Constitutional grounds; some gentlemen are opposed because they are afraid the bank will coalesce with the Government and overturn the liberty of the people; others are opposed because the bank is hostile to the Government; others are opposed because they want a National Bank; and others are opposed because a part of the capital stock is owned by foreigners; and here they attempt to awaken all the angry feelings of the nation against the use of foreign capital, while they carefully keep out of view the fact, that a Republican Administration sold to foreigners all the capital which they had in this bank; and thus, by uniting all those heterogeneous objections, a majority is formed in this House opposed to the passage of the bill. But, sir, I do not expect to derive any aid from these incoherent objections as giving any support to the bill; for, from the zeal that gentlemen have shown in their opposition to this bill, it was to be expected that they would touch every string that was likely to sound in unison with the feelings of any part of this House. Mr. Speaker, I shall pass over many of the minor objections that are made to the passage of the bill now under consideration, and come to the conclusions of the opponents of the measure. They are obliged to admit that the establishment of such a bank as is contemplated by the bill under consideration would be convenient and would aid the fiscal operations of the Government, and say that if it was the only way in which the finances of the country could be administered, then it would be justifiable. And here, in my opinion, the gentlemen give up the Constitutional ground; for, if the measure be necessary and proper to carry into execution any of the specific grants of power contained in the Constitution, then the plain language and meaning of that instrument is satisfied, and is not made to depend upon the question whether there is no other way in which it can be done.

I have endeavored, Mr. Speaker, to examine this subject with candor, and prepare my mind to decide, on it without taking into view the ruin of thousands, that must be the certain consequence of withdrawing from circulation at one time so much of the floating capital of the country. And it does appear to me, in every point of view in which I have been able to examine it, that at this time to break in upon the established order of things, under which the United States have progressed in wealth and prosperity unexampled in any preceding twenty years, would be, to say the least of it, a dangerous experiment.

Mr. NICHOLSON.—Mr. Speaker: As I shall vote against an indefinite postponement of this bill, because I shall vote for the entire bill, when rendered as little liable to objections as possible; and as this vote will probably stand at variance with many of those for whose opinions I entertain a high respect, I deem it essential, as well for my justification as for the information of others, to state the reasons upon which my vote is to be given.

The system of banking being an improvement upon the moneyed system, by which commerce, or the exchange of commodities, is carried on, and therefore still more complex in its operations, and more difficult to be understood, has excited the approbation of some, while it has equally excited the prejudices of others. Those, however, who have been best acquainted with its operations, when properly regulated, have, in all countries, united in a general expression of a conviction of its utility, not only as it respects personal convenience, but also as it regards the facility with which the financial affairs of nations can, with its aid, be conducted.

As this subject has become quite interesting, it becomes the duty of every one to assist in an endeavor to throw all possible light on the subject, not only as to the constitutionality of this Government legislating upon it, but also as it regards its operations and effects; in order that we may have as clear a view of the whole ground as possible, and thereby be better enabled to judge with more certainty of the merits or demerits of the bill now under consideration. I shall therefore endeavor to explain my views of the subject as concisely as possible; and if I shall, in any respect, be found groping in the dark, in the remarks which I shall offer, I trust that an ordinary degree of candor will be sufficient to shield me from the imputation of sinister design. First, then, as to its constitutionality.

Perhaps, sir, the doubts entertained by some, of the constitutionality of this bill, arise from an extreme, and, as I conceive, unfounded jealousy, that this Government is calculated gradually to usurp the powers of the State Governments. This jealousy is a foible with many well meaning legislators; I however respect it, as I am sensible that it arises from a good motive; and I believe that if it be kept within reasonable bounds, it may, at least, be of no disservice in preserving our federative system of government. Probably we in some measure derive this jealousy of the exercise of powers from our ancestors. The Crown, the Peerage, and the Commons, of Great Britain, are three distinct and conflicting interests—the Crown to preserve its prerogatives—the Peerage to preserve their privileges—and the Commons to preserve their rights, if they can. But here, sir, we have neither Crown nor Peerage—we have no interest but the interest of the Commons, or the People. Our General Government, as well as our respective State governments, emanate directly from the people; the people have the same control over each; and why we should be so jealous of the former, and so partial to the latter, seems somewhat difficult to determine.

When our Federal Constitution was adopted, the knowledge of a federative system, upon its present plan, was new, and existed merely in theory. The objects, however, intended to be effected by its adoption, are clearly and distinctly set forth in its preamble. They are “to form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defence, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty,” &c. Yet, in the eighth section of that instrument, which contains an enumeration of certain specific powers, there is not the same clearness and precision. In the first paragraph of that section, powers are given to Congress to provide for the common defence and general welfare of the United States; and these powers, which are necessarily unsusceptible of precise definitions, are coupled with others, in the same paragraph, in such manner as to render their meaning doubtful, especially in the minds of those who entertain a strong partiality for the powers of the State governments. The powers of this Government, which arise from the operation of common law, are still more indefinite, and, in the minds of many, difficult to comprehend. Perhaps, sir, generally speaking, it would not be too much to say, that it must remain for that good sense which is the offspring of experience and mature deliberation, more than to specific definitions of powers as set forth in that instrument, to ascertain precisely what powers the General Government ought to possess, and what the States ought, individually, to retain. In forming that instrument, no doubt, sir, such powers, if not all necessary powers, were intended to be given to this Government, as should be adequate to all the purposes of national sovereignty; that it was not, for want of these essentials, to hobble on crutches through an imperfect state of existence to premature decay; in short, that it, being like the State governments, an emanation from the people, should be so far self-existent as to depend for its support on that power only, the collected power of the people, which first ushered it into existence. In the federative system, which I esteem the perfection of the science of government, the rule to be observed in the distribution of its powers, between the Confederate States and the Federal head, is, as I conceive, simple and plain. It is this: Can any particular power, which is about to be vested somewhere, be exercised in local and separate districts or States, consistently with the safety and good of the whole? If it can, it ought of course to be exercised by the respective State governments. All other powers, which cannot be thus confided, consistently with the safety and good of the whole, ought to belong to the General Government.

According to this rule, it will be seen that the powers which belong to the States are much the most numerous, and by far the most important in securing the rights and privileges of the citizen.

I am not contending that the Federal Constitution is exactly conformable to this rule; but it does not, however, essentially vary from it. There are, as I conceive, two or three additional powers which ought to be incorporated in that instrument, to wit, the powers to provide for a general system of education, and to make canals and roads; and it contains at least one power, the "power to establish an uniform system of bankruptcy," which, as experience has evinced, ought to belong to the States. But, sir, the power now under consideration, the establishment of a banking system, I am fully convinced is improperly and strictly within the limits and meaning of the Constitution, and I think I can clearly and plainly show that it is so.

In the eighth section of the second article of that instrument, are contained most of the enumerated powers which are granted to Congress; and the last there enumerated is the power to make all such laws as are "necessary and proper to carry the foregoing powers, and all others contained in the Constitution, into operation." Among those enumerated powers are to be found, powers to raise revenue, to borrow money, to regulate commerce, and to provide for the general welfare. Now, sir, such a bank as is about to be made or re-established, by the operation of the bill before us, is, in my mind, a "necessary" thing, to enable this Government to carry each of the foregoing powers into effect. I lay particular stress upon the word "necessary," because gentlemen who oppose this bill have rested much of their arguments upon it.

It is "necessary" for raising revenue.

There is generally a profit of about three or four per cent. derived to the owners of bank capital, beyond what they could obtain for the use of their money, by lending it out at legal interest. This being a benefit, which can only be secured to them through the interference and protection of Government, it is but just that they should pay the Government something in return for the favor thus conferred; and the bill before us contains a provision to this effect. Twelve hundred and fifty thousand dollars is the sum contemplated as the least which ought to be accepted by Government, for a mere renewal of the charter, with its present capital, for the ensuing twenty years. By passing this law, therefore, we shall derive to the Government that amount of revenue, which in these times, is, in my mind, no contemptible thing. If the capital of the bank be eventually enlarged to thirty millions, we shall derive at least four millions of revenue from it, in addition to some interest which will at times become due on deposits which may be made in the bank. Thus the passage of this bill becomes a means of raising revenue.

It is "necessary" for the purpose of borrowing money.

Governments, like individuals, in unforeseen emergencies, must frequently experience very pressing occasions for more money than they have at command, and, to supply this deficiency, must resort to borrowing of others. A prudent Government, therefore, like a prudent individual, ought to have the means of borrowing made as certain as possible, in order to avoid the derangement or distress which may ensue, in consequence of being unable suddenly to procure a loan. The passing of this bill goes to effect this desirable object, as it contains a provision for borrowing, with certainty, as large a sum as this Government will probably at any time suddenly stand in need of. It is, therefore, in that point of view, very "necessary," and, in all ordinary cases, a great convenience, for the purpose of enabling this Government to borrow money.

It is "necessary" for the purpose of regulating commerce.

A very essential regulation in commercial affairs, is, to have that which serves as the representative of all the articles, which are the subjects of commerce, as small, light, and portable, as possible. To travel any distance, and carry with you twenty or thirty thousand dollars, of silver money especially, is extremely inconvenient;

JANUARY, 1811.

Bank of the United States.

H. OF R.

but, if you can carry something in your pocket, something which represents this sum, the inconvenience is at once removed. Yet, this representative must be such as will be received as such in every part of the country, or else it fails of producing most of its beneficial effects. A man residing in New England has occasion to go to Natchez to purchase $20,000 worth of cotton; but the bank bills of his own State will not pass there; to carry hard money is incurring a great risk, and, at the same time, expensive in transportation; hence, it becomes "necessary" to provide a representative of hard money, which will be received as such in every part of the country; and that can only be done by the establishment of a bank, whose bills will have this general currency. Thus, the passage of this bill, or something similar, is "necessary" for the purpose of regulating commerce.

It is "necessary" for the purpose of promoting the general welfare.

This expression is certainly very broad, and seems, at first view, to include a good deal. For this reason, many well-meaning politicians have been startled at the idea of a delegation of powers so indefinite, and so comprehensive. I imagine, however, that the expression is not pregnant with any mischief or danger. It certainly would not be "promoting the general welfare" to place any power in the hands of this Government, which could as safely, and as consistently with the good of the whole, be exercised by the respective States. It would be upsetting the first and leading principle of a confederated Republican Government. If we, therefore, invariably adhere to this leading principle, we shall find the expression not only harmless, but very proper to be placed in the Constitution. What I have already said of this bill being necessary for the purpose of raising revenue, for borrowing money, and for regulating commerce, is perhaps all that is necessary to be said to show that it tends "to promote the general welfare," because, in this case, the one is necessarily included in the others.

Permit me now further to add, sir, that this bank and its branches, are also essentially "necessary" for the collection of your revenue, for its safe-keeping, and for the purpose of transmitting it from one part of the Union to another, as occasion may frequently require.

We are, indeed, told, sir, that our revenue can as well be collected by, and deposited in, the State banks. What! all the revenue collected in any one State to be deposited in one State bank? No, we are told, we will put five or six hundred thousand dollars in one bank, as much more in another, and so on, until we get it all stowed away in some way or other. Indeed! What an admirable plan! And which banks will you select for this purpose? Will not the selection of one excite the envy and opposition of others, so as to induce them to unite in endeavors, and perhaps successfully, to ruin such selected bank? Will these selected banks pay the United States as large a sum as is contemplated in this bill, for the privilege of having the revenue deposited in their vaults? No; they contemplate nothing of the kind. It would be a bribe, we are told, sir! Besides, it is even said by some, that three or four million dollars is but a paltry sum, unworthy the notice of this Government! Can you contrive any method to compel the directors of such selected banks to render you, at stated times, a true statement of their situation—of their discounts—of the sums due them—of their deposits, in order that you may be convinced that it is safe to trust so much money with them? No. Suppose you want to borrow money—how will you manage matters then? Why, we will borrow a hundred thousand dollars of one bank, a like sum of another, just as a needy man borrows one dollar of one man, two dollars of another, and so on, until his wants are satisfied. Better still—this is really excellent! Well, suppose you wish and have made out to borrow as much, as you have to send the money to a different and perhaps distant quarter of the Union, are you certain you can make it pass current there? Will not those banks, which have not been so fortunate as to have received a share of Governmental favors, take measures for counteracting any such currency? And would it be just to pay off a poor old soldier his hard-earned pittance, in bills on which he would probably be obliged to make a discount of five, ten, or perhaps twenty per cent. before he could get them off his hands?

Gentlemen, sir, who oppose this bill, have got into a dilemma, in opposing it on the ground that the State banks can be made to answer the purposes of this Government, as they thereby virtually admit that banks of some kind are "necessary" in managing its concerns. The point of difference, then, becomes resolved into this: what sort of banks are necessary? We all understand that the stockholders of State banks would be glad of a slice of "the loaves and fishes." My neighbor, who keeps a horse to let, might say to me, it is not "necessary" that you should keep a horse, for I keep one which I should be glad to have you make use of. In such case, the arrangement of my neighbor would be so manifest that all would commend me in telling him that his horse was but a sorry animal, which he might keep to himself; and that I knew best what kind of horse suited my purpose. Sir, State banks are the creatures of States; this Government cannot control them, and therefore ought to have no concern with them. If, however, particular States will be so arrogant as to insist that this Government shall make use of their creatures, why can they not, on the same principle, go a little further, and say to this Government, "here is a collector, a district judge, or a district attorney, which we have created, ready to your hands; it is not 'necessary,' therefore, that you should create these officers within our jurisdiction, because those which we have created will fully answer your purpose." We are not quite ripe for this mode of doing business, sir, but I believe we are in a fair way for its accomplishment.

I perfectly understand, sir, that this preposterous plan of substituting State banks has been suggested, and, in some measure, urged, through the influence of some of those banks. I see runners out from different quarters, endeavoring to convert people to this new doctrine. I see presses prostituted to the purpose of endeavoring to raise a popular ferment against the passage of this bill, or any other of a similar nature; but that any disinterested man can seriously think that this miserable quackery, with which it is proposed to administer to the wants of the body politic, is really worth a moment's attention, is more than I am willing to believe. Should it, however, prove true that a measure which, during the last session, could have been carried by a majority of nearly thirty, shall now be lost, although I shall deplore that instability of opinion which shall have produced this sudden change, or that dereliction of independence which should yield to temporary clamors, artificially raised, I shall, nevertheless, console myself with the conviction that time and experience will correct the error, and that the merits of this measure will hereafter be decided upon with more correctness of judgment.

H. OF R.

Bank of the United States.

But, sir, I have thus far merely shown that this bank, or some other of a similar nature, is "necessary," in several distinct points of view, to the purposes for which this Government was established. I have not however shown, nor can I show, that it is indispensably "necessary." But here, sir, lies the error of those who have contended against the constitutionality of the measure. It will be recollected, sir, that when this bank was first established, those who opposed it on Constitutional grounds, (and for their opinions I have the highest respect,) contended, that although the measure might be useful, fit, and expedient, yet if it was not indispensably "necessary," it must of course be unconstitutional. Let any one examine the debates of that time, and they will perceive that this was the strong ground of opposition that was then taken, and the same ground is now taken, but to this I reply—

If the words of the Constitution were, that "Congress shall have power to make all such laws only as are indispensably necessary to carry the foregoing powers into effect," then, indeed, the opponents of this bill would, on Constitutional grounds, be correct; because, that although the Bank of the United States, or a National Bank, if you please, may be a "necessary" appendage to this Government, still are neither of them indispensably "necessary"—this Government can do without them in the same manner that a farmer can do without a hoe, by substituting a spade, or that a carpenter can do without a plane, by substituting his broadaxe.

The word "necessary" is of the class of adjectives, and admits, though irregularly, of the degrees of comparison incident to words composing that part of speech—the positive, necessary—the comparative, more necessary—and the superlative, indispensably necessary. We mean by the first, needful, fit, or proper; by the second, more needful, fit, or proper; and by the third, that which we cannot do without. If the words of the Constitution were, "Congress shall have power to make all laws which shall be needful, fit, and proper, for the purpose of carrying the foregoing powers into effect," the difficulty would probably vanish at once; as I trust we could soon determine whether a Bank of the United States or a National Bank, is a needful, fit, and proper appendage to this Government. But, sir, we have first given to a harmless expression a most formidable meaning; we have made the word necessary mean indispensably necessary. And, having thus raised a mountain out of a molehill, we are now about to resolve, very wisely, no doubt, that we cannot get over the mountain.

If I were to agree to provide a farmer with such tools and implements as are necessary for carrying on the business of farming, I should suppose that I was bound to provide all such tools and implements as are commonly used in that business. I could not say to him, here is a sled, which must answer the treble purpose of sled, cart, and wagon; or here is a spade, which must answer both for digging and hoeing. I could not avoid my engagement by telling him, the cart, the wagon, and the hoe, were not indispensably necessary; because he could make the sled answer the place of the two former, and the spade the place of the latter. No, sir, this would not be complying with the terms of my engagement. Now, sir, it is a poor rule that ought not to work both ways alike. The people of the United States have granted to Congress certain specified powers, and have further granted the means; that is to say, the necessary tools and implements for carrying those powers into effect. By this grant, then, it becomes proper for us to make use of all or any of the means that are needful, fit, and proper for effecting these purposes; but, sir, we are about to determine that we will not make use of some of them as long as we can possibly do without them; we will reject the cart, and the wagon, because they are not indispensably necessary; we will mount ourselves upon the sled! and thus we will heavily drag along the concerns of this Government.

Sir, in the estimation of some this may be wisdom—it may be patriotism; but, in my estimation, it is neither; it is folly, it is destructive to the best interests of this country.

I shall here further observe, that if we are determined to test the constitutionality of all laws which are passed by Congress, by their being indispensably necessary, we shall find that a great many unconstitutional laws have been passed. During the last session, we passed a law for creating three new officers in the Post Office Department; yet no one will pretend that the passage of this law was indispensably necessary; because that Department had been, and could still have been, conducted without them. Indeed, sir, if you look at your statute books you will see that many laws have been passed that were not indispensably necessary, but were merely needful, fit, and proper. Even this splendid Hall must stand in judgment against you, if such a narrow construction of that part of the Constitution is to prevail; these pillars of costly workmanship which surround us, and the elegant dome which they support, were made in conformity to the laws passed for the purpose. And are they indispensably necessary? Could we not do the business of this nation in a room that should not have cost one-tenth of the money that has been expended on this? Instead of these easy and expensive seats, with which every member is accommodated, could we not sit on such as that on which "the immortal Alfred sat?" Again, sir, laws providing for the erection of light-houses, and for the establishment of a military academy, have been passed by Congress. These laws must spring out of the power, by the Constitution, to "promote the general welfare;" for, to no other power given by the Constitution are they properly referable. Erecting light-houses is not "regulating commerce," properly and strictly speaking; neither is teaching military service to those who are not soldiers, "raising and supporting armies;" but each are means of "promoting the general welfare," by the usefulness of the former to commercial business, and the latter to armies, when they shall have been raised. But are either of these indispensably necessary? Certainly not. But, perhaps, I have said enough on this subject. Believing, as I do, that the General Government ought to possess all such powers as necessarily concern the best interest and good of the whole, and believing, too, that the Constitution, however indefinite it may in some instances be found, was intended to contain a grant of such powers, with the exceptions which I have before mentioned, it must remain for others, and not for me, to gauge and limit it to such narrow constructions as are equally incompatible with the purposes of national sovereignty, and the obvious meaning of words in our mother tongue.

Bank of the United States.

H. OF R.

There can be no doubt, sir, that our written constitutions are of excellent use in designating the form and drawing the outlines of government, in such manner as renders them but little liable to capricious variations. While in this way they serve as durable landmarks to those in power, they will also be of essential benefit to posterity, if they should incline to a degeneracy of political principles, by exciting their emulation, in holding up to view those principles by which their nobler ancestors were governed. Having been the originals, however, in the adoption of written constitutions of government, we have made them quite a hobby-horse, and seem to imagine them adequate to all the purposes of preserving our liberties forever. For myself, I am not quite so strong in this belief. I fear that if we place too much reliance on this specific, without providing some other means for guarding and preserving our liberties, they may depart from us while we are in full possession of our written constitutions. Instead, then, of being over scrupulous about giving to particular expressions in our constitutions a narrower meaning than they obviously import, let us try to investigate the principles by which powers must necessarily be regulated in a free confederated Republic, if regulated as they ought to be; and having ascertained this point, having ascertained what powers necessarily concern the whole united, and what powers may be locally exercised without injury or danger to the whole, we can then easily perceive what ought to be, and what is the real meaning and intent of words in our written constitutions.

And, above all, let us not be terrified by those who, for want of better arguments, appeal to our fears; who tell us of the danger there is in adopting this or that construction, or this or that measure; that if you admit of powers by implication, you open a wide vortex, in which will certainly be swallowed up all the powers of the States; or that if you adopt one measure, you will, therefore, adopt another, and another, until you have absorbed all powers whatever. Sir, this kind of argument, if argument it may be called, has become stale with me—it has no weight on my mind—and for this simple reason, that demonstration, and prophesying, are two very different things. Whatever may have been the case in ancient times, I have always observed in my own day that weak arguments, and a spirit for prophesying, are usually coupled together. In my mind there is more danger that the State Governments may, from the selfish motives or the ambitious views of some, eventually reduce this Government to a mere skeleton of power, than that this is ever essentially to weaken the powers of the States. I trust, however, that the danger of the one absorbing the other is not very great on either side. As all our Governments emanate from the same source, the people, this for national, and the others for local purposes, as long as we retain our present equality of condition, and of rights, and our consequent independence of sentiment, I should suppose that even a sense of convenience alone would always correctly dictate where the different governmental powers ought to be placed. The danger to civil liberty, therefore, lies, not in the formation of our different governments, but in the foundations of civil society. If our descendants should lose sight of those principles of civil liberty which we have learned; or, if the condition of men should become so unequal, as to produce a state of abject dependence of the many upon the few; then, and I trust not till then, will our present civil institutions be in danger of being overturned.

As I proceed I shall here briefly notice an amendment to the Constitution, under which my worthy colleague, (Mr. PORTER,) and an honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. SEYBERT,) have taken refuge, in order to fortify themselves with an argument against the constitutionality of this bill; it is in these words—"The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people."

If gentlemen really imagine that they have discovered anything in this amendment which goes to render the passage of this bill unconstitutional, I shall merely observe, that—

"Optics sharp it needs, I ween,
"To see what is not to be seen."

If anything be absolutely passed from one to another by grant, as in the case before us, the grantor becomes divested of that thing, and it becomes immediately vested in the grantee. All then that is necessary, in the present case, is first to ascertain what powers are granted by the Constitution; for it is very certain that what are not granted are still vested in the grantor. A has granted to B certain things; now, says A to B, if my hat is not included in this grant, the hat shall still be mine. Agreed, says B. This is a very plain case, sir, and how such intelligent gentlemen could think of intrenching themselves behind this amendatory article, which in fact means nothing, is really more than I conceive.

But my worthy colleague, to whom I have just referred, has taken another ground, on which he has attempted to rest much of his argument against the constitutionality of this bill, and which is, therefore, worthy of some notice: that is, that by the Constitution this Government derives no powers by implication. Sir, this appears to me the most absurd doctrine that I have yet heard advanced on this subject. It would be a waste of time to go into lengthy details to show the absurdity of this proposition; but, let me ask that gentleman, wherein could have existed the necessity of those amendments to the Constitution, which are almost wholly restrictive, if it was not admitted that, without these amendments, Congress would have had an uncontrolled power to legislate on the subjects to which they refer? and yet many of these subjects of legislation are not even mentioned in the Constitution. The first of these restrictive amendments is, that "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press; or of the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition Government for a redress of grievances." Now the Constitution is silent on all these subjects; yet, if Congress possess no powers to legislate upon them, where could have existed the necessity of restricting them by this amendment, to certain bounds, if they should at any time deem it proper to make them the subjects of legislation? Again, sir, the Constitution makes provision for the establishment of a judiciary, but says nothing about the system of law, whether the civil or common law, by which the courts, thus established, are to be regulated; how was it then understood that the common law was to be adopted? By implication, undoubtedly.

But, sir, in showing that this Government derives many powers by implication, I am sensible that I am travelling somewhat out of my way. It is sufficient to say, that the power of passing this bill is not derived to this Government by implication; the power accrues by express terms in the Constitution—the power of providing the best means for carrying other governmental powers into effect.

There is one other ground which my worthy colleague has taken, in his endeavor to show the unconstitutionality of this bill, which I also deem worthy of some slight notice: That is, that the constituted powers of this Government are mere delegated powers, not from the sovereign people, but from the States, as States! And how does he prove this strange doctrine? Why, says he, if the States should neglect or refuse to elect the Senators, which compose one branch of this Legislature, this Government would be dissolved. Therefore, this Government depends upon the will of the States for its organization; and, therefore, it is a creature of the States! Really, sir, this is very profound reasoning! Let us just look at the other side of the question, sir, and we shall then be enabled to see what a very convenient method of reasoning this is. I am going to prove, in the same way, the very reverse of this proposition; that is, that the constituted powers of this Government are mere delegations of powers, not from the States, as States, but from the sovereign people. I prove it thus, sir: If the sovereign people should neglect or refuse to elect the representatives, which compose one branch of this Legislature, this Government would be dissolved; therefore, this Government depends upon the will of the people for its organization; and, therefore, it is a creature of the people. In the same way, sir, you can prove that the State governments owe their existence to the will of the returning officers of the different counties; because, if those officers should neglect or refuse to make the returns of the elections, there could be no State legislatures, and thus the State governments would be dissolved. Therefore, a State government depends upon the will of the returning officers; and, therefore, it is a creature of those officers.

Admitting, for argument sake, that we could not go to elections unless our horses would carry us there, we can, in the same manner, prove that all our governments are creatures of those animals; because if our horses should refuse to carry us to the election polls, there could be no elections; if there were no elections, there could be no representatives chosen; and, if none were chosen, there could be no legislatures; and thus the governments would be dissolved. Therefore, all governments would depend upon the will of our horses; and, therefore, they would be mere creatures of those animals.

We are very apt to run a wild-goose chase, sir, when we attempt to demonstrate, by reasoning, facts which are obvious to the senses. Thus, if you would prove that there is heat in fire, don't go to reasoning about it, but put your finger into it, and the fact will be ascertained at once. In the same manner when we want to ascertain whether this Government is a creature of the States, as States, or whether it is a creature of the people, let us just look at the Constitution itself, the text-book, as an honorable gentleman from North Carolina calls it, and there we can ascertain the fact precisely. Its preamble determines the point. The words of that preamble are, "We, the people of the United States," &c. Not "We, the United States, as States," &c.

Bank of the United States.

H. OF R.

But, sir, even if this Government was a creature of the States, as States, what bearing could it have on the question before us? Ought we on that account to give to words in that Constitution a different meaning? Would the words, "Congress shall have power to make all laws which are necessary and proper to carry the foregoing powers into effect," be liable to different interpretations, according as it should be ascertained that this Government is a creature of the States, as States, or of the people? Certainly not.

I have thought proper, thus far, to notice some of the principal grounds on which my worthy colleague has rested his arguments against the constitutionality of this bill, because if these grounds are not tenable, his arguments must fall of course; and thus would be justified the assertion of the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. PICKMAN,) that the whole argument, taken together, is "an ingenious piece of sophistry." It is so, indeed, and it is nothing more. Another inducement which I have had for this is, to enable myself with propriety, and at the same time with pleasure, to observe, that the grounds taken by my colleague have been the principal reliance of the opponents of this bill; as many gentlemen on that side have, probably with a very becoming diffidence in the strength of their own views of the subject, pointed to him as one among them whom they seemed to imagine had sustained the argument; a tribute of applause which I think those gentlemen were bound in conscience thus justly to bestow.

Having, as I trust, obviated the Constitutional difficulties which have been urged against the passage of this bill, it remains to say something about its merits; and in doing this, I shall be as concise as possible.

It would be arrogance in me, sir, to go into a lengthy and minute detail of the operations of banking, as it is proper to presume that every member has made himself acquainted with the subject. I might, however, be permitted generally to observe, that from the constant depreciation of gold and silver money for centuries past, and the probability of their still continuing to depreciate, the necessity of a well established banking system becomes every day more and more obvious. Ten thousand dollars, which, in these days, is but a moderate fortune, is nearly a cart-load in silver. Thirty years ago half that sum would purchase as much as the whole will now. Possibly, in the course of a century, a pound weight of gold will not be more valuable than a pound weight of silver is at present. Gold, as a currency, will then have become very cumbersome; and silver, as a currency, will then be scarcely portable. What, then, is to be done? Why put these metals into the vaults of banks, and issue, in paper, that which represents them; or rather, that which jointly represents them and the promissory notes, or other liens on property, which are deposited there. This, sir, is the only remedy of which I can have any conception; and, therefore, it appears to me highly important that the best possible plan of banking should be devised and adopted by this Government.

It has been my opinion, sir, that, instead of the present United States' Bank, a National Bank ought to be established upon a general plan, and be so organized as to invite, and eventually draw into it, much of the other banking capitals, in order that the business of banking might be reduced more to one entire system; that it should not be under the control of Government, but, nevertheless, under their inspection; that, for this purpose, Government should appoint a small proportion of the directors in every branch, and in the mother bank, whose business it should be to render, at proper intervals, stated accounts of its debts, discounts, and deposits, in order that it should always appear that it was properly conducted, and kept within due bounds; and, finally, that Government should share such part of the profits of the establishment as might be deemed reasonable. Proper provisions ought also to be made to prevent its being rendered subservient to political or party purposes, which I imagine would be no very difficult thing.

The principal advantages to be derived from a general system of this kind, in addition to some which I have before mentioned, would be, first, its affording a permanent revenue; secondly, its greater security and stability; and, thirdly, the uniformity of its currency, and the better means of providing against losses by counterfeiting.

I am, however, sensible, sir, of the great difficulty of convincing every one, by whose vote it must pass, of the practicability of any new plan of this kind, however perfect and well matured it might be when offered. I am also sensible of the inconvenience of pulling down one system in order to build up another, and of the distress and ruin of individuals it would occasion if it should be done suddenly. I am, therefore, willing to adopt such plan, as, if not the best, shall be thought by a majority the most expedient at present, and leave to futurity the building up of a different system. I shall, therefore, vote for a mere re-incorporation of the present bank, if nothing better can at present be had; and if anything can be added to it, by way of improvement, so as to render it less exceptionable, I will also vote for that.

Perhaps, sir, it might be as well to re-incorporate the present bank for eight or ten years only, and, in the meantime, be making provision for building up another upon a more approved plan.

I conceive, sir, that the advantages of banking depend much upon the manner in which the system is organized. If properly organized, they are undoubtedly a great national benefit; if badly organized, they become a nuisance to community; and some of the banks which were established in the Eastern States are striking instances to illustrate the truth of this remark. Generally speaking, it may be said, that all petty banks are in danger of becoming such nuisances; because they are but too apt, in the first instance, to be established, and sometimes managed, upon improper, or even dishonest principles. In some instances they have proved mischievous, from the mere ignorance of those by whom they have been managed, of the only true principles on which banks can be safely conducted.

When properly organized, the great and most essential benefit to be derived, consists in the saving of labor, if I may so express myself, in procuring the requisite quantity of gold and silver, to represent all the various articles of wealth in a nation. Suppose, for instance, that a million of inhabitants were to be placed by themselves, without any gold and silver among them, but at the same time with a sufficiency of all the other articles which constitute wealth, they would then require, say five million of dollars for a circulating medium to represent those articles, in order to be enabled to carry on commerce or exchange among themselves; of course five millions worth of their articles of wealth, or, in other words, five millions worth of their labor, must be sent abroad to purchase and bring back this necessary quantity of gold and silver. Now, by the establishment of a banking system, on proper principles, one-half of this hard money would answer their purpose, and thus they would save to themselves two and a half millions worth of their labor, or its products, which they could apply to other purposes.

Now, the territory of the United States will, according to their present ratio of increasing population, in the course of a century, be filled with a hundred million of inhabitants. They will therefore require, say five hundred million of dollars for the necessary circulating medium; at present there is, say forty millions in circulation; of course four hundred and sixty millions worth of the products of their labor must, in the course of a century, go abroad to bring back its value in gold and silver to provide this necessary circulating medium. But if we can establish and perpetuate a safe and durable banking system, only one half of this value in the products of labor need go abroad to bring back the requisite quantity of gold and silver; and thus a gain is, in that time, made to the amount of two hundred and forty millions worth of labor; which would probably be nearly sufficient to make all the canals that may become requisite within our territory. I have made this statement in general terms to show how immensely important it must be to the United States to establish a banking system upon the most durable and best possible plan.

An honorable gentleman from Virginia, on my left, (Mr. BURWELL,) has informed us, if I understood him rightly, that he is, on the whole, opposed to the banking system entirely, because it tends too much to encourage commerce; that we are already too commercial. I am sensible, sir, that, in the Southern States, a prejudice has existed against commerce; and this very prejudice has served to build up a great many houses in our Northern towns, at the expense of the Southern States; because, if those States, particularly Virginia, had exerted themselves in encouraging commerce to be carried on within their own limits, much of the wealth so rapidly acquired in commercial pursuits, which is now to be found in those towns, might have been amassed in those States. But does that honorable gentleman really believe that, by pulling down this bank, there will be less banking business done in the United States? No, sir, the capital that is now employed in this bank will soon find its way into the State banks. Permit me also to say, sir, that the notion of trying to make ourselves less commercial is idle and visionary—it is the “stuff that dreams are made of.” I admit, sir, that, for the purpose of rendering ourselves less dependent on foreign nations, it might be well to encourage manufactures to a certain degree; but, suppose we should, would we be essentially the less commercial on that account? I trust not. Commerce seems to be congenial to the dispositions of a large portion of our countrymen, and it is vain to attempt to change their habits and pursuits. Indeed, sir, if we will but look at the nations of the world, both of ancient and modern days, we shall find that those who have been most commercial, have ever been the most active, enterprising, intelligent, and free. I consider commerce as one of the great levers by which the world has been raised from darkness into light—from barbarism into civilization and refinement.

An honorable gentleman from Maryland (Mr. McKIM) has given us a statement of the situation of the Bank of the United States, which I will just notice. That gentleman made this bank indebted to somebody, I don't know whom, in the sum of about ten million of dollars.

The gentleman also informed us that he had been a bank director in his time—of course, that he must understand the business.

Presently, however, the worthy, intelligent gentleman began to say something about notes deposited in the bank for discount, to the amount of fifteen million dollars: But these notes, he strenuously contended, were not due to the bank! So much knowledge must, I suppose, have resulted from having been a bank director! I think the gentleman afterward admitted that, if these notes were really due to the bank, it would then, indeed, possess the means of producing a general state of distress, if we should compel it suddenly to wind up its concerns. Exactly so, sir; so far the gentleman was correct.

But, with respect, to the rest of this statement, I shall merely observe that, if a gentleman could make a mistake of fifteen million dollars in half a minute, how far would he probably travel out of the way in half an hour? Why, sir, he would be in danger of becoming one of the antipodes.

Another objection urged against the renewal of the present bank charter is, that a large part of the stockholders are subjects of Great Britain, and that, if we should happen to be at war with that nation, these capitalists would have it in their power to injure the best interests of this country.

JANUARY, 1811.

Bank of the United States.

H. OF R.

On the first impression, it struck me that this might possibly be the case; but, on more mature reflection, I cannot see how this could be done, even if those capitalists were so base, and so regardless of their own interests, as to attempt anything of the kind. They have no direct control over the concerns of the bank; it is managed by directors who are citizens of the United States. If any one can, however, point out any effectual method which could be taken by these capitalists, and which it is even remotely probable would be taken, I will then admit that this may be a greater or less objection, not against the re-incorporation of the bank, but against the policy of suffering European capitalists to hold much property in the bank.

Another objection, which has been urged, is that this bank is under the management of those who are, for the most part, opposed in political sentiment to the present Administration.

If I believed that those who manage the concerns of this bank could wield it as a political engine, as was formerly the case, I should be induced to vote against the bill entirely. But, sir, the fact is, this is not the case at present, nor do I conceive it can ever be the case again. So many State banks have been created, that men of all political descriptions can now be accommodated at one bank, or at another; so that the idea of bestowing bank favors, as a reward for political professions, has been long since abandoned. As the English mastiff has, therefore, lost his teeth, he can no longer bite those who are not of his household—and, knowing this, his fierceness has abated—he has become more civil to strangers, and more fit and willing to be made subservient to the wishes of all.

Sir, there is another string, which is yet necessary to be touched, and I shall touch it but lightly, for it is a tender one: It is the distress and ruin which must ensue upon the vote that is about to be given, if that vote shall, as I believe it will, be against the re-incorporation of this bank, in some shape or other. From this distress, sir, probably all of us will be exempt. The storm will pass over us, and we shall only hear it at a distance; yet the individual on whom it shall most heavily fall, will not, on that account, feel it the less sensibly. When I speak of individuals, I mean to express myself emphatically. There are incorporated individuals whose favorite dwellings may yet, by this vote, be shook to pieces over their heads; but as far as any of these may have been instrumental in producing the present state of things, so far will their labors have obtained their just reward. I hope, however, that none of this description, in my own State, have had any agency in this business. But, sir, for those unincorporated individuals who are to be sacrificed by this measure, I feel some commiseration; because, I have some idea of the feelings that a ruined man must experience, particularly if he has a family to be supported by his exertions. It would be easy, because it would be natural, to draw a picture of this kind of distress; but this is not the only dark side which might be presented—its demoralizing effects ought also to be noticed. By too frequently, and, in this case I may add, wantonly, deranging and prostrating the affairs of individuals, particularly of mercantile men, you naturally encourage in them, from mere motive of self-defence, principles which tend to render them a set of sharpers.

I have heretofore mentioned that there were, at the last session, nearly thirty of a majority for re-incorporating this bank; and among those were two of my honorable colleagues, whom I now find on the other side of the question. It would now seem that there is, probably, a majority against it. How does this happen? I can account for it in part, but not wholly. The Legislatures of some States have undertaken to “instruct” or “request” their several delegations to vote according to their views of the subject. It is generally understood, I believe, sir, that those who may not think proper to listen to this monitory warning, are to be denounced, cast off, and thrown—not into a den of lions—for those animals, though fierce, are somewhat noble in their nature—but into a den with one or two ugly wild beasts—exotics, I believe, sir, who seem to be kept on account of the peculiar facility they possess of besmirching others with their own filth. But, I would ask those who have thus undertaken to instruct and direct members here, how, in God’s name, did they become invested with this controlling power? Were they elected to manage the affairs of this Government? As well might the State delegations to this Government assume to themselves the right of instructing and directing their several State Legislatures how they should act. No dictatorship in this free country, sir! I, for one, protest against it. I hold myself responsible to my constituents only, for the vote I may give on any question; and that vote, which my conscience tells me I ought to give, shall never be controlled by the imposing frowns of any man or set of men whatever.

Sir, if this doctrine is to prevail, that the State delegations are to direct us how we must act, then we shall be in danger of becoming a fallen people. It will go to subvert the purposes for which this Government was established. It will be reducing us to a state which may even prove worse than the old Confederation; for, even under that system of Government, the State Legislatures did not attempt to dictate to Congress, but, on the contrary, Congress used to recommend measures for them to adopt.

My idea, sir, of the best method of getting along with our various concerns, is, for each to mind their own business. I am not so arrogant as to wish to have any control over the opinions or the votes of others; and all that I require in return is, that the same measure of courtesy be dealt out to me.

Sir, I have thought proper, in order to vindicate my own sentiments, and my own independence of feeling, to say thus much. I have little more to say, further than to repeat, that I am opposed to putting down this bank suddenly, and unexpectedly, and in no way whatever, unless it be done gradually, while another, less exceptionable, is rearing up to fill its place. Permit me to add, sir, that it requires much less capacity to pull down than to build up; that I am afraid that some who never can distinguish themselves in the one way, may, in their love of fame, aim at the acquirement of some distinction in the other. I confess I have some little fears on this subject; for I am fully convinced, sir, that if ever this Government shall be prostrated, which God forbid! the work will be accomplished not by Romans, but by the hands of such as those under which Rome sunk and perished.

H. or R.

Bank of the United States.

Mr. TALLMADGE said, although the bill now before the House had undergone a pretty ample discussion, and although he felt almost disqualified from speaking distinctly, from the pressure of a severe cold, yet he could not reconcile it to his sense of duty to permit the question to be taken on the present bill, without submitting a few remarks to the consideration of the House. In doing this, he would endeavor to place the question on its proper basis, divested of any extraneous considerations, by the admission of which some gentlemen appeared to have lost sight of the true merits of the question.

Before I proceed to discuss the bill now before the House (said Mr. T.) I take occasion to remark, some gentleman appear to entertain very limited, and, in my judgment, very incorrect ideas of banking institutions. From some observations which I have listened to, I should suppose that a bank was considered nothing better than a broker's office, in which Jews and money brokers meet to prey upon the community. Others have compared the institution to Pandora's box, from which have issued the principal evils which have afflicted this country. Many similar remarks, equally crude and irrelevant, have been submitted by some gentlemen who wish the dissolution of the Bank of the United States. For the information of such gentlemen, I take occasion to remark, that the use of banks by the principal commercial nations in the civilized world, stamps a value upon the institution, too broad and too well attested, to be questioned at this time.

The Bank of the United States, whose corporate existence we are called on to continue, seems to have been instituted principally for two purposes, (viz.) that of discount and deposit. Under the first, loans and facilities are obtained both by the Government and individuals; and by the last, corporate bodies and individuals are enabled to lodge their money, or other precious treasures, in the vaults of the bank, for safe-keeping, to be withdrawn at pleasure.

It will not be a fair course of reasoning to infer, that because some banks have been used for bad purposes, therefore all must be of pernicious tendency. The abuse of any blessing can never be fairly urged against its use. The great multiplication of banks, by the different States in the Union, proves the sense which the public entertain of their utility. The Bank of North America, which was incorporated in the year 1780, served greatly to invigorate public credit, and unquestionably shed a salutary influence on the measures of that eventful epoch in our Revolution. But I will not enlarge on this point, presuming that few can be found within the sound of my voice, who will question the utility of the Bank of the United States.

The remarks which I propose to submit, will be comprised under the two following general heads:

1. Has Congress a Constitutional power to renew the present charter of the Bank of the United States?

2. Is it expedient, at this time, to permit its charter to expire?

That the field of controversy may be narrowed as much as possible, it may not be improper to consider the points in which all agree; and also the most prominent subjects of debate. I therefore consider the three following points as agreed to by the friends as well as the enemies of the present bill.

1. That Congress have the Constitutional power to make all laws necessary to carry into execution the Constitution of the United States.

2. That banks are among the necessary means to enable the Government to carry on its fiscal arrangements.

3. That no positive injustice can be chargeable upon the Government even if it should refuse to renew the charter of the bank, inasmuch as it will expire by its own limitation.

The points in controversy between us, are the three following:

1. The opposers of the bill on your table assert, that, to renew the charter of the Bank of the United States, Congress must assume a power not warranted by the Constitution.

To this doctrine I enter my solemn protest.

2. They further assert that the State banks are competent to answer all the demands of the General Government in their fiscal operations.

This doctrine I can by no means admit.

3. It has also been asserted, that the Bank of the United States originated with a party; that it has been supported by a party; and must now be decided on party principles.

The two first parts of this proposition I deny, but I fear I shall be constrained to submit to the last.

I come now to the consideration of the Constitutional question, and inasmuch as it embraces consequences very momentous, both to the General Government and to our individual citizens, I hope this honorable House will hear me with candor.

The ground taken by the opposers of the present bill rests upon the 10th article of the amendments to the Constitution, which declares that the powers not delegated to Congress are reserved to the States, &c., and hence an inference is drawn that because no express power can be found delegating the authority to grant incorporations, therefore Congress cannot constitutionally exercise such power. The fallacy of this argument may be shown in numberless instances, and from every day's experience in legislation. As a familiar instance, I beg leave to inquire, by what express authority in the Constitution has the Government any power to establish custom-houses, or to appoint officers for the collection of the revenue? And yet the orderly management of the Treasury Department so imperiously demands the exercise of this power, that no doubt has ever been entertained as to its constitutionality.

JANUARY, 1811.

Bank of the United States.

H. OF R.

In defining the powers of Congress, there seems to be a threefold rule given in the Constitution.

1. Positive as to the power granted.
2. Negative on the General Government.
3. Negative on the States.

If gentlemen will turn to the first article of the Constitution, under the 8th section, they will find the powers enumerated which Congress may exercise. Inasmuch as Congress has the power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts and excises, so it is also, provided, "That they may make all laws which may be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers," &c. Here is the basis on which I am willing to rest the argument, that the Legislature of the United States has the right to incorporate a bank for the purpose of collecting, in the most safe and facile manner, the revenues of the country, as well as of disbursing the same with the least expense and inconvenience to the Government, in any part of the United States where the same should be needful. If it should be conceded, that banking institutions are necessary to the convenient and orderly management of our fiscal concerns, (and I flatter myself this will not be contested,) then shall I consider the Constitutional question nearly settled, unless it can be proved that State banks can be a safe substitute for the Bank of the United States. On this point I shall have occasion to remark hereafter.

In the 9th section, under the 1st article of the Constitution, the exercise of certain powers is prohibited to the General Government, but nothing can there be found touching the present question. It must therefore be included in the amendment before quoted, the explanation already given of which I hope may be satisfactory to this House.

In the 10th section of the same article, the States are prohibited from exercising certain powers. Among other things they are not permitted "to coin money; emit bills of credit; make anything but gold and silver a tender in payment of debts," &c. Although I am not disposed, in this place, to contest the right claimed by the several States to incorporate banks ad libitum, yet I have no hesitation in saying that there appears to be a more literal restriction on the State authorities to grant charters to banks, than on the Government of the United States. This construction receives additional confirmation, when it is remembered that, in some States, bank bills have so far been made a legal tender, as to be receivable for State taxes, &c. The inference from these remarks is simply this, that as bank bills are a species of bills of credit, the several States cannot constitutionally authorize their emission; and as they are the best representative of gold and silver, Congress alone has the power under the Constitution to regulate the same.

In the modern rage for putting down former institutions, we seem to arrogate to ourselves more wisdom than our predecessors possessed. In the preamble to the act establishing the Bank of the United States, among other reasons assigned for the passage of the law, it was deemed that such an institution "would be conducive to the successful conducting of the national finances—would tend to give facility to the obtaining of loans for the use of the Government, on sudden emergencies—and would be productive of considerable advantages to trade and industry in general."

If such an institution was necessary for the operation of the Government then, it is not easy to conceive that it can be less useful now; nor can it be comprehended why a measure should be deemed unconstitutional in the year 1811, which in the year 1791 was pronounced by some of the first sages of our country, with WASHINGTON at their head, not only very beneficial to the Government, but strictly Constitutional. This argument derives no inconsiderable weight from the circumstance, that, under all the successive Administrations of our Government, acts have been passed confirmatory of this principle. The law enacted for the punishment of those who should counterfeit the bills issued by this bank, sanctions the original law; and the laws of the different States, to the same effect, prove that they had no scruples on this point. The loans which have been repeatedly made of this bank, under the sanction of law, greatly corroborate the opinion that the charter was not deemed unconstitutional; and I presume most of the gentlemen who now appear so scrupulous about violating the Constitution, actually voted for the passage of the law of the last session, authorizing the bank to loan several millions of dollars to the Government. Now, if the original law was unconstitutional, the charter is void, and all the operations of the bank must have been illegal. On the same principle, every subsequent law relative to that incorporation must have partaken of its original depravity, being equally unconstitutional. In the year 1804, a law was passed authorizing the bank to establish offices of discount and deposit in the Territories of the United States; under which law the bank was established at New Orleans for the accommodation of the Government, and yet no Constitutional objection was made to this measure, although the Sage of Monticello was then President of the United States.

I cannot dismiss this head of my argument without adverting to the use which some gentlemen have made of the terms power and means—confounding them together, as of synonymous signification, in the present question. If Congress possess the power of collecting and disposing of the revenue, its wisdom must devise the best means of effecting the object. In this view of the subject, the creation of a bank must be considered among the means necessary for the "successful conducting of the national finances." My own judgment has long been settled on the Constitutional question, and I cannot but hope that a candid consideration of the views in which I have presented the subject to the House, will induce some gentlemen to hesitate, who may have heretofore been fixed in opposition to this bill.

I come now to the consideration of the second general head which I proposed to discuss, viz: the inexpediency of permitting the present charter to expire. In doing this, I will endeavor briefly to state some of the consequences which will probably result from such a measure.

1. A general distrust of bank credit must be the inevitable consequence. As soon as the bills issued from the Bank of the United States shall cease to circulate, the holders of other bank paper will become suspicious of their ultimate payment, and of course will either refuse to receive them in payment of debts, or will send them to their proper banks to receive specie in exchange for them. As evidence of this, I will state to the House that the mere conjecture that such an event may happen, has already begun the call for gold and silver in exchange for bank bills.

2. Such a measure would be distressing, if not destructive to State banks. To prove the truth of this position, I call on gentlemen to examine the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, in which may be seen the amount of notes on hand, issued by the State banks. If these should be presented for payment, nearly the whole of the specie in their vaults would be drawn out, and perhaps some banks might not be able even to meet the demand. The usual export of dollars from this country, for some years past, and the failure of the accustomed imports, have continued greatly to increase this distress.

3. It would be ruinous to individuals. Perhaps a more inauspicious period than the present could not have been selected for the destruction of this moneyed institution. Our mercantile brethren have more than $20,000,000 locked up at this time in Europe, and unusually large importations of East and West India produce are on hand for exportation. Accommodations must therefore be obtained, or their credit as well as property must be lost. I beg gentlemen to re-examine the Secretary's report, where will be seen the amount of discounts in our principal commercial towns.

I then inquire, Mr. Speaker, whether all the specie in the United States is sufficient to pay up the notes which have been discounted by the Bank of the United States, and which are now on hand? If you should oblige them to wind up their concerns on the 3d of March next, they will be constrained to call in their dues, and as no new loans can be made by this institution after their charter shall expire, so the State banks will be constrained to shorten their discounts, lest their debt should be increased to the Bank of the United States by accommodations to her debtors. In this way the distress will be greatly increased, and the State banks, being crippled in their operation, will be unable to afford the needed relief.

The bills issued by the Bank of the United States, and now in circulation, exceed five millions of dollars. Let this sum be called out of circulation, and the merchant, the farmer, and the mechanic, will sensibly feel its effects.

4. If this charter should expire, I feel persuaded it must be injurious to the operation of the Government. Of the present regular collection of the revenue I will say nothing, but of the distribution of this money I venture to say that no process through the State banks can be so safe or so expeditious. Suppose that the operations of the Government should require the payment of a million of dollars at New Orleans: Through the agency of the United States' Bank this deposit and payment could be promptly made; but how could this be effected by any State bank? From the very nature of those institutions, the bills issued by the State banks must have a limited circulation, and could not possibly answer on such an emergency. But, if the Government should suffer no inconvenience from the State bank emissions, mercantile men and private citizens must feel the embarrassment very severely. In addition to these considerations, will it be safe for the Government to intrust their funds to moneyed institutions over which they not only have no control, but have not even the power to demand a view of the statement of their business? On this point, I flatter myself there can be but one opinion; and, inasmuch as weekly reports are now made to the Secretary of the Treasury, from the Bank of the United States, the safety of trusting the revenue to this institution, rather than to any other, must be very apparent.

5. It is somewhat questionable, in my mind, whether the honor of the Government will be impeachable if the charter of the bank should not be renewed. I have said before, that in point of strict justice, the Government is not bound to re-charter this bank; but, when I recollect that not many years ago the Secretary of the Treasury sold all the bank stock belonging to the United States (being 2,220 shares) to foreigners, at a premium of 45 per cent., I cannot reconcile it to my ideas of honorable conduct to reduce that stock at once to par. By that operation, the Government raised the sum of $1,287,600—making a net profit to the Treasury of $399,600. If the average rate of dividends has been about 8½ per cent. on the nominal capital, it is very manifest that the purchasers of this stock of the Government have not received 6 per cent. on their money, and all the advance paid on the principal must be lost. From the remarks made by some gentlemen, this argument will probably have but little weight; more especially, as the purchasers were Englishmen. But by me the same rule shall be meted out to an Englishman or a Dutchman, to a Frenchman or an American.

Give me leave, Mr. Speaker, in this place to notice a very popular objection to the renewal of this charter, because two-thirds of the stockholders are foreigners. Are not the rights of foreigners in our own country to be protected as well as those of our own citizens? Is it not enough that by the act of incorporation foreigners are not eligible as directors to manage the funds of this institution? I know it has been urged that foreign capital brought into this country is injurious to the community. With this opinion I do not accord, more especially when placed under the direction and control of our own citizens. But, say some gentlemen, in case of war this influence might be injurious to our country. I should believe the very reverse would be the fact. If it be true that where a man's treasure is, there will his heart be also, then surely it might be useful for any country to have the funds of its enemies to use and improve in the case of a war. Not only would this serve to keep the true owners of the property from being active against us, but it would also serve as the sinews of war to aid us in the contest. So long as the moneyed capital of our citizens can be better employed, let not the policy of this Government be directed against the introduction of foreign capital into the United States.

I will conclude my remarks on this subject, Mr. Speaker, by calling the attention of this honorable House to a few statements taken from the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, which has been laid on all our tables. From this it appears that the amount of bills and notes discounted, and now on hand, exceeds fourteen millions of dollars; of which Philadelphia owes about $5,000,000 and New York $4,000,000. If these sums should be demanded, is it possible to find the gold and silver in our country to pay them up? Certainly not. What is then to be done? Either the Bank of the United States must extend the times of payment, or the State banks must afford their aid. It is questionable how far it would be safe for the bank to proceed in the first case, and in the last—it has been shown, that if the State banks should afford the needed accommodation, their own ruin would be sealed. By a report lately made to the Legislature of Pennsylvania, (which I hold in my hand,) it would seem that the amount of all the specie in their State banks, did not much exceed one million of dollars.

What is the state of the specie capital in the city of New York? If pretty correct information may be relied on, all the State banks in that city cannot produce half a million of dollars. It is then utterly impossible, with all the specie in those two large cities, to pay up the demands of the United States' Bank upon the citizens; and if gentlemen suppose that no distress would ensue from so sudden a pressure upon the citizens, they must have data on which to found an opinion with which I am wholly unacquainted.

As a further evidence of the real diminution of specie in our country, I would state that in January, 1810, there was in the vaults of the Bank of the United States, and its branches, $9,051,704, and in December following, there was only $5,482,879—making a diminution in eleven months of $3,568,825. In the same month of January, the State banks owed the Bank of the United States $579,653, and in December following, the sum was increased to $1,546,027. If you add the difference (which is near one million of dollars) to the amount in the vaults of the United States' Bank and its branches in December, the diminution of specie in about eleven months will be found to be about $2,600,000. This alarming diminution of the precious metals ought to have some weight with this House in deciding on the present question, that the pressure may not be increased upon the community.

Notwithstanding my full conviction that it will be highly impolitic, as well as peculiarly distressing to the people of the United States, to reject the bill now before the House, and thereby permit the charter of the bank to expire, yet I must confess I am not without my fears, that such is to be the fate of this institution. It can never be sufficiently deplored, that the feelings of party should have ever influenced the measures of this Government. When this prevails, we must expect that rash and impolitic measures will be adopted. On the present occasion, a leading member in opposition to this bill (Mr. EPPEs) has declared his belief, that the bill now under consideration was purely a party question, and would be decided accordingly. If this is the case, the fate of the bank is fixed; and on this ground alone can I account for that peculiar apathy and unconcern which is exhibited, when the evils to be apprehended from a non-renewal of the charter have been so forcibly exhibited to Congress, in the numerous petitions which have been presented. But when I further reflect, that agents are known to be within these walls, who are already fattening on the prospect that the State banks which they represent are to receive deposits of the Government arising from the collection of the revenue, I fear my feeble attempts to arrest the progress of this desolating spirit will be of no avail.

Mr. GARDENIER spoke against indefinite postponement. At about five o'clock, a motion was made to adjourn, and lost, by yeas and nays—60 to 55.

Several gentlemen rose to speak.

Mr. MACON remonstrated against a night sitting, as a denial to gentlemen of an opportunity of expressing their sentiments, and as derogating, by the confusion always attending such a scene, from the dignity of the House.

Mr. RANDOLPH made a few remarks of the same tenor; reprobated the want of order which appeared to prevail in the House, stated his own unfitness, from fatigue, to undergo a night's sitting; asked of the House, as a favor, that they should adjourn; and concluded by a motion to that effect, which was carried.

Mr. MORROW, from the Committee on the Public Lands, presented a bill providing for the sale of a tract of land lying in the State of Tennessee, and a tract of land in the Indiana Territory; which was twice read, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

Mr. CLAY, from the committee appointed, on the seventeenth instant, on the petition of Arthur St. Clair, made a report thereon; which was read, and referred to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

Mr. CLAY, from the same committee, also made a report on the petition of John Craig, referred on the eighteenth instant; which was read, and referred to the Committee of the Whole last mentioned. The report is as follows:

The committee, to whom was referred the petition of John Craig, have had the same under consideration, and report: That it appears to them that the said petitioner took an early and decided part in the defence of the liberties of his country; that, in 1775, he entered the service of his country, in the Revolutionary army, in which he continued until the close of the war; that he served in different grades, but was, in the month of December, 1778, promoted to the rank of Captain of light dragoons in the Pennsylvania line, which rank he held until the close of the war; and that he was in active service through the whole of the war: when he left the service of his country, his constitution was much impaired and injured; he was without the use of his third finger on the right hand, which was so contracted as to render that hand and arm an encumbrance; notwithstanding, he forebore to apply to his country for relief; but being now bowed down with old age and infirmity, and being poor, and almost helpless, he is compelled to throw himself upon the charity and humanity of his country. The committee deem this one of those hard cases which is not provided for by law; they, nevertheless, are of opinion, that it is one of those cases which will justify a departure from the strict rules of law and practice, and do, therefore, submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the accounting officer at the Treasury be directed to pay Captain John Craig one thousand dollars.

Mr. JENNINGS presented a resolution of the Legislature of the Indiana Territory, instructing him, as the Delegate from that Territory in the Congress of the United States, to use his utmost endeavors to obtain an extension of the right of voting to all citizens thereof of the age of twenty-one years and upwards.—Referred to Mr. RANDOLPH, Mr. JENNINGS, and Mr. GARDENIER.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed two bills, to wit: "An act authorizing the discharge of Nathaniel F. Fosdick from his imprisonment;" and "an act for the relief William Mills;" to which bills they desire the concurrence of this House.

TREASURY REPORT.

A communication was read from the Secretary of the Treasury, made in conformity to a resolution of the House, requiring information as to the directors, the shareholders of the United States' Bank, and the moneys deposited in it, as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
January 23, 1811.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit a report prepared in obedience to the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 16th instant.

I have the honor to be, &c.

ALBERT GALLATIN.

The Secretary of the Treasury, in obedience to the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 16th instant, respectfully submits the following report:

The Secretary of the Treasury is directed, by the resolution aforesaid, to lay before the House,

1st. A list of the Directors of the Bank of the United States and of its several branches;

2dly. A statement of the stock held, by foreigners, and in what countries; and of the stock held by citizens, and in what States and Territories;

3dly. The amount of specie, according to the last returns, in the vaults of the bank, distinguishing the part which belongs to the bank; the portion belonging to individuals, and to the United States.

It is enacted by the sixteenth provision of the seventh section of the act to incorporate the subscribers to the Bank of the United States, that "the officer at the head of the Treasury Department of the United States shall be furnished, from time to time, as often as he may require, not exceeding once a week, with statements of the amount of the capital stock of the said corporation, and of the debts due to the same; of the moneys deposited therein; of the notes in circulation; and of the cash in hand; and shall have a right to inspect such general accounts in the books of the bank as shall relate to the said statements; provided that this shall not be construed to imply a right of inspecting the account of any private individual or individuals with the Bank."

No other but general statements, such as are enumerated in that clause of the act, can be required by the Secretary of the Treasury, or have been furnished by the bank. And these include neither the names of directors, nor the names or place of residence of the stockholders.

On the subject of Directors, no statement whatever is ever made; and in relation to the capital stock, its gross amount, and the portion allowed to each bank, are the only particulars which can be required, or are exhibited in the statements transmitted to this office. It was ascertained some years ago, from an authentic source, that near three-fourths of the stock (about one thousand eight hundred shares) were held by foreigners; and the fact, though not officially communicated to the department, was stated in the report respecting the bank made to the Senate on the 2d day of March, 1809. No subsequent or other information has been obtained on that subject; and, with very few exceptions, the names of the directors and stockholders, either abroad or in the United States, are unknown to the Secretary.

The specie in the vaults of the bank and its branches amounted, according to the last returns, to $5,009,567, the whole of which was, strictly speaking, the property of the bank; and, together with the debts due to that body, constituted the fund from which its own debts, including both bank notes and deposits, must be paid. The sum deposited by the Treasury into the bank and its branches, amounted, by the last return of the Treasurer, dated 21st instant, and marked (A.) herewith transmitted, to $1,930,000, and that deposited in other banks, to $875,462, making together with the balance in the Treasury on that day, $2,805,462. The total amount of deposits by Government, by other banks, and by individuals, into the Bank of the United States and its branches, appears, by the last received returns, to be $8,464,770. And the statement B3., herewith transmitted, and extracted from the latest returns received at this office from the bank, and from the Treasurer, exhibits a general view of the situation of the bank, and of all the objects embraced by the third part of the resolution of the House.

It appears from these that the debts due by the bank and payable on demand, including both every species of deposits and bank notes, amount to $13,673,369. And that the resources of the bank to meet those demands consist of the following items, viz: 1st. Specie, bank notes of other banks, and balance due in account by other banks, payable to the bank on demand, (including also $25,804 in funded debt and drafts on collectors, which may be considered as specie) - - - - - 6,322,875

2. Loan to the United States, payable on giving three months' notice - - - - - 2,750,000

3. Notes discounted at 60 days, and due by individuals (including $31,242 overdrawn in Charleston) - - - - - 14,609,537

Making an aggregate of - - - - - 23,682,394

The act to incorporate the subscribers to the Bank of the United States does not itself expire by any positive clause of limitation; but it is enacted by the third section of the act that the subscribers shall be a corporation and body politic, and so continue until the 4th day of March, 1811. It is presumed that some means will be devised, either by Government or by the bank, whereby the debts due to and from the corporation may be collected after that day. So far as relates to the Treasury deposits, no inconvenience can arise, as, in any event, the loan obtained from the institution is a sufficient pledge for their payment. But a doubt may arise, from the manner in which the act is expressed, whether, under the tenth section, the bank notes still in circulation will not continue to be receivable in all payments to the United States. The propriety of some provision which may remove every doubt on the subject, or otherwise prevent the inconvenience resulting from that construction of the act, is respectfully suggested.

All of which is respectfully submitted,

ALBERT GALLATIN.

JANUARY, 1811.

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES.

The House resumed the consideration of the unfinished business of yesterday, and the question depending at the time of adjournment, to wit: the indefinite postponement of the order of the day on the bill to continue, for a further time, the charter of the Bank of the United States, was again stated.

Mr. EPPES said that he apprehended the few remarks he had to offer to the House, would not be considered as well-timed after the funeral oration had been pronounced over the expiring charter of the United States' Bank. He would trespass but a short time on the patience of the House, and confine his remarks to the policy of renewing the charter, viewed only as a national measure. He considered it unnecessary to say anything on the Constitutional question. If ever the theory of persons who believe that political principles may be demonstrated with mathematical certainty shall be realized, and a political Euclid be published, I would put for the first proposition these principles:

1. That all power not delegated is reserved to the States or to the people.

2. That the power to incorporate a bank is neither delegated nor essentially necessary for carrying into effect any delegated power. For the demonstration, I would insert the speech of a gentleman from New York, (Mr. PORTER,) who has combined, in a masterly manner, on this subject, the purest principles and most luminous elucidation. Passing over, therefore, this part of the question, I shall confine myself to such observations as will tend to show that the renewal of the charter is not necessary for the prosperity of agriculture and commerce, as has been stated, that the union of a moneyed institution with a Government, possessing the power of war and peace, is dangerous to Republican institutions; that the dissolution of the charter will produce no injury to the public or to individuals; that the same principles which induced the Republican party, in the year 1790, to oppose the incorporation of this bank, ought to prevent the renewal of the charter at the present time. In examining the first of these questions, viz: the operation of the dissolution of the charter on agriculture and commerce, I will not trouble the House with any general observations on the subject of banks. Their tendency to facilitate commerce, so long as their circulation of paper rests on specie, or floating capital, cannot, perhaps, be denied, inasmuch as it is easier to circulate paper, which represents specie, or floating capital, than the specie or capital itself. Every paper circulation, however, not founded on specie or circulating capital, is dangerous to the community. A particular, specified object, say agriculture or commerce, can only employ a certain capital. An increase of circulating medium, above the sum necessary for a particular object, must produce one of two effects, either to depreciate the medium, be it specie or paper, or to drive it into new channels. These are plain, obvious principles, which no gentleman will, I presume, deny. Let me ask, then, 1st. What amount of paper medium can, with safety, be employed in the commerce of the United States? 2. What amount can be put into circulation by the present existing banks, independent of the United States' Bank? The real basis of a safe paper circulation, so far as it respects commerce, is the productive labor of a community above its consumption. What a nation does not consume it exports. No paper circulation, therefore, can, with safety, be extended beyond the amount of the exports of a nation. Indeed, it ought not to exceed in amount the domestic exports which constitute the only certain part of the productive labor of the community, so far as respects its commerce. The export of foreign articles depends so much on circumstances, over which we have no control, that a paper currency, which rested for redemption on that, would be liable, whenever commerce was interrupted, to produce general ruin and bankruptcy. The domestic exports of the United States may be considered in value as equal to forty millions of dollars. The export of foreign articles, in the year 1807, was near sixty millions of dollars. This great export of foreign articles was produced by particular circumstances which no longer exist. During favorable years, viz: 1803, 1804, 1805, the export of foreign and domestic articles averaged seventy-six millions of dollars; so that it would appear, taking the domestic and foreign exports as the real amount of capital which can be employed in commerce, an ability to circulate seventy-six millions of dollars of paper, is sufficient for all commercial purposes.

The Bank of the United States, with a capital of ten millions of dollars, has put into circulation, in credit and notes, nineteen millions of dollars; fourteen millions of dollars in accommodation credit, exclusive of mortgages and bonds, and constituting active circulating medium, and five millions in notes. As a moneyed institution, it is admitted that their affairs have been well managed. Other banks, therefore, may circulate to the same amount, in proportion to their capital.

The bank capital of the United States, exclusive of the United States' Bank, is $50,000,000; five times the capital of the United States' Bank; of course, supposing them to manage their affairs as well, they can put into circulation, in credit and notes, five times the amount put into circulation by the United States' Bank; five times nineteen millions of dollars is ninety-five millions of dollars. This sum, sir, is fifty-five millions of dollars above our domestic exports; forty-five millions above our consumption; nineteen millions above our whole export, domestic and foreign, in favorable years; twenty-six millions above the present export of domestic and foreign articles.

Can any gentleman, on this statement, believe

JANUARY, 1811.

Bank of the United States.

H. OF R.

we want ability to circulate a paper medium for commercial purposes? Our export of foreign articles, from the peculiar situation of the world, has almost disappeared. Our merchants are more in want of a field to exercise their capital than of capital itself. It is a fact, which cannot be denied, that we have at present a surplus capital, which cannot be employed in commerce; and that the paper circulation is increasing in a ratio neither proportioned to our population, consumption, nor wealth. I have confined my observations entirely to the view of a capital, such as is necessary for commerce. No gentleman has advocated the renewal of the charter for the purpose of creating a capital for internal improvement. This appears, by general consent, to have been considered as more properly within the sphere of the several State Legislatures. At the time this charter was originally granted, the situation of the United States was very different from what it now is; but three banks existed, with a capital of less than three millions of dollars; our exports amounted to less than nineteen millions. Our commerce languished for want of a circulating medium; we are now in danger of suffering from a paper currency, resting on no solid basis, and liable, with a reverse of fortune, to recoil on ourselves. I cannot, therefore, consider the renewal of the charter, viewed only as a measure of general policy, necessary for the creating capital for purposes of commerce.

But, sir, said Mr. E., I object to the union of a moneyed institution with a Government, as dangerous to Republican principles. Next to frequent elections, the great security in every country, against arbitrary power, is the dependence of the Government on the great body of the people for supplies. Hence the objections to a revenue dependent on loans, indirect taxes, &c. Money has been aptly termed the sinews of war. It may, with equal propriety, be termed the sinews of oppression and usurpation. The facility of commanding large sums by means of a moneyed capital, dependent on the Government, is calculated to destroy the dependence of the Government on the people. If we look at the history of England we shall find that their short period of liberty was while the King was dependent on the Commons for supplies. The creation of a great moneyed capital in that country, under the control of the Government, has totally destroyed that valuable feature in the English constitution. It has created a body of men who contribute to the prodigality of the Government, who furnish the means and share in the spoils of the nation. The history of the Bank of England, and of its paper system, is one which ought to warn the friends of freedom against the danger of a union between a Government and paper capitalists. This species of capital, which scarcely knows a limit, is dangerous to the freedom of a country, without being nourished by the fostering hand of Government. Unite the two; give to a Government, by means of a paper system, a power to supply its wants without a recurrence to the people, and you unite the most formidable engines of oppression, power, and means. It is this system which has caused the British Government, after mortgaging, from year to year, its revenues to the bank, to accumulate a national debt, to the enormous amount of six hundred and seventy millions of pounds sterling. The average quarterly advances of the Bank of England to the Government, in the year 1797, was four times the whole amount discounted for individuals. From these extraordinary advances, produced by the union of the Government and the bank, it must have failed in the year 1797, but for the interposition of Parliament. On the 26th day of February, 1797, the cash and bullion in the bank amounted to £1,272,000—average notes in circulation to £8,640,250—bills discounted to £2,905,000—advances to Government to £10,672,490. From the report of the committee appointed by Parliament, in February, 1797, to examine into the state of the bank, it appeared that the debts of the bank amounted to £13,770,390—that its assets exclusive of the permanent debt from the Government, (and what these assets were does not appear,) amounted to £17,597,298—leaving in favor of the bank, £3,826,903. This sum of £17,597,298, consisting of debts and assets, was not sufficient to meet their cash debts, amounting to 13,770,390 pounds. At this time the permanent debt due from the Government to the bank, amounted to £11,686,800—almost four times the whole sum left in the bank after payment of its debts. The funds of the bank, being in the hands of the Government, the Government unable to pay, kindly interposed to save the bank from ruin, and made their paper a tender. This, sir, was one of the blessings produced by a union between the Government and the bank.

But, sir, many gentlemen have exercised their ingenuity in portraying the ruin which must fall on individuals, and the injury which must be sustained by the public, from a dissolution of the charter. From the statement, just laid on our table from the Treasury Department, it appears that the stockholders of the bank are in more danger than the community.

From that statement we find that the debts due by the bank, and payable on demand, amount to

To meet this debt the bank has on hand, in cash	5,009,567
Notes and debts due from other banks	1,313,350

Making, in all, their cash funds amount to	$6,382,517
Deducting this sum of $6,332,512, which may be considered their cash fund, from the $12,573,369, the amount of their debts, and it will be $7,350,512, for the payment of which they must depend on their debtors, and make this payment out of the $14,609,537 due from individuals. So far, therefore, from pressing the community, it appears they must collect $7,350,512, and apply, in addition to it, their whole cash funds, or fail in their engagements. But, sir, I will state it in another way. According to the principles of banking, the profit is, annually or quarterly, divided; of course, the company, on winding up its affairs, can only withdraw its capital, viz: $10,000,000

Of this capital they have in hand,
in cash - - - - -	5,009,567
In notes and debts due by other banks - - - - -	1,313,857
In a debt from the United States - - - - -	2,750,000
In houses - - - - -	500,000
In debts in suit - - - - -	154,164
In bonds and mortgages - - - - -	221,000
In stock of the United States - - - - -	20,000
Total - - - - -	$9,968,588

This, sir, amounts very nearly to their stock, and if they reserve their cash on hand as part of that stock, and meet the payment of their debts with the debt due to them, they have nothing to draw from the community, which can produce the slightest pressure. They may find difficulty in collecting a sufficient sum to meet their own engagements, as, from the moment of the dissolution of their charter, their debts will stand on the same footing with any other company winding up its affairs, and must be collected in the same manner.

Much stress, sir, has also been laid on the necessity of the bank for the management of the finances of the United States. We are told that a complete control is given, by the Constitution, over the finances, and that a bank is necessary for their management. The term finance is not to be found in the Constitution. The bank is not necessary for the collection of taxes, or imposts, or for paying the debts, to use the language of the Constitution. It has never been used for the collection of taxes. For the collection of duties it is used only in a limited way. We have upward of eighty-five places for the collecting duties, and only nine branch banks. It is used for the payment of the interest of the debt only in consequence of a Treasury regulation. Commissioners of Loans within the several States are even at this time established by law for paying the interest on the debt. The bank, therefore, is not essential for this object. The great payments for the Army and Navy are not at present made at bank—paymasters and pursers discharge this duty. All payments on account of the civil list are made at bank, but the greater portion of these are at the seat of Government. A bank is, therefore, not essential for making these payments. Until new arrangements are made, temporary inconvenience may be sustained by the Government. The mere change of agents generally in moneyed transactions must produce inconvenience. The inconvenience, however, will be temporary, and does not deserve consideration in a case involving the Constitution.

I will close my remarks with a few observations tending to show that the same principles which induced the Republican party, in 1790, to oppose the incorporation of the bank, ought to prevent a renewal of the charter. In a free country there is nothing more important than a recurrence to those fundamental principles which unite, in one common band, those who grant power and those who exercise it. The peculiar organization of the Government of the United States combines in a single charter powers administered by men deriving their authority from two separate and distinct sources, the people and the States. The weakness of the old Confederation, which, although armed with general powers, was found unequal to giving a practical operation to those powers, produced the Federal Constitution. This charter, the offspring of compromise, was considered in the Convention by one party as too weak to accomplish its objects—by the other as sufficiently strong to endanger the liberty of the citizen. These two principles were soon manifested in the administration of the present Federal Constitution. Those who thought it too strong gave to the Constitution a rigid construction, and opposed constructive powers. These were termed anti-Federalists. Those who thought it too weak, were disposed to ingraft vigor on it by construction, and contended for constructive powers. These were termed Federalists. The eclat which attended the adoption of the Constitution threw the Government exclusively into the hands of the Federalists. The great popularity of General WASHINGTON, on whose brow grew in full vigor the laurels of the Revolution, balanced, for a time, these two contending parties. With the same manly firmness, as during the Revolution, he stemmed the torrent, and attaching himself exclusively to what he deemed the interests of his country, administered the Constitution according to its true principles. He commenced his career as President on the 30th of August, 1789. In 1791, the charter of the bank was granted. On this great measure the two great parties were, for the first time, arrayed against each other. It was at that time considered a party question, inasmuch as it involved the very principles on which the parties divided, viz: “delegated powers” and “constructive” powers. Unfortunately for his country, General WASHINGTON, on this occasion, took side with the Federalists. The creation of a moneyed interest, connected with the Government, was a favorite measure of those who were willing to ingraft energy on the Constitution, and was warmly opposed by the party unwilling to add, by construction, the extraneous aid of a moneyed capital, to a charter considered, on a fair construction, sufficiently energetic. The defeat of General St. Clair took place in the November following the establishment of the bank, and the subsequent disasters of the Indian war, by increasing the wants of the Government, drew more closely the ties of connexion between the Federal party and the bank. Through all the periods of the Federal Administration, this moneyed capital was their shield and their sword. It extended their influence and secured the approbation of most of the large commercial cities in the Union. When this bank was established, but three banks existed in the United States, with a capital of two million one hundred thousand dollars. The creation of a bank, with a capital of ten millions of dollars, almost five times the capital of all the existing banks of the Union, under the patronage of the General Government, was calculated to produce and did produce a subserviency on the part of the stockholders to the views of their party. The influence of this powerful moneyed capital was long felt. Nothing but the multiplication of State banks, and the increase of capital from the peculiar and fortunate circumstances under which the United States were placed, could have emancipated us from the shackles imposed on us by a moneyed institution wielded by foreigners. I rejoice that the period has arrived, when this privileged class must surrender its charter—when the moneyed capital of our country shall no longer be wielded as an engine of party—when the Republican party shall have an opportunity of testing the truth of the principles for which they contended in the year 1790, and of giving on the present, as on the former occasion, their support to the principle, “That power not delegated is reserved to the States or to the people.”

MR. STANLEY.—Mr. Speaker: After the able discussion which this subject has already undergone, I should not have asked your attention, but for the observations of the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. EPPES,) who has last addressed you. That gentleman, with a view to justify such a decision of the question as he desires, has advanced propositions which are in themselves so incorrect, and supported them by arguments so palpably unreasonable, that I shall trouble the House a short time in reply.

The gentleman tells us it is as true as any mathematical axiom, that a power not expressly granted by the Constitution to the Federal Government cannot be exercised by that Government; that whenever a political Euclid shall be composed; this principle should be placed as first in clearness and importance; and the speech of the gentleman from New York, (Mr. PORTER,) on the bill before us, should be added as an appendix or commentary proving its truth. In terms, sir, the gentleman's proposition is true, but the gentleman has not avoided the error of those who have preceded him on that side of the question; he confounds the powers of the Federal Government with the means of executing such powers; he does not distinguish between the objects of the Federal compact and the means of effecting these objects. And upon this hinge of error did the argument of the gentleman from New York turn. This confusion of terms, this indistinctness of perception, as I shall endeavor to show, has led gentlemen astray on this question. If, sir, the political errors of the statesmen of this day shall ever be collected into a volume, as the first, the most glaringly wrong, and flagrantly unjust, should be placed the axiom of the gentleman from Virginia, which cannot, in substance, be other than this: “That no means of executing a power granted to the Federal Government, can be employed by that Government, unless such means be found expressly pointed out in the Constitution. And, sir, to show how truth may be obscured, and error supported, by ingenuity, my respect for the gentleman from New York forbids my saying by sophistry, I will append, as a commentary, the speech of that gentleman on this question.

With respect to the Constitutional right of Congress to incorporate a bank for the prosperous administration of its finances, the very able arguments already made, and in my apprehension very imperfectly met, require little to be said in its support. My view of this part of the subject shall, therefore, be brief, and I may be pardoned for offering it. To incorporate a company, in other words to grant to certain persons a legal or artificial capacity, distinct from their natural, is an act of sovereignty, a delegation of which it is true can only emanate from the sovereign power. If the Federal Government be not sovereign as to any of its objects, they cannot incorporate a company for the attainment of any of its objects. But, if, on the other hand, the Government is sovereign as to any object, the power to incorporate companies, as the fit and necessary means for the attainment of that object, must regularly result from and be appurtenant to this sovereignty. This power is not left to inference; the Constitution expressly declares that Congress shall have power to make all laws necessary and proper to carry into effect the powers delegated, and that such laws shall be the supreme law of the land.

The Constitution, it is true, does not, in terms, give the power to incorporate a bank—that instrument details only the objects of the Government, and delegates certain general authorities to effectuate the ends for which it was formed. In every case it is silent as to the particular means to be employed or the mode to be observed in the attainment of the object or end. Instead of attempting to specify in any case the means of executing a power, it is silent in that particular in every case, granting to Congress the general power, I have just stated, to make all laws necessary and proper to carry into effect the delegated powers. Among the general powers expressly granted, is this—“To lay and collect taxes, to borrow money, to pay the debts and provide for the general welfare of the Union.” What wisdom first suggested, the experience of twenty years has confirmed, that a bank is not only a fit but the most useful means of collecting the revenue of the United States. It has been found the readiest and most certain resource from which to obtain and on which to rely for loans to Government; and through its aid, moneys for public necessities have been safely, speedily, and without charge placed at the command of Government in every part of the Union. The agency of this institution, thus continually employed, places its utility and expediency beyond question. I consider it, therefore, as “proper,” because it is well adapted to its object; as “necessary,” because if not the only, it is certainly the best means that can be devised to obtain its ends; and being both "necessary and proper" to carry into effect the power expressly granted to Congress, "to collect taxes, to borrow money and pay the debts"—it must be Constitutional.

But, sir, the gentleman from New York says, the United States are not sovereign, and cannot exercise a right of sovereignty, because they depend on the will of the States for existence; for, said he, should the States neglect or refuse to elect Senators or to make the laws necessary for electing representatives, the Federal Government would die of its own imbecility. This may be true: the Government may cease to exist, yet, while it does exist, there are powers which it alone can exercise without the control or interference of any other authority. To these purposes, assuredly, then it must be supreme, or sovereign. For example, the Federal Government has power to lay and collect taxes and to regulate commerce. Is there any power in this country—I speak of moral, not physical power—which can prevent them laying such taxes and making such regulations of commerce as they think fit? The Constitution of the United States is the act, of "We, the people of the United States." So are the State constitutions—both are derived from the same source—each is independent of the other, and only dependent on the sovereign will of the people, constitutionally expressed. The States have certain powers exclusively confided to them; they may prescribe the descents of estates, and regulate distribution of property and other objects of internal police; they are sovereign as to these objects; the Federal Government is as much so as to the objects within the sphere of its jurisdiction. Yet, Mr. Speaker, obvious, indeed indispensable as is the inference and deduction of the right to incorporate a bank for the management of the financial concerns of the United States, from these premises, gentlemen say it is only an implied power, that no power can be used unless expressly granted in the Constitution, and the exercise of implied powers is deprecated as unknown to the Constitution, and abhorrent to Republicanism, and dangerous to our liberties. Let me ask gentlemen, and I pray they will inform me, whether they do not daily act upon implied powers? If not, let them speak, in what part of the Constitution do they find power to build light-houses? Where is the power which their President, doubtless with the feelings of a man and the firmness of a magistrate, so freely exercises of removing at pleasure from office men who were appointed with the consent of the Senate? You have committees now sitting, who, under your authority, but without law, compel citizens to attend at their summons, without consulting their will or convenience; you have conferred on certain individuals the sole privilege of trading with the Indian tribes—by what authority are all these, and many other acts which have been mentioned in this debate, exercised? If I am answered at all, truth will dictate this reply: the power to do these acts is no where expressly granted in the Constitution; the authority results from the powers granted, and are necessarily implied as the fit and necessary means of executing the powers which are expressly granted. Yes, sir, whether I am answered or not, the fact is manifest, that the implied powers of the Government are not only fairly deducible from the spirit and letter of the Constitution, but are essential to the most familiar operations of Congress. And, sir, it is in proof that gentlemen are in the daily habit of exercising, without scruple or reserve, those implied powers, which, when urged in support of the bank, they turn from with affected abhorrence, as if a single glance, like a look at Medusa's head, would turn them into stone! They have repeatedly acted under them, still grasp them with the love of power and the ardor of ambition, and will only suit their hold to that force which shall deprive them of the reins of empire.

The gentleman from Virginia deprecates a bank which shall be connected with the Government; he calls this a dangerous union of the sword and the purse, reminds us of the abuse by the British Government of the Bank of England in obtaining loans, and of the public debt of that Kingdom. None of those objections apply to the Bank of the United States. The charter of the present bank places the institution beyond the control of the Government. It is bound to accommodate the Government with loans to a limited amount when required; but this obligation on the bank, although its performance may at times chance to be unfavorable to the institution, is yet connected with no danger to the country, since the one cannot lend, until we, the representatives of the people have authorized the other to borrow. The Executive of the United States is said to bear the sword, but, sir, Congress holds the purse, and it has not been explained to us how the existence of a bank is to render one subservient to the other, or to convey the sword and purse into the same hand. I can, however, conceive a plan of a bank which would sharpen the sword of the Executive and give a power to his arm that might be used to the ruin or degradation of our citizens. Adopt the plan which has been recommended, and which is to rise upon the ruins of the present institution; erect one great bank whose branches shall embrace all the States and whose capital shall swallow all the State banks, give to the Administration the enormous patronage of the appointment of directors to this institution, and place the credit and business of every man connected of necessity with banks at the mercy or pleasure of an Executive or his minions,—the commercial and the enterprising must decide either to become flatterers and be favored, or to retain their independence and be ruined. It is this system which would give a dangerous, a detestable power. Your Administration, styling themselves Republican, have professed to desire no patronage: I will take them at their word; my vote shall never increase their patronage, to multiply their dependants. The Crown, which they profess to put away, I will not force upon their brow.

H. OF R.

As to the Bank of England and the British debt, I perceive not the bearing their connexion can have on the subject before us. That the British Government have made too free use of the ability of the bank to lend, cannot expose us to like mischiefs, because our bank cannot lend, nor our Administration borrow, but by the express authority of Congress. Of the British debt, I know its amount is enormous. Yet, sir, how, and for what purpose, has that debt been thus swollen? Perhaps the people of Great Britain owe to that debt the preservation and enjoyment of rights dearer to freemen than their purse. It is, sir, at the cost of that debt that Great Britain maintains her existence, and independence as a nation. She might have submitted without an effort, without expense, and, free from debt, have sunk under the chains which the tyrant of France, the enemy of the human race, has fastened upon all the kingdoms of continental Europe. Rather than see my country bow in subjection to that direst of despotisms against which Great Britain has struggled, I would, in the spirit of an American, cheerfully bear my share of a debt as large as that which has been the subject of remark.

The gentlemen tell us we have sufficient bank capital without that of the Bank of the United States; that the capital of the State banks is equal to the wants of the United States, and that, if this institution is continued, there will be an excess of paper, and the consequent mischiefs to the country. Sir, gentlemen need not feel alarm on this point. There is no more danger of a surplus of capital being employed in banks, than of such surplus being employed in any other business. The thing regulates itself. Bank notes may be emitted beyond the use of the country, but you can no more force them into circulation beyond this necessity, than you can force purchases and sales of tobacco and flour beyond the consumption of a country. The commerce of every country requires a certain sum of circulating medium. The amount must be ascertained by experience, which alone can show how much it will absorb and employ. If you emit paper beyond this amount it will, of necessity, return upon the banks. This discovery is not modern. It is as old as the science of banking. And of the errors of a bank, no one is more unfavorable to them than the issues of paper beyond the necessity of the country; for, so long as they keep within proper limits, it is found that they may emit one dollar and two-thirds, or two dollars of paper, for each dollar of specie in their vaults; but when their issues of paper exceed these limits, the excess continually returns, and instead of one dollar in specie meeting two of paper, a dollar in specie is required to redeem each dollar of the surplus emission of notes. With this restraint upon their issues, banks are kept in due check; and, sir, when the prudent and safe issues—viz: to the amount required by the country—do not yield employment for the capital, the business ceases to be profitable, the capital is directed to other objects, and the banking fund is kept at its just level. This, sir, is the necessary and just result of fair banking—such has been the operations of the Bank of the United States, of whose capital, debts, and issues, the Government has been weekly informed. It is from the State banks that danger is to be apprehended. Of their capital, (I mean not their nominal, but their specie capital,) of their debts, and their resources, we are, and must remain entirely ignorant; and we have seen that some of these institutions, dishonestly emitting paper beyond the sum authorized by their capital, and beyond the necessities of the country, their notes have returned upon them, they have been unprepared to pay, their paper has depreciated, and individuals have been defrauded to a vast amount. And such, again, may be the case if we remove the check, the restraining influence, which the large and solid capital of the Bank of the United States, and its prudent direction, has enabled it to exercise over the State banks—these “mushrooms,” as the gentleman has called them, which, like Jonah’s gourd, have sprung up in one night and withered in the next.

The gentleman informs us that our exports of domestic products amount only to forty-five millions of dollars; that the capital of the different banks in the United States, at the rate of issues by the United States’ Bank, may emit ninety millions of dollars, and he infers that a paper medium beyond the amount of domestic exports cannot be necessary. This opinion, sir, needs an elucidation, which the gentleman did not give it. Why the amount of produce purchased for exportation should form the measure of circulating medium is, to say the least, not self-evident. Nor can I conceive why, in calculating the medium necessary or useful for the concerns of the country, we should exclude from view the purchases for internal use as well as for external sale, or lose sight of the repeated use made of the same note or piece of metal in its continued circulation. The circulating medium of a country, whether paper or specie, represents, because it commands, the articles we need and get in exchange for it. What the sum should be, my political arithmetic does not teach me, nor does the rule of the gentleman from Virginia. In my opinion, experience alone can show it, as I have before said, viz: that amount which the commercial, agricultural, and manufacturing concerns of the country will require and can employ; to be ascertained from the amount of silver and gold in circulation, bank credit, and bank notes issued and not returning upon the banks. It is, I admit, a fact, a proud fact, that the exports of our country have increased from eighteen to forty-five millions. New fields have been opened, produce increased, means of conveyance multiplied, and new markets sought and resorted to. Agriculture, commerce, and manufactures, have advanced, as they necessarily must, hand in hand; and to the beneficial influence of banks, increasing the capital, encouraging enterprise, stimulating and rewarding the interest of the country, we are indebted for much of this increase.

The testimony which the gentleman has borne to the correct management of the Bank of the

H. OF R.

Bank of the United States.

JANUARY, 1811.

United States, was to have been expected from his information and liberality. The fact previously stated, and repeated by him as a defect in arrangement, that the notes of the bank and its branches are not paid but at the office from which they issue, and at which they are made payable, is not a ground of complaint. The bank and its branches have each but a small portion of the capital. Of the branches, the largest portion, (only $1,800,000,) is in New York, and it is absurd to suppose that either the branch with this capital, or the others with less, should redeem, at all times, the notes emitted upon a capital of ten millions. The thing is impossible.

From the opinion advanced by the gentleman, that the state of the bank should rather excite the fears of the institution for its own safety or solvency, than awaken the apprehensions of the community for the effects of dissolution upon them, I beg leave to dissent. We have had, in debate, various statements of the affairs of the bank, drawn either from former reports or conjecture. The report of the Secretary of the Treasury, this day laid on our tables, shows the present state of the bank. To this I shall refer for facts.

There is due to the bank from individuals upon notes discounted - - - -	$14,578,294 25
Other banks owe them for notes and in account - - - -	1,287,485 92
The Government owe, including the late loan, funded debt and Treasury drafts - - - -	2,807,046 49
	18,672,826 66
They have in gold and silver - - - -	5,009,567 10
And in real estate - - - -	500,652 77
Making a property to face the demands on them - - - -	24,183,046 53

On the other hand what do they owe?

To the holders of their notes in circulation - - - -	$5,037,125 22
To the Government for deposits - - - -	1,929,999 60
To other banks due in account - - - -	634,348 01
To individuals for deposits - - - -	5,900,422 83
To balances on outstanding drafts - - - -	171,473 17
Making the total amount of their debts - - - -	13,673,368 83

Thus, sir, with a property of twenty-four millions of dollars, leaving the stockholders the original stock of ten millions, and a surplus of more than half a million to meet bad debts. But were it otherwise—were it possible that, of the debts due them, ten millions should never be collected, the loss would affect the stockholders, whose original advance would be lost, but the interest of the community would not even then be affected, at least not as creditors of the institution; because even if ten millions, the capital stock, were by any means sunk, the bank would still be solvent, it would even then pay its debts, and, consequently, must be perfectly safe as regards the community.

Such, sir, is the state of the account on the side of the bank.

How stands the account with the debtors of the bank, or rather with the public?

The bank can demand the debts due it $18,672,826 66
Admit the demands upon it are applied as sets-off to their full amount 13,673,368 83

The balance still to be raised by the country is - - - - 4,999,457 83
Within a trifle of five millions of dollars.

Whence is this sum to come? Not from the vaults of the other banks; they do not possess it. It is stated in the able speech of the representative of the city of Philadelphia, in the Legislature of Pennsylvania, upon the resolution respecting the bank, that the report of the state of all the banks of that State, recently made to the Legislature, shows that all the banks in Philadelphia (excepting that of the United States) have together but a little more than one million of dollars in specie: those who have the best means of information, declare the specie in the banks of New York is not greater, and in those of other cities unquestionably less. The State banks then have not the money, and cannot produce it. Will the notes of these banks pay the debt? No, sir, because their notes will be returned upon them for payment, which they cannot make. These banks know their own strength or weakness, and that they dread this crisis, is manifest from the course they have already adopted; they have curtailed discounts and commenced calling in their debts. The consequences you learn from the moans of your correspondents, and from the petitions which daily press your table. The want of money has produced a want of punctuality; confidence is destroyed; the life, the animating spark of business is, as it were, suspended, and deep distress is fast spreading over the commercial world. Sir, my deductions are supported by facts. They prove the solvency, indeed the strength of the Bank of the United States, is such as to merit the confidence of the people, which it enjoys; while the situation of the State banks, and the deficiency of the precious metals, gives a fatal assurance of the inability of the country to submit, without great distress, to the operation of having extracted from it the large debt due the bank.

The gentleman from Virginia says it is no argument in favor of a continuance of the bank, that it is necessary for the management of the financial concerns of the United States, for that the word "finance" is not to be found in the Constitution. Sir, were I called upon by one of the yeomanry of this country—one whose days had been spent at the plough, remote from Courts, and without concern in affairs of State, to define to him what were the financial concerns of the United States, I should, as an explanation adapted to the simplest understanding, inform him that the laying and collecting taxes, borrowing money, and paying the debts of the Union, were its financial concerns. And as these powers are expressly granted to Congress, although the word "finances" may not be found in the Constitution, Congress are thus required of necessity to provide for the management of the "financial concerns of the United States."

JANUARY, 1811.

Bank of the United States.

H. OF R.

Permit me now, sir, to notice objections urged against the bank from other quarters, and of a different nature—objections not calculated, probably not intended, to influence this House, but which may have an influence abroad. Gentlemen have objected to what they term the foreign influence in our affairs from a portion of the stock of this bank being held by foreigners; and the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. WRIGHT) has alleged that aliens, traitors, and old tories, are intrusted with its direction; others with him have said that the bank and the funding system are twins of the same progenitor, (Alexander Hamilton,) and that the question of creating this bank was the ground on which the parties of the United States first divided.

The charter of the bank did not exclude foreigners from purchasing shares, because, at the period of its establishment, our country was without capital, and it was an object rather to invite foreign capital to the United States than to repel it; their large funds and low rates of interest have enabled them to give more in the market than our citizens could afford to pay, and they have consequently purchased. But, if it be a sin to have sold stock to foreigners, lay it at the right door; and when you revile the measure, do not forget it was one of Mr. Jefferson's Administration, who sold to English merchants, in the year 1801, all the stock in the bank which the United States owned.

The charter denies to any stockholder, not a resident of the United States, the right either of a vote in the choice of directors, or a seat at the board of directors. And thus divested of any power to interfere in the concerns of the bank, it requires more than human penetration to discover, or more than ordinary jealousy to suspect, how foreigners can influence even the affairs of the bank, much less, through its agency, the concerns of the country.

This cry of foreign influence from the use of foreign capital is a modern bugbear. During our Revolutionary struggle, our soldiers were clothed and armed with funds borrowed in Europe; our nerves were hardened, our sinews stiffened, and our independence achieved with the assistance of foreign capital. Yet the heroes and sages of that day suspected not any improper foreign influence; they were brave and wise, but not as cunning as our present statesmen who have made the discovery.

As to the aliens, traitors, and old tories, who are concerned in the direction of the bank, the gentleman is too general in his charge. So far as he will be particular he can be met. He named but two persons as meriting his denunciation: Evan Jones and Daniel Clarke, of New Orleans. I, sir, know not personally either of these gentlemen. Mr. Jones I understand to be a native of Pennsylvania, who, at the peace of 1763, when Great Britain acquired Florida, settled in that country, and has resided there and at New Orleans ever since; he is declared to be a man of high character for integrity and honor. Mr. Clarke has had a seat as a delegate on this floor; though not a native of the United States, he is as much a citizen as any of the inhabitants of Louisiana, made so by treaty, and as much so as will be the Representatives of the State of Orleans, "that is to be," in the next Congress. Against his character nothing has been alleged other than that imputation which the people of the United States have fixed upon the character of every man who has been the friend or associate of Wilkinson and Burr. Let me not be understood as committing myself to the opinion of the guilt of these gentlemen. I was not of Burr's jury—he may be guilty; nor am I of Wilkinson's committee—he may be innocent; yet suspicion deeply stains his character; it will take much of the labor of the file to rub it off.

But, sir, let it be supposed that an individual who was unfriendly to our Revolution should have been chosen by those who are proprietors of the bank to a seat in its direction. Would the choice be either new or criminal? Sir, a person whose name is recorded in the proscription statute of a State as an "old tory," was appointed by Mr. Jefferson a district judge of the United States. In other States, but particularly in New York and Pennsylvania, persons who bore arms against us and adhered to our enemy in the Revolutionary war have also been appointed by Republican Presidents to offices of high trust. Why were these "old tories" thus honored and trusted? Because they possessed integrity and ability to qualify them for their stations. And, why might not a tory be chosen a director of a bank, if his virtues and talents had gained him the confidence of the stockholders? The choice seems to me to be as pardonable in a stockholder as in a President—or is it, sir, that the Republican President has been converted into a political Pope, and has alone the power to pardon and absolve from political sins?

Of the origin of the Bank of the United States, the honor is certainly due to the first Secretary of the Treasury. In justice to his memory, the fact ought frequently to be mentioned and never to be forgotten. But, sir, the merit of obtaining the adoption of the plan is not entirely his. The original bill in every stage received the support of gentlemen of the Republican party; among those, who were its earliest supporters, one most distinguished for ability, the present Secretary of the Treasury, continues it advocate to the present hour.

In support of the claim of the bank for a renewal of its charter, and to the credit of Mr. Gallatin, I will here read extracts from his report to the Senate, of March, 1809:

"The advantages derived by Government from the bank are nearly of the same nature with those obtained by individuals who transact business with similar institutions, and may be reduced to the following heads:

"1. Safe keeping of public moneys.—This applies not only to money in the Treasury, but that in the hands of collectors, and affords one of the best securities against delinquencies.

"2. Transmission of public moneys—from one quarter of the Union to another. This is done by the bank at its own risk and expense.

"3. Collection of the revenue.—The punctuality of payments introduced by the banking system, and the facilities offered by the bank to importers indebted for revenue bonds, are amongst the causes which have enabled the United States to collect with so great facility and with so few losses the large revenue derived from import.

"4. Loans.—The bank has been eminently useful in making the advances, which, under different circumstances, were necessary. At one time Government owed it $6,200,000, exclusive of 6 per cent. stock original subscription, and a similar disposition to accommodate has been repeatedly evinced whenever the aspect of public affairs has rendered it proper to ascertain whether new loans might, if wanted, be obtained."

The report then states, that although the banks established under authority of the States might afford considerable assistance to the Government in its fiscal operations, there is none which can transmit moneys with the same facility or to the same extent; none which can afford so great security against any possible losses, or greater resources in relation to loans. "Nor is it eligible that the General Government should, in respect to its own operations, be entirely dependent on institutions over which it has no control whatever." He also notices the objection of foreigners holding stock, but this he declares "does not at all events appear sufficient to outweigh the manifest public advantages derived from a renewal of the charter."

Mr. Speaker, gentlemen may disregard, but they cannot despise, nor can they destroy, this high testimony, which, while it establishes the utility of the bank, bears honorable testimony to the upright and patriotic spirit in which its operations have been conducted. This testimonial outweighs all that the bickerings of interest, the suggestions of jealousy, or the apprehensions of the uninformed, can assert against the institution. For myself, sir, had I no other knowledge of the subject, I should feel no hesitation upon the question of constitutionality and necessity of a bank which Hamilton recommended, Washington approved, and Gallatin, after twenty years experience, continues to advocate. The shade which has been attempted to be cast upon the fame of Hamilton as the "progenitor of the bank" must when examined, like every other attack upon it, but add to its lustre. Sir, I shall not attempt to eulogize the name of that great man; were my feeble powers equal to the task I should deem it unnecessary: Party rancor, which impotently followed him to the grave, cannot now obscure one ray of that sun of glory which shines upon the tomb of the illustrious dead.

As if satisfied or fearful that no argument against the bill could be urged which would plausibly destroy its claims to support, the question has been called a party question. To rally a party round its standard, to excite the pertinacity and awaken the severity of party feeling, it has been declared that upon the question of incorporating this bank in 1791, originated the division of parties which has since existed in this nation. Until this time sir, this discovery has not been made. I had understood a very different history of the origin of party. I have heard, I have read, for youth did not permit me to witness, that at the formation of our present Constitution many persons with different views were opposed to its formation and adoption, preferring that shadow of union in which the States, as with a rope of sand, were attempted to be bound under the Confederation, to the strength, firmness, and unity, in which we are knit by the Federal Constitution. The good sense and good fortune of our country prevailed, the Constitution was adopted, and those who as anti-federalists had opposed the adoption of the Constitution were organized with very few exceptions under the name of Republicans, in opposition and decided uniform hostility to the measures of the Federal Government.

The charter to the bank thus indeed became with some of its opponents a question of party, although it received the support of others who were anti-federal. In this party opposition it only met the fate of every other measure, however wise and salutary, originated and perfected at that period. Let us hope sir, that the blindness and injustice of such rule of action is not again to be revived.

Let me now, sir, rapidly glance at the consequences which are to attend the rejection of this bill. The intercourse between the States, and the dealings of the citizens of a State with those of different parts of the same State, require a circulating medium far above the quantity of gold and silver which exists amongst us. No man contends that the demands of commerce, or even the ordinary transactions of individuals, can in the present scarcity of gold and silver be carried on without the intervention of bank notes. Hitherto, sir, the notes issued in each State have answered some of the domestic uses; but for the purpose of remitting to, or receiving payment from other States, no reliance has ever been placed upon the notes of State banks. It has frequently happened that notes have got into circulation, purporting to be issued by a bank which in fact never existed, and others issued by banks which had failed. The difficulty of knowing the real from the spurious, and the solvent from the insolvent, has so far restrained the circulation of the notes of State banks within the limits of their own State, as to have prevented any late frauds and losses except among the very uninformed part of the community. In these circumstances, the known ability of the Bank of the United States, the receipt of its paper in payment of debts to the United States, has given it a currency and credit equal to gold and silver in every purpose of domestic or foreign use, and its frequency among us has so far familiarized all men of business with the notes as, if not entirely to prevent frauds from counterfeits, at least greatly to diminish the injury. In destroying this bank, you are about, sir, to strike all this most valued paper medium out of existence; to dissolve an artificial capital of the Bank of the United States of ten millions of dollars, and not merely this capital of the Bank of the United States, but, by withdrawing from the other banks the very large portion, if not the whole of their specie capital, with which they must part to pay the Bank of the United States the debts daily increasing against them, by the receipt of their notes in discharge of individual debts to the Bank of the United States, you inevitably render the State banks less able to accommodate, and diminish greatly that portion of the circulating medium emitted by these banks.

Of the distress which this measure will occasion, I need say nothing. The evidence of its existence and magnitude surrounds you, and have been already repeatedly pressed upon your attention. You are in fact to destroy all confidence in bank paper. Can my constituents know whether the bank note of New Hampshire or Georgia, which is offered them, is genuine or spurious? Can they know whether a bank is in credit, or insolvent, of which they have never before heard? Yet, sir, as gold and silver is not to be had, and the United States' Bank notes will no longer exist, you reduce the people to this dilemma; either they must receive the notes of State banks, ignorant as they must be of their genuineness of credit; encounter the daily risk of being defrauded, or keep on hand their produce. In this state of uncertainty, bank notes must lose their credit; will cease to circulate; must soon depreciate, and scenes of speculation and embarrassment will ensue not unlike those which have heretofore nearly ruined our country.

Mr. Speaker, the present is not a time for dangerous experiments upon the prosperity of our country. With foreign nations our relations are more than at any other period perplexed. In my apprehension the nations of Europe, with more than one of whom we have advanced in a warlike attitude, will have more forbearance and less temper than is usual with them, if they do not meet us with decided, not secret hostility. And, in this time of danger from abroad, while with a non-intercourse law in one hand, you fetter all external commerce, sink your revenue, and reduce the value of property; with the other, by destroying the bank, deranging the finances of the Government, overturning private credit, and destroying commercial confidence, you press with the deadly weight of an incubus upon the exertions of domestic industry and enterprise. The inevitable effect of these measures must be to turn loose a torrent of overwhelming calamity, the extent of which you cannot estimate, and the force of which you cannot stay. The consequences are awful, and the responsibility serious. Let gentlemen look to it.

Mr. RHEA, of Tennessee.—If, in the course of this debate, observations had not been made which appear to deprive the Constitution of the United States of its innate virtue and honor; to destroy its beauty and simplicity; and to transform it into a deformed and distorted something, the debate on this bill to renew the charter of the bank of the United States would have progressed to the end undisturbed by any intervention of mine. If a train of reasoning be adopted that tends to disturb this Constitution, and to give to it a construction and interpretation that it will not bear, it then becomes a duty to state opinions respecting it, and to vindicate the true intent and express understanding thereof.

The Constitution was solemnly and deliberately made by wise men, who composed the Convention, in the name of the people of the United States, and it was solemnly and deliberately ratified by conventions of the States respectively. It is simple and easy to be understood by any one who, knowing the objects and ends for which it was ordained, will candidly examine it. A defence of the Constitution is a defence of the great and good men who made it what it is; for, if the Constitution be dark, of obscure intent, and dubious meaning, it is not what it ought to have been. If it be dark, obscure, and dubious; if it be capable of inconsistent or contrary interpretation, the conventions of the ratifying States have not examined it with that careful attention which it required. Vain and empty surmises will evaporate, the characters of the men who made it being considered; the scrutinizing inquiries of the several ratifying conventions being contemplated, and by a candid examination, without prejudice, of the Constitution itself.

The Constitution is a compact between the individual States and the United States. It is the great charter and bill of rights delegated and given by the several States composing the Union to the United States. It contains rights, powers, and principles, to be acted on by the United States, in order to form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defence, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty; and we, "the people of the United States," have ordained and established it the Constitution of the United States of America.

The rights, powers, and principles, enumerated in the Constitution, are void of elasticity; they are firm, fixed, and unbending; they will not yield to discretion on various assumed constructions; unchangeable in their nature, intent, and object, they are mutable only by the Constitutional authorities.

"The enumeration in the Constitution of certain rights shall not be construed to deny or disparage others retained by the people"—article eleventh of the amendments to the Constitution. This article manifests that all the rights delegated to the United States are enumerated in the Constitution, and the enumerated rights shall not be construed to deny or disparage, to bring into disrepute, or diminish, other rights retained by the people; and to that end it is absolutely necessary that the rights delegated be expressly and distinctly enumerated, otherwise it would be impossible to ascertain and distinguish the rights delegated to the United States, and the rights reserved to the people. "The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the people"—article twelfth, amendment to the Constitution. By this article it is manifest that a power, not distinctly and expressly delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor expressly and distinctly prohibited by it to the States, is reserved to the States respectively, or to the people. These amendatory articles exclude and prohibit an assumption of discretionary powers; of constructive powers; and of all powers and rights not expressly and distinctly enumerated in the Constitution. By the word "power," or the word "right," is understood a fundamental principle of the Constitution; the Congress cannot change, alter, vary, or destroy it; it assumes form when it is clothed with a legislative act of the Congress, and ordered to operate.

It may be proper to notice some observations made in the course of this debate, which appeared to evidence a disposition to show that the Congress was vested with discretionary or constructive powers in matter of principle. It has been intimated that Congress had not power to disband an army, if the power was not assumed. If the Constitution had been well considered, this and other similar intimations would have been omitted. An army is raised in consequence of a law, bottomed on the clause in the eighth section of the said article, which empowers Congress to raise and support armies. By the eighth section, the Congress is empowered to "make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces." And the Congress is prohibited to make an appropriation of money to support an army for a longer term than two years. The Congress, acting on these powers, will disband an army. A law may be made to expire by a limitation in itself; if not, the Congress will make a law to repeal it. A law may be enacted to repeal the law whereby an army is raised, and then that army will be disbanded. The writ of habeas corpus is a prerogative writ of the people of the United States, and was in use previous to the existence of the Constitution; it is not prohibited by the Constitution to the people; it is a duty of the judiciary to issue writs of habeas corpus, proper cause being shown. The privilege of that writ does not depend on the clause in the ninth section of the first article of the Constitution; that clause only contains an express condition or reservation, that the Congress shall not suspend the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus, except when, in cases of rebellion or invasion, the public safety may require it. A writ of habeas corpus being issued by the judiciary, a law suspending the privilege of that writ is a law regulating the proceedings of the judiciary, and is bottomed on the powers vested in the Congress by force of the third article of the Constitution. "No bill of attainder or ex post facto law shall be passed." This is an express prohibition, and requires no illustration. "No title of nobility shall be granted by the United States." This, also, is an express prohibition. The Congress have power "to provide and maintain a navy," and to make rules for the government and regulation thereof; and to define and punish piracies and felonies committed on the high seas, and offences against the laws of nations;" and consequently to make rules and regulations for the government of seamen of every description. It has been asked, by what delegated power does Congress make laws to prevent settlers on lands, the Indian title whereof has not been extinguished? If the gentleman who made the inquiry had considered that land, the Indian title whereof was not extinguished, remained by treaty for the use of the Indian tribe until the extinguishment of title, and that, a treaty being a supreme law of the land, the Congress is empowered to give it complete effect, the inquiry probably would not have been made.

It is urged that a discretionary power is necessary to carry the enumerated powers into effect. If the discretionary power alluded to intends only a power to legislate on the delegated right or power, in a proper time and adequate manner, this is no more than a power to make laws to carry the delegated power into execution; but if by "discretionary power," is intended a power to assume at discretion a right, or principle, not enumerated in the Constitution, under pretence of carrying a delegated power into execution, it is denied that the Congress has that power; for if a delegated power cannot be carried into execution without assuming at discretion a right not delegated, it will only prove, that the Constitution in this respect, is deficient and requires amendment, and will not prove, that Congress to effect a measure, may at discretion do an unconstitutional act.

It has been argued, that the Convention left Congress to adopt the means, as circumstances might admit, to carry the delegated powers into effect. What is intended by the word means ought to have been explained in a Constitutional, not a discretionary manner. To produce an effect of a general nature the means ought to be commensurate and co-extensive. Water is a means to allay the thirst of all mankind; and there is no substitute. Ships and sea-vessels are a means of carrying on commerce between nations separated by the ocean, and there is no substitute. The Constitution vests Congress with power to regulate commerce with foreign nations, but no man will believe that, in virtue of that power alone, the Congress would attempt by a discretionary or a constructive power to adopt another principle, that is, to provide and maintain a navy to protect commerce.

The last clause of the eighth section is in the following words—"And to make all laws (that is, Congress shall have power to make all laws) which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by the Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof."

This is the clause which is called the sweeping clause, pretending to vest all powers and authorities, although not expressly enumerated. It may be proper here to inquire what is intended by the words "and all powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof," or what are the powers intended by the words "all other powers," inasmuch as it is probable that an opinion may have obtained, that by these words are understood some hidden occult powers, not expressly enumerated in the Constitution; that these powers are for the peculiar exercise of discretion, and that they are certain discretionary powers, to be discovered and assumed in extraordinary cases. If any such opinions are entertained, a careful examination of the Constitution will dissipate them. Powers other than those enumerated in the eighth section of the first article of the Constitution—these powers might all be mentioned—but that is unnecessary; some of them will be noticed. "Congress have power to provide by law for taking the census of all the people of the United States every ten years." Congress have power to appoint by law a day to convene other than the first Monday of December. To determine by law the time for choosing electors of President and Vice President of the United States. Section fourth of first article—"The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives, shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof, but the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators."

"To make laws respecting the District of Columbia." "To declare the punishment of treason." Several of those powers denominated "other powers," are enumerated in the ninth and tenth sections of the first article of the Constitution. Congress have power by law to establish courts inferior to the Supreme Court. Congress have power to make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory and other property of the United States. This enumeration may at present be sufficient to show what powers are intended by the words "other powers," and also to manifest incontrovertibly that the words "and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof," refer only to powers expressly and positively enumerated in the Constitution, and by it vested in the Government of the United States—that by these words are not understood, as some may have fondly imagined, any powers of discretion, fitted, when discovered, to fill chasms in the Constitution of the United States; and that by these words are not to be understood some concealed occult powers, waiting to be revealed by superior wisdom to meet particular purposes, for instance, the creation of the Bank of the United States, or to be dragged out by main force to support unconstitutional pretensions. In the Constitution are clearly expressed and enumerated all the powers, rights, and principles, which have been vested in the Government of the United States or in any department or officer thereof, by the individual States ratifying the Constitution. Nothing is left in obscurity or difficulty; and this Constitution is not elastic, it will not bend to discretionary opinions.

I will now, said Mr. RHEA, with all due respect, approach the main point of inquiry, viz: is a power or right to create the Bank of the United States, expressly enumerated, to be vested or intended to be vested in Congress by the eighth section of the first article of the Constitution. It may be previously observed, that if in the ninth section of the first article there had been even a negative expression or enumeration of power, or right inserted, empowering Congress to create the Bank of the United States; as if it had been stated in the words following, or words to the same effect—"Congress shall not create the Bank of the United States prior to the year one thousand eight hundred"—there might have been some reason to presume upon. But a negative expression of a power or right of that import is not in the ninth section enumerated, nor in any other section of the Constitution. The words in the eighth section of the first article of the Constitution, which have caused such amazing solicitude and inquiring anxiety to discover some obscure occult power or right to create the Bank of the United States there, are the following: "Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, to pay the debts, and provide for the common defence and general welfare of the United States," and (as expressed in the last clause of the section) to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, (that is, the powers enumerated in the eighth section) and all other powers (that is, powers enumerated in other sections of the first article, and enumerated in other articles of the Constitution) vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof."

Let these words be carefully and attentively examined, and all obscurity and difficulty will be removed; let them be connected in the manner they were intended to be connected, and no reason will be, to presume some unknown occult power, on which a pretension to create the Bank of the United States can exist. "Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes." Let the words be connected, so that they shall read, "Congress shall have power to make all laws necessary and proper to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises." Here, said Mr. R., a question presents itself, that is to say, for what purpose shall Congress have power to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises? The first clause gives the answer—"To pay the debts, and provide for the common defence and general welfare of the United States." The expression of the delegated power or right will then in plain and intelligible language be—"Congress shall have power to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, to pay the debts, and provide for the common defence and general welfare of the United States." This reading presents to the mind clear and distinct ideas, removes doubtful interpretation, and establishes the truth contained in this section of the Constitution. Let this reading be prefixed to every clause in the 8th section, and the propriety thereof will be more apparent; for instance, Congress shall have power to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper to borrow money on the credit of the United States, to pay the debts, and provide for the common defence and general welfare of the United States. And here let it be observed, that the words "for the common defence, and general welfare of the United States," are words of limitation and restriction, and not of amplification of powers; these words direct to the end for which all taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, shall be laid and collected, and it follows that taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, shall not be laid and collected for any purpose whatever other than to pay the debts and provide for the common defence and general welfare of the United States.

The rights, powers, and principles, delegated by the individual States to the United States, and enumerated in the Constitution, are substantial, not formal; and, being substance, are unchangeable in their nature, and must continue until altered by the Constitutional authorities. An institution or principle which has power to put bank paper in the place of gold and silver, is substantial—not formal—and never can be fixed as a form, by way of appendage to the business of collecting taxes, duties, imposts, or excises, or by way of appendage to aid commerce, or to borrow money. With as much propriety may it be said to aid in establishing a uniform rule of naturalization, or in making uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcies throughout the United States. A principle, or a right or power to create the Bank of the United States is not inserted or enumerated among the rights and powers enumerated in the eighth section of the first article, nor in any other section of the Constitution. Let it not then be presumed that the Convention who made the Constitution, or the ratifying States, did, in an occult and obscure manner, vest the Government of the United States with a right or power to create the Bank of the United States in the manner and form belonging to the bank, the charter of which labors to be renewed. The Constitution contains no enumeration of a principle which can give any pretence for such presumption.

In the eighth section of the first article are enumerated rights and powers of minor importance than a right to establish the Bank of the United States. The right to establish uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcies throughout the United States is of minor importance—that right is enumerated. Certainly, then, if the Convention, or the ratifying States, had designed to vest Congress with the right to create the Bank of the United States, that right would have been expressly enumerated in the Constitution.

By virtue of the eighth section of the first article of the Constitution: "Congress shall have power to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper to promote the progress of science and useful arts, by securing for limited times to authors and inventors the exclusive right to their respective writings and discoveries." The insertion of that right or power affords sufficient reason to conclude, that if the Convention had intended to delegate to the Congress a power or right to create the Bank of the United States, the right or power to establish it would certainly have been expressly enumerated in the Constitution. "The enumeration in the Constitution of certain rights shall not be construed to deny or disparage others retained by the people."—11th article of amendments to the Constitution. Here, then, it may properly be observed, that the rights enumerated in the Constitution are certain, that is, identically and distinctly enumerated rights, and that those rights shall not be by discretion construed to deny or disparage other rights reserved to the people. A right or power to establish the Bank of the United States is not enumerated in the Constitution; that right or power, therefore, is not denied to the people, and the certain rights enumerated in the Constitution shall not be construed to deny that right to the people, that is, to the people in their individual State capacities. "The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively or to the people."—12th article of amendments to the Constitution. The eighth section of the first article of the Constitution enumerates certain powers or rights delegated to the United States. The 10th section of the first article enumerates certain rights prohibited expressly or conditionally, to the respective States; but in the tenth section, or in any other section of the Constitution, a right to create bank institutions is not prohibited absolutely or conditionally to the respective States or to the people; that right therefore is not delegated to the United States, but is reserved to the respective States or to the people. The States respectively have legislated on that power and right reserved, and have established bank institutions, and the United States have not interfered to prevent them.

In the eighth section of the first article of the Constitution a right is enumerated. "The Congress shall have power to exercise exclusive legislation in all cases whatsoever, over such district (not exceeding ten miles square) as may, by cession of particular States, and the acceptance of Congress, become the seat of Government of the United States." The power delegated to the Congress by virtue and force of this clause, is eminently great, and requires no illustration to prove that Congress has power to create bank institutions in the District of Columbia.

In favor of a renewal of the charter of the Bank of the United States it is argued, that the Congress, having power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, has also power to establish the Bank of the United States as a means to aid in collecting taxes, duties, imposts, and excises. It will not be said that the Bank of the United States is an essential necessary means in collecting taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, for experience has proved that taxes have been collected without the aid of that bank. But if it be a means essentially necessary to collect taxes, it ought to be as extensive in operation as the law for collecting taxes. The nature of the bank institution proves that it cannot be coextensive with the law for collecting taxes. Ten dollars being the lowest sum for which a bill of that bank is issued, it is manifest that bills of ten dollars, twenty dollars, fifty dollars, and upwards, cannot aid generally in collecting and paying taxes; admitting the circulation of these bills to be coextensive with the operation of the law. The 10th section of the act entitled an act to incorporate the subscribers to the Bank of the United States, provides, "that the bills or notes of the said corporation, originally made payable, or which shall have become payable on demand, in gold or silver coin, shall be receivable in all payments to the United States." But, notwithstanding the bills or notes of that corporation shall be receivable in all payments to the United States, as is provided for in that section, the act alluded to does not provide that the bills or notes of that bank shall be receivable in all payments to citizens of the United States. The Bank of the United States, therefore, cannot be an adequate means to collect taxes from all the citizens of the United States, and, if not from all the citizens of the United States, the operation of the bank will be partial, and consequently injurious to the people.

By the 10th section of the law alluded to, the bills and notes of the corporation established by that law are made receivable in all payments to the United States. The bonds for payment of duties and imposts on foreign merchandise imported into the United States are generally deposited in the bank of that corporation or in the respective branches thereof. Whatever benefit or advantage, if any, arises by collection of those duties and imposts, accrues to that corporation; whatever gold and silver is paid on account of those duties and imposts, it remains at the disposition of the corporation, by reason that the corporation, by the law, are enabled to pay the amount of all the duties and imposts to the United States in bills and notes. These bills and notes afterwards come into the hands of the agents and public functionaries of the United States, and by them are paid to the citizens, and by this operation the bills and notes of the corporation obtain a circulation to a certain extent among the people, and, notwithstanding they may not be a legal tender in payment of debts by one citizen to another, do nevertheless acquire a degree of currency by being in the first instance made payable to the United States. By this operation, bottomed on the 10th section of the law, the corporation have the advantage of retaining the precious metals in their vaults until an opportunity offers to dispose of them to the best advantage, or to export them to foreign countries. Other observations might be made respecting the operation of the law incorporating the subscribers to the Bank of the United States; but what already has been observed may be sufficient to excite reflection on the machinery and influence of the mighty engine which the stockholders of the Bank of the United States have in their power at any time, for any purpose, to set in motion. The instrumentality of this engine pervades the United States in all elections; it can raise up and put down; it may say, "I can raise you to a conspicuous and exalted station, if you obey my directions, and if you do not, I can put you down." If an institution of this magnitude is good for the people of the United States—if its influence is for their benefit, let it be demonstrated. Suppose the citizens should refuse to receive the bills and notes of that corporation in payment of debts, what would be the consequence? Why, let us not say ruin to all would follow; but certainly many would be injured.

It has been said, that the Bank of the United States aids commerce. If it does, it must be in a manner very unimportant to the people of the United States in general. The bank may be a convenience to all who have to pay, in the first instance, duties and imposts on merchandise imported into the United States, and that benefit to them operates to throw on all the other people of the United States a prodigious mass of paper in place of gold and silver, the evident effect of which is to substitute the bills and notes of that bank in place of the precious metals; and to give that bank the power of commanding the medium of trade in the United States.

The action of the bank is within the United States and territories thereof; the bills and notes thereof, as has been observed, are made receivable in all payments to the United States; but the assumed position, "that the bank aids commerce," not satisfied with what has been said relative to the manner in which it aids commerce, returns and requires further explanation—and it is proper to give that explanation. The annual reports of the Secretary of the Treasury show the prodigious amount of goods, wares, and merchandise, every year imported into the United States from foreign countries, and particularly from Great Britain, and the dependencies and colonies thereof. Will any of the gentlemen who favor a renewal of the charter of the Bank of the United States, as it is called, inform this House, whether any part, and if any, what part, or to what amount of the cost of the goods, wares, and merchandise, imported into the United States, is actually paid for, to the merchants in foreign countries, to whom the orders are sent, in bills and notes of that bank, such as are passing among the people of the United States? If such payments are made in such bills and notes, then indeed there will be reason to contend, that that bank aids commerce in its operations. If that information is not obtained, it will be taken for granted, that no such payments are made in the bills or notes of that bank. The fact then appears to be, that the bills and notes of that bank do not pass out of the United States and territories thereof, to any foreign nation, in payment for the merchandise imported from that nation, and that no merchant of any foreign nation will receive bills and notes in payment for the merchandise ordered. The effect of all this is, that gold and silver is exported to foreign countries to pay for the goods, wares, and merchandise imported, after deducting from the gross amount of the value thereof that part which may have been paid for in produce of the United States. The consequence of which is, that the precious metals are drained from the United States, and the paper of the bank circulates among the people in the place of gold and silver. If that cause is suffered to continue to operate, a time may not be far distant when the paper of that bank will be the only visible medium of trade among the people; and a piece of gold or silver coin, (notwithstanding the Mint has issued great quantities thereof) will be rare to be seen. It has been said that the bank has been aiding to agriculture. If it be so, it is strange that the agricultural part of the community have sent no petitions or memorials to Congress praying for a renewal of the bank charter. From whom do all the petitions and memorials come? Not from agriculturists; not from all the merchants of the United States; but from persons interested in the continuation of that bank charter, and a portion of the merchants.

It has been urged that, if the bank charter is not renewed, ruin and destruction almost universally will fall on the people of the United States. These declarations, said Mr. R., affect me not, because I place no confidence in them. An agricultural people cannot be ruined, until it shall please the Almighty to prohibit the return of the seasons in their regular time, until it shall please Him to dry up the fountains of rain, and say there shall be no more seed time nor harvest. But if this bank is of such mighty force, that its fall will produce these direful effects, it is more prudent to meet them now, than to delay them to a future period. This nation is as well prepared to meet them now, as it will be hereafter.

It has been said, and insisted on, that the bank has aided the Government in its fiscal operations, and that the Government cannot well do, or do well, without it. Let it rather be said, that the Government has aided the bank, raised it into existence and afforded it every support, by placing in its hands the collection and deposition of the revenues of the Government for twenty years; by receiving from the bank its paper in place of gold and silver, and thereby leaving the gold and silver to be used to the benefit of the bank corporation. The bank may have been, to a certain extent, convenient in carrying on the fiscal operations of the Government, but it will not be said to be an institution profitable to the great mass of the people of the United States; neither will it be believed to be an institution aiding in its action and influence the Republican institutions of the people of the United States.

The law creating the Bank of the United States, or, in other words, the bank called the Bank of the United States, is not bottomed on the Constitution—it is inconsistent with, and repugnant to the Constitution. A Constitutional government requires no aid—can have no aid from an unconstitutional principle. The great men who made the Constitution, and the ratifying States, have declared, that as it is, they made and ratified it, and the people of the United States adopted it for the purpose therein enumerated and delegated; and if the Government cannot exist in virtue and by force of the powers, rights, and principles expressly enumerated and delegated in the Constitution, without the aid of a principle violating the Constitution, it is time that there should be another grand convention, with powers to make another Constitution. But in my opinion, said Mr. R., the rights, powers, and principles, expressly enumerated and delegated in the Constitution, are completely adequate to all intents and purposes for the existence of the Government, without the aid of any principle inconsistent with and repugnant to the Constitution.

Mr. McKEE.—Mr. Speaker, having once troubled the House on this subject, it is not without much regret that I ask the attention of gentlemen to a few more remarks before the question is taken.

The opposers of this bill have uniformly contended against the exercise of a power under the Constitution which is not expressly delegated to Congress by the letter of the Constitution. This position cannot be maintained by the experience of what is past; nor can it be adhered to in future; or in the management of the affairs of this Government. And I conjure gentlemen to pause, before they give a construction to the Constitution, which they themselves have, on other occasions, violated; and which they will be compelled again to violate, or desert the best and dearest interest of their country.

Sir, the Territory of Louisiana has been purchased since the commencement of the Republican Administration; and this act constitutes one of their strongest titles to the fair fame with which they are surrounded. And yet I ask where (according to the construction contended for) is the power under the Constitution which could authorize the mode of this acquisition? Will any gentleman point it out to me? For I confess I cannot perceive it. I know Congress are expressly empowered by the Constitution to declare war; and the power to declare war includes the power to acquire territory by the successful result of that war. And hence it would seem to follow that the Government may, with propriety, attain the same end by treaty or purchase, which they could effect by force. But this power is certainly a constructive one, to be collected from the reason and not the letter of the Constitution. And therefore, according to the doctrine inculcated, it cannot be used.

Congress have also laid a general embargo; and whence, I ask, is the power authorizing this act derived? It certainly cannot be justified under the general power, delegated by the Constitution to Congress, to regulate commerce; because a general embargo during its continuance puts an end to all commerce. And it is perfectly absurd to say, that the general delegation of power to regulate commerce, includes the power to suspend it altogether. But the Constitution has delegated to Congress the power to provide for the general welfare, and common defence; and a withdrawal of the property as well as the persons of our citizens from the ocean in times of difficulty and danger, by means of a general embargo, thereby reserving to the country the resources as well as physical force of the people unimpaired, is, in fact, providing for the general welfare and common defence. And hence results the power exercised by Congress of laying an embargo. But, sir, this is also a constructive power, not expressly delegated to Congress by the Constitution; and therefore, by the doctrine contended for by the opposers of this bill, cannot be exercised.

JANUARY, 1811.

Bank of the United States.

H. OF R.

Congress have built a house for the President of the United States, that would, in point of size and magnificence, beggar anything to be found at St. James's or elsewhere. They have established post offices in all the States of the Union, and by law exempted the postmasters from serving on-juries as well as performing military duty; by this means creating an influence in the interior of the States, without any express delegation of power, authorizing the act; and therefore (according to the construction contended for on this occasion) unauthorized and unconstitutional.

I might proceed to enumerate a long catalogue of cases, in which Congress have exercised powers under the Constitution which were not expressly delegated, but drawn entirely from the reason, spirit, and essence of the instrument; and justified alone in their fitness and efficacy to carry into effect some of the great class of powers delegated to Congress by the Constitution. The people of the United States have experienced the most happy consequences, arising solely from the exercise of those constructive powers, against which some gentlemen now declaim with so much apparent zeal; and which are certainly less tortured and far-fetched, than the construction for which those gentlemen so pertinaciously contend.

When we view the past we find that all parties have uniformly given the same practical construction to the Constitution.

Washington, the great Father of his Country, Mr. Jefferson. Mr. Gallatin, and all the magistracy of the United States, including both Houses of Congress, have given directly or indirectly the same construction to the Constitution; and with these illustrious examples and precedents before me, I cannot arrogate to myself the self-sufficiency to disregard or distrust them, and make out some new, utopian, untried theory, sanctioned neither by reason, experience nor policy; believing it to be more safe to pursue the old and beaten track, than to adopt untried experiments, particularly in a case of a doubtful nature. I admit that Congress ought not to look for the Constitution in your statute book, or in the fugitive pages of your Journal, but to the instrument itself. But, sir, where a construction has been given to this instrument by its great father, and where that construction has been ratified by the sovereign voice of the people, it should remain unchanged.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. SMILIE) has endeavored to assimilate the power now attempted to be exercised to that exercised in the adoption of the odious alien and sedition laws, (as they have generally been called.) And if, sir, the gentleman had forgotten (as he seems to have done) the first article in the amendments to the Constitution of the United States, then indeed, his parallel would have been an appropriate one, differing from the construction now contended for, only in the signal circumstance, that the alien and sedition laws, in their practical operation, tended to abridge the liberty of the citizen, whilst the bank is a matter of policy alone.

But these alien and sedition laws were in direct hostility to the first article in the amendment to the Constitution, which is in the following words: "Congress shall make no law respecting the establishment of religion or prohibiting the free exercise thereof, or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press." This prohibitory article shows the real difference between the two cases.

Much sensibility has been manifested in relation to State rights, which, it is apprehended, will be prostrated by the renewal of this charter. Sir, I am a friend to State rights, in the safe and inviolable preservation of which we have the surest guarantee for the perpetuity of this Government. But, sir, I ask if there are not extremes on this subject? And whilst we are guarding against Scylla with care and solicitude, is there no danger of falling on Charybdis? Are not the power and influence of some of the States now almost paramount to the power and influence of the General Government? By your refusal to renew the charter of the United States' Bank, you considerably enhance this power in the hands of the great States. Your revenue is then to be collected and deposited in State banks. About one-third of it will be collected by the State of Pennsylvania, and will be deposited in her banks. And those banks are, as they relate to you, entirely foreign banks. You have no control whatsoever over them or any of them. But the State of Pennsylvania has a control over them; and consequently Pennsylvania, (if you destroy the charter,) has in her fangs the purse of the nation; which, as the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. EPPES) says, constitutes the sinews of war. Pennsylvania possesses within herself the physical force; a force that would be formidable to the whole United States, were it arrayed against them. And is it entirely without precedent, for the destinies of one State to be wielded by a single individual? If it is not, then the destinies of Pennsylvania, holding as she will both the purse and the sword, might be wielded by some ambitious and assuming man. And if such an event should happen, which God forbid! where then are your political liberties? Precisely as safe and secure as if they were lodged in the hands of Napoleon the Great!

H. OF R.

Bank of the United States.

JANUARY, 1811.

What constitutes the power and influence of a State? Certainly money and physical force are the principal and most requisite ingredients; and by refusing to renew the charter, you throw into the hands of the great States all the additional influence from the resources of the nation being confided to their hands. And at the same time you reduce to the condition of mere cyphers the States of North Carolina, Tennessee, Ohio, Kentucky, and all the New England States except Massachusetts, by withdrawing entirely from their control and management the public purse of the nation.

I do not wish, Mr. Speaker, to be understood to entertain or insinuate any distrust whatsoever of the integrity or loyalty of the great and respectable State of Pennsylvania.

If, sir, the destinies of this nation are to become dependent on any one State in the Union, I have no predilection for any State: I have no unwillingness that Pennsylvania should be that State. But, sir, I protest solemnly against holding, by so feeble and precarious a tenure, the great and inestimable privileges of self-government.

But, it is said, we may console ourselves with the improbability of this great State's making any improper use of the powers vested in their hands, by a refusal to renew this charter. Sir, when at peace with foreign nations, whilst harmony prevails at home, no immediate danger is to be apprehended; but when your political horizon is black with internal tumult, when you are menaced with external danger, and treason stalks abroad with gigantic strides, it is then that the colossal power of the great States become most eminently dangerous; it is then that it may be exercised to the utter humiliation of the little States, and the subversion of your Federal Government, by withholding from your hands the fiscal resources of the nation. To guard, when it may be practicable, against possible events so disastrous, becomes the imperious duty of every sound and honest politician.

There is a view of this question which strikes me with great force, and to mention which was my principal motive in rising at this time. It has been repeatedly stated by the opposers of this bill, that the revenue could, with equal facility, be collected through the agency of the State banks. Is it then their object to deposite the public money in State banks? I pause for a reply. The silence which pervades this Hall, solemnly answers this question in the affirmative. It is, then, intended to deposite the revenue and resources of the United States of America in the coffers of State banks! I say this is dangerous, unjust and manifestly partial.

The President, Directors, and Company of the United States' Bank offer you $1,500,000 to renew their charter; and in the bill, now before you, a privilege is reserved to the United States of increasing this stock, by a contribution of $5,000,000, on the part and for the benefit of the United States. The profit arising from the sale of this stock, if you are disposed to sell it, would be more than $1,000,000. Suppose, then, that the United States' Bank would be willing to give $1,000,000 for the banking privilege alone, (which seems to me to be a very large allowance,) the remaining one million two hundred and fifty thousand dollars are given to the United States, for the benefit arising to the bank from the deposits of the public money.

This sum will be increased to at least $2,000,000, or perhaps $3,000,000 or $4,000,000, by that part of the bill before you, requiring the Bank of the United States to pay interest at the rate of three per cent. on all sums which may remain in the hands of the bank longer than one year. This increased sum, arising out of the use of public money, is as much the bona fide property of the people of the United States as any other portion of their revenue. The proportion of this sum, to which my constituents (the people of Kentucky) are entitled, is about $100,000. And it is now gravely proposed to wrest this sum from their hands, not for the public service or public good, but for the express purpose of putting it into the pockets of the wealthy capitalists of Pennsylvania!—the State bank stockholders of Massachusetts, Maryland, and Virginia! Will the people cheerfully acquiesce in this unjust prostitution of their honest earnings? If they do, I have mistaken their character.

When these are some of the consequences which are seen to result from a refusal to renew the charter of the United States' Bank, no man can be much at a loss to account for the instructions given by Virginia, Massachusetts, and Pennsylvania, to their Senators and Representatives in Congress.

My friend (Mr. JOHNSON) has informed you, that a renewal of this charter would be granting an exclusive privilege to a few stockholders, and exclusive privileges are odious. If my worthy friend would only examine the bill now before you, he would find that it is not an exclusive privilege. For Congress have therein reserved to themselves the power to establish a new bank whenever policy or prudence shall dictate its necessity or expediency; and this power reserved by Congress, of establishing a new bank, will insure to the United States a prudent and faithful management of the money which it is proposed to confide to the direction of the President, Directors, and Company of the United States' Bank; which, it is acknowledged by the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. EPPES,) has hitherto been managed with great propriety.

The gentleman from Virginia (Mr. EPPES) stated that this question was originally decided as a party question. In this the gentleman is certainly mistaken. It was not originally considered a party question. In order to satisfy my own mind on this subject, I have examined the Journal of Congress for the year 1791; which has been explained to me by the gentleman from North Carolina, (Mr. MACON,) the oldest member in this House. And I find there were thirty-nine votes in favor of the bank originally; of which, eleven were Republican; and of the nineteen who voted against it, six were Federal. The fact proves without doubt that this question was not decided by party principles. But why, I ask, are such unceasing efforts made to prove this a party question? Is the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. EPPES,) whose argument on this subject was directed principally to this point, fearful of a diminution of his customary weight in the scale of discussion, or of the insufficiency of his reasoning and argumentative powers to draw his friends with him on this question? And is he therefore compelled to resort to this argument, as a means of whipping into the track those who are disposed to obey the honest convictions of their own judgments? If such be his object, I can only say for myself, that I am drawn along with that gentleman, by the cords of reason, policy, and common sense alone. And, where these are too weak, I cannot be seduced from my own opinion, by the fascinating eloquence of any man, or any system of proscription or denunciation, however formidable it may be either in plan or operation.

Bank of the United States.

H. OF R.

It has been fashionable for gentleman on this floor, when speaking of party, to declare they were not party men. But, sir, I acknowledge I am a party man. And I have no hesitation in declaring that I belong to the people's party. It is for the promotion of the happiness and prosperity of the people of Kentucky in particular, and of the whole United States in general, that my services are rendered in this House. And if on this or any other occasion, the true interests of the people of Kentucky have been misunderstood by me, they will, as I know they can, select from among themselves some individual possessing more wisdom to perceive, and an inclination to pursue the means best calculated to promote the interest, happiness, and increasing prosperity of my country. And should they adopt such a measure as salutary or expedient, their decision would receive my most sincere respect and acquiescence.

It is for the protection and promotion of the best interests of my country, and of my constituents, that I have again presented myself before this House, to give a last and perhaps a feeble view of the impolicy and the deleterious consequences of the act which I fear is now about to be done.

Before I sit down, permit me to advise my political friends, who vote with me on this occasion, (for I have no right to administer advice to others,) to suffer the decisive vote now to be taken on this great and much agitated question. We have given this bill all the support constitutionally within our power; let the majority, if against us, now decide, and take on themselves that awful weight of responsibility, which awaits their decision. And if the affections of the people should, on account of the frequent appeals made to their passions and prejudices, recede for a moment, from us, it cannot but be to us a consolatory reflection, that we have discharged, with honesty and fidelity, our duty to our country. And that when reason and reflection may have resumed once more their empire, we will again be surrounded with the confidence and gratitude of the people.

Messrs. SMILIE and MACON spoke in favor of the indefinite postponement of the bill, and Mr. QUINCY against it.

About five o'clock the question was taken, and carried in the affirmative—yeas 65, nays 64, as follows:

And then the House adjourned until to-morrow morning eleven o'clock.

FRIDAY, January 25.

The bill from the Senate, entitled "An act authorizing the discharge of Nathaniel F. Fosdick from his imprisonment," was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

The bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of William Mills," was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole last mentioned.

Mr. JOHN PORTER presented a petition of sundry inhabitants of Philadelphia, to the same effect with the petition of the Synod of Pittsburg, presented the fourth instant; which was read.

BANKS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the several bills for the incorporation of banks in the District of Columbia.

The bill for continuing the charter of the Bank of Alexandria was first taken up, and gone through without opposition.

The bill to incorporate the Bank of Washington, was next taken up.

Various amendments were proposed, &c.

Mr. ROOR said, that this bill proposed a contract between the Government and individuals. If any advantage was to accrue from it to the individuals on the one part, it ought also to accrue, reciprocally to the Government. Unquestionably, the grant of a charter to the bank would raise the value of their stock very considerably. He therefore moved the following as an amendment to the bill:

"And provided, also, That the President and Directors of said Bank shall pay to the Commissioners of the City of Washington the sum of fifty thousand dollars, for the improvement of roads and bridges in said City."

Mr. VAN HORN said he did not know whether it was necessary to say anything in opposition to this motion, but he would state how Maryland had managed matters of this kind. Instead of requiring a bonus from the banks, they had generally become subscribers to their stock. Virginia was also a stockholder in her bank. On each side of the District, therefore, the States had not only incorporated banks without receiving premiums therefor, but had assisted their citizens in establishing banks. As to the tax proposed to be levied on the District, Mr. VAN H. said, he hoped the House were so strongly impressed with a sense of the justice due to the District, that they would not accede to the proposition. The people of the District had no other body than Congress to whom they could look for that attention to their welfare, which other parts of the Union experienced from State Legislatures.

Mr. McKIM said he felt very little disposition to interfere in this business; but it seemed to him there must be something improper in the amendment; for, from what they had lately heard of the benefits of a bank, the Government ought to pay the stockholders fifty thousand dollars for the institution of the bank, instead of the stockholders paying them.

Mr. ROOR modified his motion so as to leave the sum blank. The conduct of Maryland might influence the gentleman from Maryland in his vote; but the Legislature of New York had taken the boon, had received money for giving charters, and applied it to useful purposes, to the support of a common school. But even Maryland derived a profit from the course it took, because it had the privilege of receiving a profit on so much of their stock, without any of the trouble. In no case, however, had heretofore occurred an opportunity, now offered, to set the example in relation to all the banks in the District, except the Bank of Columbia, and the same course might be pursued with it when its charter expired. Mr. R. said he did not wish to compel them to accept charters, for if they did not choose to accept them, they might go on, as hitherto, without them.

Mr. LOVE and Mr. WRIGHT also spoke against the amendment, and Mr. HOLLAND, in favor of it. The amendment was negatived—47 to 29.

The bill was gone through, as also were the bills to incorporate the Bank of Potomac, the Farmers' Bank of Alexandria, and the Union Bank of Georgetown.

The Committee rose, and reported the bills to the House.

Mr. SMILIE protested against hurrying bills of so much importance through the House on one day; and moved an adjournment, which was carried.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 26.

Another member, to wit: from Massachusetts, EDWARD ST. LOE LIVERMORE, appeared, and took his seat.

A motion was made by Mr. P. B. PORTER that the House do now adjourn; and the question being taken thereon, it was determined in the negative—yeas 17, nays 61.

Mr. BASSETT laid on the table the following preamble and resolution of the Legislature of Virginia:

"The General Assembly of Virginia view with the most serious concern the late attempts which have been made to obtain from Congress a renewal of the charter incorporating the Bank of the United States:

"This Assembly are deeply impressed with the conviction that the original grant of that charter was unconstitutional; that Congress have no power whatever to renew it; and that the exercise of such a power would be not only unconstitutional, but a dangerous encroachment on the sovereignty of the States; Therefore,

"Resolved, That the Senators of this State, in the Congress of the United States, be instructed, and our Representatives most earnestly requested, in the execution of their duties, as faithful Representatives of their country, to use their best efforts in opposing, by every means in their power, the renewal of the charter of the Bank of the United States."

On motion of Mr. EPPES, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill making appropriations for the support of the Military Establishment for the year 1811; the bill making appropriations for the support of the Naval Establishment of the United States, for the year 1811; and the bill for the support of Government for 1811. These bills were severally reported with amendments, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The bill to incorporate the Protestant Episcopal Church of Alexandria was ordered to a third reading.

The last report of the Secretary of the Treasury, on the subject of the Bank of the United States, containing a suggestion relative to the supposed currency of the notes of the Bank of the United States posterior to the expiration of the charter, made on Thursday, was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. BARRY presented a petition of sundry inhabitants of Fayette county, in Kentucky, praying the renewal of the charter of the Bank of the United States; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. BARRY also presented a petition of the mechanics and manufacturers of Lexington in Kentucky, praying the patronage and aid of Congress in the various manufacturing establishments erected within the United States.—Referred to the Committee on Commerce and Manufactures.

The following Message from the President of the United States, received yesterday, was read, and is as follows:

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

I transmit to the House of Representatives a report of the Superintendent of the City, stating the expenditures under the act of April 28, 1810, for the better accommodation of the General Post Office, and Patent Office, and for other purposes.

JAMES MADISON.

JANUARY 10, 1811.

The SPEAKER presented to the House a letter from J. Brooks, of the State of Kentucky, presenting, for the information of the Government, sundry papers in relation to the falls of the river Ohio, and soliciting that they may meet with such attention and consideration as the importance of the subject may seem to require; which letter was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. MONTGOMERY presented a petition of sundry inhabitants of Cecil county, in the State of Maryland, praying the attention and assistance of the National Legislature to the completion of the Delaware and Chesapeake Canal; which was referred to a Committee of the whole House on the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act authorizing the sale and grant of a certain quantity of public land to the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal Company."

On motion of Mr. JENNINGS,

Resolved, That the Committee on the Public Lands be, and they are hereby, instructed to inquire into the expediency of vesting the township of land in the district of Vincennes, located by the Secretary of the Treasury for the support of a seminary of learning, in the Legislature of the Indiana Territory, or in some other body politic, and their successors, for the purpose for which the same was reserved and located.

Mr. POINDESTER presented a memorial of the Legislature of the Mississippi Territory, praying the extension of pre-emption rights to such persons as have unavoidably been compelled to settle on lands belonging to the United States within the said Territory; which was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. ROOR, from the Committee of Claims, presented a bill for the relief of Charles Minifie; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Friday next.

Mr. EPES presented to the House two letters from the Secretary of the Treasury, to the Committee of Ways and Means, transmitting sundry additional estimates of appropriations for the service of the present year.

An engrossed bill to change the name of Lewis Grant, to that of Lewis Grant Davidson, was read the third time, and passed.

MONDAY, January 28.

Another member, to wit: from Massachusetts, EZÉKIEL WHITMAN, appeared, and took his seat.

On motion of Mr. McBRIDE,

Resolved, That the Committee on the Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing, by law, a Board of Commissioners, to ascertain and settle the claims to land in that tract to which the Indian title has been extinguished, lying within the State of Tennessee, South and West of the line established between the United States and the State of Tennessee, by an act of Congress, bearing date the eighteenth of April, 1806, commonly called the Congressional Reserve; and that the committee have leave to report by bill, or otherwise.

Mr. MORROW also presented a petition of sundry inhabitants of the third township of the eighth range in Washington county, State of Ohio, praying that the number twenty-six of the said township may be granted them for religious purposes.—Referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

On motion of Mr. SEYBERT,

Ordered, That the Clerk of this House cause to be reprinted, for the use of the members, the usual number of copies of "A list of the names of persons who have invented any new or useful art, machine, manufacture, or composition of matter, or any improvement thereon, and to whom patents have issued for the same, from the office of the Secretary of State, prior to the twenty-third day of January, 1803, with the dates and general objects of such patents," which list was communicated to this House by the Secretary of State on the twenty-third day of January aforesaid.

Mr. JENNINGS presented a petition of sundry inhabitants of the Indiana Territory, praying that a road may be opened and made at the expense of the United States, from Jeffersonville, in said Territory, to Detroit, in Michigan Territory.—Referred to a select committee.

Mr. JENNINGS, Mr. SAMUEL SMITH, and Mr. SCUDDER were appointed the said committee.

EXTENSION OF PATENT RIGHTS.

Mr. MITCHILL, from the committee to whom was referred, on the 17th instant, the petition of Benjamin Tyler, jr., and John Tyler, made a report thereon; which was read, and referred to the Committee of the whole House on the bill for the encouragement of learning and the promotion of the useful arts.

The report is as follows:

These persons state that, prior to the 20th of February, 1800, Benjamin Tyler had made a useful invention in the manner of constructing mills for grinding of wheat and other grain. On that day he obtained letters patent, according to law, for the same. He afterward made an assignment of the same, in due form, to the petitioners.

They further represent the necessity they felt to attempt the protection of their right, by bringing a suit against one of the several persons who had violated their privileges. They believe the defendant to have been supported by a combination of interested men. By the operation of various dilatory measures, the action, though brought on in 1804, was protracted until 1810, and eventually a verdict, which had been given for the plaintiff, was set aside by the court. The expenses and costs incurred by the petitioners, in the course and event of these proceedings, were very oppressive.

But this was not all. During the time this law-suit lasted, the reality of their alleged and patented invention became suspected, and misrepresentations were industriously prosecuted against it, to a great extent, and they thereby suffered grievous inconvenience and injury.

There was yet another aggravation of their case. The patent being limited, by the very terms of its grant, to fourteen years, approaches the term of expiration; at that time, the whole benefit of the invention will be lost to the inventor, and his assignees; and they request that, under the extreme hardship of their situation, involved in controversy, deprived of time, exhausted of money, persecuted by opposition, and disappointed in their expectations, aggravated by the shortness of their patent's duration, they may be indulged with a renewal of their privileges for another term of fourteen years, by a special statute in their favor.

By various and respectable testimonials, accompanying the memorial, it appears that the improvement under consideration, known by the name of "Tyler's patent wry-fly wheel," has been found to be very useful in the mechanism of corn, and wheat, and paper mills. It is simple and cheap in its construction; less liable to want repairs; and more secure from the action of frost; while it combines strength with celerity of motion, supersedes the necessity of the large water-wheel and ordinary cog-wheels, and performs the same work with half the water that is required for an under-shot wheel.

The committee, on weighing these several matters, are of opinion that the case of the petitioners comes within the spirit of the provision contained in the Constitution for the benefit of inventors and discoverers. The merit of the application is enhanced by the tedious and expensive law-suits in which he has the misfortune to be entangled. It is, at the same time, very questionable, whether Congress ought to indulge the practice, already begun, of legislating upon individual cases. It would be more correct and convenient to provide for the renewal of letters patent by a general regulation. There will be no end to applications of this kind, while the patent laws remain in their present imperfect state; while, by a discreet and early revision of them, this and all other similar cases, may be fully comprehended. By this means sound legislation will most effectually subserve the interest of the citizen. A mode of renewal has already been recommended, and forms a distinct section of the "bill for the encouragement of learning, and the promotion of the useful arts," now lying in Committee of the whole House. It is, therefore, recommended to agree to the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the request of the petitioners is reasonable, and ought to be granted.

Resolved, That provision ought to be made, by law, for the renewal of letters patent, in favor of inventors and discoverers, in certain cases.

The bill making appropriations for the support of the Military Establishment for the year 1811; the bill making appropriations for the support of the Navy of the United States for the year 1811; the bill making appropriations for the support of Government for the year 1811; the bill for incorporating the Protestant Episcopal Church of Alexandria; were severally read a third time, and passed.

UNADJUSTED BALANCES.

Mr. SWOOPÉ offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Comptroller of the Treasury be directed to inform the House whether any, and, if any, what, steps have been taken to effect a settlement at the Treasury Department of the accounts of Joel Barlow, late Agent at Algiers, and Charles Pinckney, late Minister to Spain, and what amount of unliquidated balances remains on the books of the Treasury against the said Joel Barlow.

Mr. BACON said he had no objection to the resolution, as far as it went, but that other items might be, with propriety, added to it. To allow time to prepare such an amendment, as appeared to him proper, he moved that it lie on the table.

Mr. SWOOPÉ said, he had no objection to inquire into other causes of delinquency, but he had a particular view to these two. In the case of Mr. Pinckney he did not know that the balance against him would be increased; but, in relation to Mr. Barlow, he had been informed that it would appear that the balance against him of $360,000 now standing, would be increased by an additional amount of $370,000. He was opposed to the resolution lying on the table, and wished the gentleman to offer his amendment at this time.

Mr. BACON said it was rather hard to be called on at this moment to act upon the resolution, and to extract, from so long a list of defaulters, those cases which he deemed most proper to be inquired into. Whatever knowledge the gentleman from Virginia might have acquired from out-of-door informants, Mr. B. said, he had none such, and could not, at a moment's notice, prepare the amendment which he wished to propose.

Mr. QUINCY said, if any benefit could arise from the motion's lying on the table, he would agree to it, but, because it was desirable to extend the inquiry, was no reason why this resolution should not be adopted. It was, in no instance, a good reason against entering into an inquiry in relation to one individual, that others were implicated.

Mr. MITCHELL was in favor of the resolution's lying on the table, not that he had any aversion to the inquiry into the conduct of those gentlemen, or any other, in relation to expenditures of the public money. He wished time, however, to judge whether it was proper or not. This subject had been long before the public eye without requiring inquiry, and he wished to ascertain whether it was now necessary or not.

Mr. SHEFFEY believed the inquiry ought to embrace not only the persons named, but all others to whom balances were reported to be due. And, if it was in order, he should move an amendment to that effect.

Mr. MACON said it was but reasonable to vote for the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts, who wished the resolution to lie on the table that he might have time to prepare an amendment. This was no great indulgence, for it was what took place every day in the House. As for himself, Mr. M. said, he should like to know the state of all those balances. Wherever anything was due, and payments withheld, suits ought to be commenced.

Mr. BACON withdrew his motion to lie on the table, with a view to admit Mr. SHEFFEY's amendment.

Mr. SHEFFEY then moved to strike out so much of the resolution as alludes, by name, to Messrs. Barlow and Pinckney, and insert the following:

"The several persons engaged in the service of the United States abroad, intrusted with public money, against whom balances appear on the books of the Treasury Department."

Mr. PITKIN was in favor of the proposed amendment. He said gentlemen would recollect the accounts of Tobias Lear, which were laid before the House some time ago, which were the most extraordinary accounts he had ever seen, and of which he did not believe the public had any idea, before they were published. A large sum was now charged, in the Comptroller's report, to the debit of Mr. Lear. Mr. P. said, he wished to know whether these accounts, to a large amount, had passed the Treasury; because, if they had, the subject certainly required the interposition of the House. It was true, that the accounts of agents abroad could not be settled so expeditiously as those at home, but it was proper that the House should know how and when they were settled. The amount of money expended by the United States along the coast of Barbary had been immense; and, if the accounts of Mr. Barlow were not yet settled, it was extraordinary indeed. But, Mr. P. said, he wished to see a full statement of all these balances, and therefore had moved the resolution.

Mr. EPPES said, that he too wished to see all these accounts, and also another item, viz: the account of the expenses attending the first treaty with Algiers. If the information he had in relation to it was correct, it would be found that there had been, under that treaty, some expenditures of a more extraordinary kind than any in modern times. He, therefore, moved to add to the amendment of Mr. SHEFFEY the following words: "And also the expenses of the treaty with Algiers."

Mr. QUINCY was opposed to the motions for amendment, and that on a general principle. He had no objection to call for the information they embraced; but, if it was the wish of the House to prevent specific inquiry into the conduct of a particular individual, they could not do better than to load the inquiry with a crowd of other matters not at all relating to it. He had no objection to vote for this information, if proposed separately; but he was averse to connecting with this particular resolution any general inquiry embracing a variety of objects.

Mr. EPPES said that he was misunderstood, if it was supposed he intended, by his motion, to screen any person from inquiry.

Mr. QUINCY said, he had not attributed such an intention to him.

Mr. EPPES continued.—If any inquiry was made, what ought it to be? Were Joel Barlow or Charles Pinckney the only persons against whom balances were reported? No; there was a volume of such cases. A gentleman came forward, and, instead of taking the whole, had selected two individuals for inquiry. Mr. E. did not consider this a proper course of proceeding; for certainly any inquiry on the subject ought to embrace all the cases. There was another objection to this inquiry; because every one knew that these sums were not due by the persons to whom they were debited. It was not six months since a balance much larger than the amount in this case, was exhibited against Timothy Pickering, which, however, had since been adjusted. No doubt these moneys had all been accounted for, but no final settlement had yet taken place. Mr. E. thought the amendment of his colleague perfectly right, because it proposed to pass in review the whole of the cases.

Mr. PICKMAN moved that the subject should lie on the table, because it appeared to him to be leading to a discussion which would occupy the day.

The motion was agreed to, and the resolution was ordered to lie on the table.

BANKS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

On motion of Mr. LEWIS, the House resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee of the Whole on bills for incorporating several banks within the District of Columbia.

Mr. RANDOLPH moved to recommit the bills to a select committee, on the ground of defect in the details.

MESSRS. RANDOLPH, SMILIE, BACON, CHEVES, and STANLEY, supported the recommitment, and MESSRS. LEWIS, LOVE, KEY, VAN HORN, SHEFFEY, GHOLSON, and WRIGHT, opposed it.

Mr. SHEFFEY called for a division of the question on the motion, so as to take the question separately on the recommitment of the bill for the extension of the charter of the Bank of Alexandria.

On the question, there were for recommitment, 43; against it, 53.

The question was next taken separately on recommitting the rest of the bills, and carried, by majorities of five, ten, and fifteen.

Before the question was taken on the Alexandria Bank bill, it being rather a late hour, (past four,) the House adjourned.

H. OF R.

Amendment to the Constitution.

JANUARY, 1811.

TUESDAY, January 29.

Mr. GOLD, from the committee appointed on the seventeenth instant, presented a bill providing for the more convenient taking of affidavits and bail in civil causes depending in the courts of the United States; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Saturday next.

A motion was made by Mr. HAVEN that the House do now adjourn; and, the question being taken, it was determined in the negative—yeas 19, nays 59.

Mr. FISK moved that the House do come to the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State cause to be printed, for the use of this House, one thousand copies of the returns of the third census, as soon as the same shall be received at the Department of State.

The resolution was read, and ordered to be postponed until Wednesday, the 6th of next February.

Mr. EPPES, from the Committee of Foreign Relations, reported the following section as a proper amendment to the bill "supplemental to the act concerning the commercial intercourse between the United States and Great Britain and France, and for other purposes." Strike out the ninth section and insert:

"And be it further enacted, That no vessel owned wholly by a citizen or citizens of the United States, which shall have departed from a British port, prior to the second day of February next, and no merchandise owned wholly by a citizen or citizens of the United States imported in such vessel, shall be liable to seizure or forfeiture on account of any infraction or presumed infraction of the provisions of this act or of the act to which this act is a supplement."

AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION.

Mr. WRIGHT.—Believing, as I do, that the Constitution of the United States is not perfect, and as provision is made in the body of the instrument for amending its imperfections, in the manner therein prescribed, I feel it an imperious duty to propose an amendment to it. Here let me remark, that its adoption was opposed by the patriots of America, at the time of its ratification, because of omissions important to liberty. It had not guarded against an establishment of religion; it had not secured the right of the people to keep and bear arms; it had not guarded against soldiers being quartered in our houses in time of peace, without our consent, it had not guarded against warrants being issued without oath; it had not guarded against a man's being put to answer without previous indictment; it had not secured the criminal in the trial by jury; it had not secured the trial by jury in cases of common law, and these omissions as due guards to the liberty of the citizens stand recorded in these amendments almost coeval with the instrument. The terms Federal and anti-Federal had their origin in the zeal of the respective parties at that time; the one insisting on its adoption with all these imperfections on its head, while the other insisted on these amendments; and it has always appeared to me, that on the adoption of the amendments that those who were called anti-Federals were really the Federals, the Constitution being perfected by the adoption of these amendments. The foregoing amendments test its original imperfection, and I trust will lead this House to a temperate examination of the amendment I now propose to submit.

The amendment, sir, is to place the judiciary of the United States on the same foundation that the British judiciary are placed by their laws; by enabling the President, on the joint address of the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States, to remove a judge.

In England the judges held their commissions during the pleasure of the Crown, till the time of Charles the First, when the Parliament imposed upon the King the necessity of granting them during good behaviour; till then the Crown, as the fountain of justice, held the uncontrolled direction of the commissions of the judges. At the same time, sir, the High Commission Court and Star Chamber were abolished. In the thirteenth year of William the Third, the judges, by statute, were to hold their commissions during good behaviour, and by the same statute they may be removed by the joint address of both Houses of Parliament; and here let me remark, that under that tenure and responsibility, the British judiciary have attained a celebrity in history for their judicial integrity and correctness highly honorable to them, and which this amendment, I fondly hope, in time, may correctly attach to the judiciary of the United States. There are a variety of cases where the exercise of this power may be necessary for the safety of the people, which ought to be the supreme law. This power, I trust, will never be abused by the American Congress. I do not recollect a case under the British Government, where for fifty years it has been exercised, and I trust we shall not ascribe to ourselves an indisposition to the correct discharge of those functions, which have been correctly exercised or rather not exercised at all for fifty years by the British Government. If in England, where the Crown is hereditary, the Lords hereditary and for life, and the Commons for seven years, this tenure and responsibility has been found necessary, I trust in this Government, where the President is for four years, the Senate for six, and the House of Representatives for two years, this judicial tenure and responsibility will be thought expedient, and that this amendment will be adopted by Congress, particularly as it is but a preliminary decision—as it must be submitted to the States, and cannot go into operation but by the consent of three-fourths of the United States. I have therefore thought fit to submit this resolution, and hope the reasons assigned will induce you to believe that I think it of such importance to the nation as to entitle it to your attention.

Mr. W. then submitted the following resolutions:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, two-thirds of both Houses concurring, That the following section be submitted to the Legislatures of the several States, which, when ratified by the Legislatures of three-fourths of the States, shall be valid and binding as a part of the Constitution of the United States:

Resolved, That the judges, both of the Supreme and Inferior Courts, may be removed from office on the joint address of the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States.

The House refused to consider the motion—45 to 38.

BANK OF ALEXANDRIA.

The House took up the report of the Committee of the Whole on the bill for reincorporating the Bank of Alexandria.

Mr. FISK moved to amend the bill so as to limit its duration to ten years, instead of twenty, as proposed.—Agreed to.

Mr. MONTGOMERY moved to amend it by inserting a clause, providing that the discounts thereby made should "never exceed twice the amount of its capital stock paid in."—Agreed to.

Mr. Root said it had been perhaps correctly observed, that the avenues to the Capitol were beset with petitioners from this District, with bills and briefs ready drawn in their hands. Who were these petitioners? The wealthy or the populace, the body of the people of the District? Not the latter; they did not attend levees and drawing-rooms, or give dinners and parties. They were not represented on the floor. He now rose as their advocate. He was for doing the same justice to them as to the patricians. After repeating the idea before expressed by him, that all contracts should be reciprocal, Mr. R. proposed the following amendment to the bill:

"And provided, That the President and Directors of the Bank of Alexandria, on the first Monday in January in every year, during the continuance of this act, pay to the Mayor and Commonalty of Alexandria, one per cent. on the amount of the capital stock of said bank, to be applied to the support of free schools for the instruction of children of every description in the county of Alexandria."

This amendment, proposing at once to lay a tax and make an appropriation, was, on the suggestion of Mr. RANDOLPH, declared by the Speaker to be out of order, as every such motion must be first made in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. Root then moved to recommit the bill, with the express view of making the amendment which he was not at liberty to offer in the House.

Mr. SMILIE said, that when a privilege was granted, there ought to be an equivalent in return. Why should it be thought strange that in this instance they should ask something in return for what they were about to give? Was it unusual? The Bank of the United States had proposed to give a bonus for a renewal of its charter. Mr. S. said he thought banks mischievous; but if we must be saddled with them, we ought to make the best of them.

Mr. RHEA said, that so long as he had a seat on the floor, he should never vote to make Congress a broker's shop for selling bank charters. The bill was good enough for him as it stood. It might be made so good by these amendments that he should be obliged to vote against it.

Mr. Root said, he felt quite indifferent as to the particular application of the money to be derived from the bank under his amendment, so that it was applied for the benefit of the great mass of the community. He had understood that this bank had divided about nine per cent. per annum; and renewing the charter would, therefore, be a boon to the stockholders of from thirty to forty per cent. on the amount of capital. The wealthy of the District were about to have a sum of money bestowed on them; and surely they might relinquish a third of the gift or one per cent. for the general benefit. Mr. R. said, as he was not pertinacious as to the amount of tax, he would modify his motion so as to leave the amount blank.

Mr. VAN HORN read a statement of the dividends by this bank, showing its average dividend to have been about seven and a half per cent. per annum, not as much as any of the banks in Baltimore; and yet the State of Maryland had never asked a premium for chartering a bank. And were the people of this District, to whom the gentleman was desirous of being so kind, and keeping them from their own worst enemies, themselves, to be studiously treated worse than those of the neighboring States? The bill was already now more restricted than any charter he had ever seen or heard of.

Mr. McKIM said he never would consent to grant a charter which was not bottomed on the public good. If they granted a charter for the public good with one hand, why should they press it down with a tax on the other? The House certainly acted from its own free will; the body now petitioning could not compel Congress to grant a charter. And if it was granted from free will, why accompany it with a tax?

Mr. STANLEY could see no more propriety in taxing this than other corporations in the District, which had been granted by Congress without requiring any consideration therefor. Mr. S. also replied to Mr. Root's remarks on the subject of the operation of banks; which, Mr. S. said, was more beneficial to men of small capital than to men of weighty capitals, whose immense wealth would enable them, if no banks existed, to control the whole commerce of the District.

The question on agreeing to Mr. Root's motion for amendment was decided in the negative—yeas 22, nays 89, as follows:

YEAS—David Bard, Adam Boyd, Joseph Calhoun, Matthew Clay, William Crawford, Joseph Desha, Barzillai Gannett, Daniel Heister, James Holland, Jacob Hufty, William McKinley, Gurdon S. Mumford, Thomas Newbold, John Nicholson, John Roane, Erastus Root, Ebenezer Seaver, John Smilie, Richard Stanford, Charles Turner, junior, Robert Weakley, and Robert Whitehill.

Troup, Nicholas Van Dyke, Archibald Van Horn, Killian K. Van Rensselaer, Ezekiel Whitman, James Wilson, Richard Winn, Robert Witherspoon, and Robert Wright.

Mr. CHEVES expressed a doubt, as Congress were in this case legislating in the capacity of a Legislature of the Territory, and not as the Congress of the United States, whether they could pass a law in relation to the Territory which should have operation in the States. He therefore moved to amend the section for punishing counterfeiters so as to make them amenable to "any court in the District of Columbia," instead of "any court of the United States," having criminal jurisdiction, &c.

Messrs. SAWYER, LOVE, and KEY, opposed the motion, and Mr. RANDOLPH supported it.

Before a question was taken on the motion, the House adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, January 30.

Mr. McKIM presented a petition of James Smith, physician, of the city of Baltimore, praying the patronage and aid of Congress in a plan to introduce into general use, in the District of Columbia, the genuine vaccine matter.—Referred to a select committee.

Mr. McKIM, Mr. LOVE, and Mr. KNICKERBACKER, were appointed the committee.

Mr. JENNINGS, from the committee to whom was referred, on the 24th instant, a memorial of the Legislature of Indiana Territory, made a report thereon; which was read, and referred to the Committee of the whole House on the bill authorizing the election of Sheriffs in the Indiana Territory.

Mr. MORROW, from the Committee on the Public Lands, made a report on the petition of the United Illinois and Wabash Land Companies.—Referred to a Committee of the Whole on Friday, the 8th February next.

Mr. BASSETT, from the Committee on the Naval Establishment, presented a bill making an additional appropriation for the Navy; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Saturday next.

Mr. GOLD, from the committee appointed, on the 23d instant, on the petition of Daniel Pettibone, presented a bill to provide for warming and ventilating the Hall of Representatives by a rarefying air stove; which was read twice, and referred to a Committee of the Whole on Wednesday next.

Mr. SEAVER, from the committee appointed on the 15th instant, presented a bill authorizing the sale and grant of a certain quantity of public land to the proprietors of the Middlesex Canal, in the State of Massachusetts; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Tuesday next.

On motion of Mr. PITKIN,

Ordered, That the Committee of the Whole House be discharged from the consideration of the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of William Mills," and that it be referred to a select committee.

Mr. PITKIN, Mr. BASSETT, Mr. WHITMAN, Mr. HELMS, and Mr. CHITTENDEN, were appointed the committee.

A Message was received from the President of the United States, transmitting to Congress copies of a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, accompanied by copies of the "laws, treaties, and other documents, relative to the public lands," as collected and arranged pursuant to the act passed April 27, 1810.—Referred to a select committee.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Thomas Campbell;" to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

THE BANK OF ALEXANDRIA.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill respecting the Bank of Alexandria.

Mr. LEWIS moved to strike out the whole section of the bill respecting punishing counterfeiters of the bills of the bank; which of course superseded the motion, pending when the House adjourned last evening, to amend the section. Motion agreed to without opposition.

Mr. SMILIE stated that four bills on the subject of banks in the District had already been committed to a select committee. That committee had met on the subject, and, judging from appearances, he thought there was a disposition to pass at least some of the bills. If any were passed, he thought their provisions ought to be uniform; and to accomplish that object, moved to refer the bill to the same committee to whom the other bills were referred.

Mr. RANDOLPH supported and Mr. LOVE opposed the motion; which was negatived by a small majority.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading to-morrow.

AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, to which committee was referred the report of the select committee on the subject of Mr. MACON's amendment.

JANUARY, 1811.

Amendment to the Constitution.

H. OF R.

Mr. HUBBARD, after stating some objections to the resolution, because not sufficiently comprehensive, as including civil appointments only, and as not including those who might have been legislators at the time of the election of the President, who were as liable to improper influence as those elected during the Presidential term, moved to amend the report of the committee so as to read as follows:

"No Senator or Representative who shall have been such at the time of the election of any President, or during the term for which he shall have been elected, shall be appointed to any office, place, or appointment, until the expiration of the Presidential term in which such person shall have been the Senator or Representative aforesaid."

Mr. MACON objected to the amendment, because too broad, and going to defeat the object of his motion, by giving too great a latitude to its provisions. He remarked that the influence on the caucus nomination for President, &c., ought to have no weight; because the caucus was a body unknown to the Constitution, and on the existence of which the House could not legislate. He was desirous to give those coming into office the choice of the whole nation for the Secretaries and officers of Government; and was for that reason, among others, opposed to the amendment, which would go to restrict the choice of the President, so as to prevent him from selecting those he might prefer, because they were members of Congress.

Mr. WRIGHT then moved that the Committee should rise, with a view to having the amendment printed.—Motion lost, ayes 28.

Mr. SAWYER said, that he thought this subject had been long enough before the House for every member to have made up his mind upon it; and although he did not like that this speculative question should supersede the ordinary business of the House at this late period of the session, yet, as it was before the House, he should take this occasion to assign the few insurmountable objections which he had to the adoption of it—premiering by the way, that in order to have made the system complete, it would have been well for the gentleman to have extended it to ourselves, by limiting the periods of our own service in this House. If we commence the career of political purgation, it ought to be carried to its full length and not stopped half-way. Though we are elected by the people, yet our posts are of as much importance as appointments by the President, at least if one may judge from our fondness for clinging on to them. And, I think, the same danger exists of the exercise of undue influence by members of long standing in the appointment of others as of themselves. Men that would act from corrupt motives might easily conceal their conduct by retaining their seats here, while they enjoyed an annual stipend or participated in the profits of office by a kind of dormant partnership. He believed this evil existed pretty extensively in some of the Kingdoms of Europe. If a member is determined to be a knave you cannot prevent him; and he would not deprive the Government of the services of a respectable class of men, upon a vain experiment of making them honest. It will only be putting them in mind of expedients to evade your provisions, which they might not otherwise have thought of, and corrupt the moral and political integrity of the House. But, I consider the proposed amendment, (said Mr. S.) though far from being intended as such, as one of the greatest insults that could be offered to the House. What is the language which it holds out? Why, that we are all such office hunters, and have obtained such an undue share of Executive favors, it is necessary to stop the evil. We are no longer fit to be trusted, but must be bound down, the degraded victims of our own unbridled ambition! Is this House prepared to pass such a disgraceful sentence upon itself? To put a mark of humiliation upon itself, to disfranchise itself of the common privileges of a citizen? And all this, forsooth, because a few may have been selected from amongst us to preside over Territories—stations unworthy to be compared to seats in this House!

As for the charge of office hunting, (Mr. S. said,) I shall not deign to notice it as applied to myself. I shall always act upon principles of self-justification, and while I am at peace with my conscience, I shall care very little what others may think of my motives. But how other gentlemen can talk about office hunting after retaining their seats for twenty years, I cannot conceive. [Here Mr. RANDOLPH called the gentleman to order, upon the ground of his alluding to the gentleman from North Carolina, Mr. MACON.] Mr. S. said, he should be very sorry to say anything of that gentleman that should be considered out of order. He merely stated twenty years as an example, but if he placed it upon ten years the same conclusion would follow. [The Chairman allowed him to proceed.] Perhaps, said Mr. S., an attempt may be made to draw a distinction between offices bestowed immediately by the people, and mediately by their servants. Be it so. Whoever does shall be welcome to all the credit his ingenuity can procure him. And if he can show they possess not similar properties of honor and profit, and that the same means and passions are not employed to procure and maintain them, I will admit the superiority of his talents. But unless he can, I trust he will act up to his professions and bring his principles home, or cease to talk about independence of political conduct and purity of Republican principles. Not that I feel so much false tenderness for the Constitution as to be afraid to touch it, if occasion required, but by adverting to that instrument it will appear that this very question was considered, and the proper remedy applied. The second article of the sixth section says, "no Senator or Representative shall, during the time for which he was elected, be appointed to any civil office under the authority of the United States, which shall have been created or the emoluments of which shall have been increased during such time; and no person holding an of-

"office under the United States shall be a member of either House during his continuance in office;" Here the Convention thinks it sufficient to prevent any undue influence of Congress in the creation of new offices by excluding them from such, as well as to prohibit the union in one person of Executive and Legislative powers, without at the same time abridging them of those general powers and privileges which had been extended alike to all. I am aware that the proposed amendment is intended to extend this provision, by increasing the number of disabilities, and I quote it merely to show, that the subject had already been before the proper tribunal, and that they had expressed a disapprobation of farther restrictions, as far as negative provisions could imply. If they thought there was still too great a latitude left, they may also have thought that there would have been too much parsimony dealt to the organ of appointments by excluding from its choice a body of men, by their very selection and the opportunity afforded of an acquaintance with their qualifications, the most proper for the exercise of its judgment. So far as regards ourselves, said Mr. S., I admit we may subject ourselves to what conditions we please; but there is another party concerned in this decision. We are curtailing the exercise of Executive discretion, by denying to it the right to require the assistance of a useful class of people. The people have reserved to their Executive, for their own benefit, the greatest possible range in the choice of their servants; and, if the question were now before me as one of the people, I would not consent to deprive the Government of the power of selecting whatever characters it might judge best calculated to promote the public good. If the Executive made an improper choice, I would hold it responsible; and as I would blame it for making a bad choice, I ought not to lessen its chance of making a good one.

The question was taken on Mr. HUBBARD's proposed amendment, and decided in the negative—59 to 35.

Mr. QUINCY moved the following proposition as an amendment, to be added to the resolution:

"And no person, standing to any Senator or Representative in the relation of father, brother, or son, by blood or marriage, shall be appointed to any civil office under the United States, or shall receive any place, agency, contract, or emolument, from or under any department or officer thereof."

Mr. QUINCY.—Mr. Chairman: The amendment to the Constitution, proposed by the gentleman from North Carolina, is of the nature of a remedy for an evil. The proposition which I have the honor to submit, is similar in principle, but embraces a wider sphere of action, and is offered as a medicament of a higher power. His amendment has for its object, to purify the Legislature of that corruption which springs from the hope of office for ourselves. My proposition has for its object to purify the Legislature of that corruption which springs from the attainment of office for our relations. And if the House will take the trouble to analyze the respective natures of these two evils, it will find that the evil to which my proposition refers, is higher in nature, and more intense in degree than that to which the amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina has reference. That is to say, the present attainment of office for our relations, for those near and dear to us, who are parts of our blood, and, if our natures be generous, parts of ourselves, is an application to the principle of human action, as much more strong and alluring than the distant hope of office for ourselves—fruition is a nearer approximation to bliss than expectation; or as a payment in hand is better than a payment in promise.

I shall offer a few considerations in support of my proposition, not only by way of elucidation to this House, but also for the purpose of attracting the attention of the public to the subject. For I am well aware, that let it be discussed when it will, and under what Administration it will, it cannot fail to be in this and the other branch of the Legislature a bitter pill; and unless it have the aid of external pressure, it will stick in the passage.

I know the nature of the subject, and am aware that it is very delicate and very critical. Why, sir, it relates to nothing less than our blood and our purses; objects, of all others, the most squeamishly sensitive, and the most jealous of other people's interference. It shall be my endeavor, however, to handle the topic with as much caution as possible. And in order to avoid all appearance of party or personality, I shall speak concerning things past and things future, without particular notice of things present.

In the first place, I would remark that our general mode of speaking, both on this floor and in common conversation, concerning this power of distributing offices, is, in my judgment, not strictly accurate in itself, and may be questioned as unjust to the President of the United States. It is denominated "Executive influence," by way of analogy, and in conformity, perhaps, to the practice in Great Britain, where the Crown, being the proprietor of offices, distributes them at will among favorites. But the state of things is different in this country. Here the Executive has no proprietary interest in the offices which he distributes; he does not create them; he does not, except in a few instances, even designate the amount of emolument. All these, in fact, proceed from the Legislature. We are the creators, he is the channel for communicating them to their objects; so that, if the members of this and the other branch of the Legislature become venal in this country, they are, to say the least, half workers in their own corruption. A mode of expression ought not therefore to be used, tending to throw the guilt exclusively on another branch of the Government. Another phrase is more just and appropriate. Sir, it ought to be called pecuniary influence—the love of money wrapped up in very thin covers and disguises, called offices for ourselves and offices for our relations.

I shall consider the principle of this amendment and proposition in relation to the Constitution, its nature, and necessity.

JANUARY, 1811.

Amendment to the Constitution.

H. OF R.

If we look into the Constitution, we shall find no part more palpably defective than its provisions against the effect of that Executive influence, as it is called, resulting from the power of distributing offices at pleasure among the members of both branches of the Legislature and their relations. There is, I think, but one provision upon the subject. This is contained in the following clause of the sixth section of the first article:

“No Senator or Representative shall, during the time for which he was elected, be appointed to any civil office under the authority of the United States, which shall have been created, or the emoluments whereof shall have been increased, during such time.”

This provision, I say, considered as a security against that corruption, which springs from the distribution of offices, is palpably defective. In relation to its objects it is limited, and in its means wants efficiency. What are its objects? It aims only to prevent multiplication of offices and increase of their emolument. So that provided we do not create new offices, nor increase the old emolument, the craving spirit of avarice has free range to solicit and corrupt both branches of the Legislature. All the numerous allurements of existing offices, all the rich reward of established salaries, are permitted to play with their bewitching infatuation before our eyes. So long as a man does not attempt to take the fruit of the seed of his own sowing, he may botanize at his pleasure in this great Executive garden, and whether he seek flower or fruit, he may, to the full, please his fancy or satiate his appetite. And if we consider the means, it will be found that they are inadequate. There is but one limitation “during the time for which he was elected.” What is this, considered as security? It is scarcely less than totally inefficient. Notwithstanding this provision a man may—I say may, Mr. Chairman, for I would not be understood to affirm that any such creature now exists, or has ever heretofore appeared in this or the other branch of the Legislature, but I speak of the possibility of that gross and debasing corruption, such as has appeared in other countries, and may, therefore, hereafter appear in this—a man may be a mere spaniel to the Executive; he may fetch or carry, run upon all his errands, and, at his whistle, roll himself over on these floors without regard to either coat or conscience, and on the last day of the term for which he was elected, when, perhaps, he has been ejected from the people’s favor, as foul and odious, he may, in spite of this provision, be instrumental in creating an office, or increasing an emolument of which the very next day he shall take the profits. Is not such a provision, considered as a security against corruption from the distribution of offices, like tantalism to this people? I would not, however, be thought to hold at a mean rate this part of our Constitution. Notwithstanding its deficiency it is precious, because it recognises the possibility of the existence of this principle of corruption in this and the other branch of the Legislature; because it is a standing and solemn warning against its effects. It gives us ground to stand upon, and, through the instrumentality of the powers of amendment, may enable this people to wrench out of this soil, by the roots, this foul and growing pollution.

If we compare the principle of this amendment and my proposition with the principles of the Constitution, we shall find that it no less harmonizes with them than it does with this provision of the instrument. If there be a principle universally allowed by men of all parties to be the basis of liberty, with the existence of which, it is admitted on all hands, that the essence of freedom is identified, it is that the three great departments of power, the Legislative, Executive, and Judicial, ought to be separate and distinct. The consolidation of these three powers into one has been denominated “the definition of despotism.” And in proportion as these powers approximate to consolidation, the spirit of despotism steals over us. At the time of the adoption of this instrument, it was an objection raised against it by some of its most enlightened opposers, that its tendency was to such a consolidation, and on this account they strove to rouse the spirit of liberty. But their anticipations had chiefly reference to the forms of the Constitution, and particularly to that qualified control which the Executive has over the acts of the Legislature. They anticipated not at all, or at least very obscurely, that consolidation, which has grown and is strengthened under the influence of the office-distributing power, vested in the Executive. A consolidation perceptible to all, and which is the more fixed and inseparable, inasmuch as the cement is constituted by the strongest of all amalgams; that of the precious metals. This state of things is not the less to be deprecated on account of the fact, that the forms of the Constitution are preserved, while its spirit is perishing. The members of both branches may meet, deliberate, and act, but the spirit of independence is gone whenever the action of the Legislature is identified with the will of the Executive by the potent influence of the office-hoping and the office-holding charm.

With respect to the nature of this influence, I remark, that a misconception seems to be entertained concerning it. The bare suggestion of its existence is almost thought to be indecorous, because of the gross and palpable corruption in which it is supposed to consist. It is thought to imply a sort of pre-contract between the Executive and his selected favorites: so many votes for so many offices, or such an office for such a term of Swiss service. Sir, nothing of this kind is pretended. Such sale of conscience and duty in open market is not reconcilable with the present state of civilized society. And they are mightily offended if there be any suggestion, ever so remote, of pollution, or any hint that they have been about anything else, in their transactions with the Executive, than pursuing the pure love of glory and their country! But the corruption of which I speak, and which is the object of both the amendment and proposition, is of a nature neither very gross nor very barefaced. Yet, on these accounts, it is not the less to be deprecated. On the contrary, from its very insidiousness, and its appearing so often almost in the garb of a virtue, ought it to be watched and restricted.

Such is its nature that it corrupts the very foundation of action. It springs up out of the human heart and the condition of things, so that it is almost impossible that it should not exist, or that it should be altogether resisted. It has its origin in that love of place, which is so inherent in the human heart, that it may be called almost an universal and instinctive passion. It cannot be otherwise. For so long as the love of honor and the love of profit are natural to man, so long the love of place, which includes either the one or the other, or both, must be a very general and prevalent impulse. It cannot, therefore, but be true, as a general principle, and it casts no reflection to admit, that all members of Congress may love offices, at least as well as their neighbors. Now, with the love of place, there is another principle concurrent in relation to members of Congress, which is the result of our political condition, and is this: that those most desirous of places in the Executive gift, will not expect to be gratified except by their support of the Executive. In referring to this principle, as the result of our political condition, I mean to cast no particular reflection on our present Chief Magistrate. It grows out of the nature of political combinations. For, with some highly honorable exceptions, it has been true in all past, and will be true in all future Administrations, that the general way for members of Congress to gain offices for themselves, or their relations, is to coincide in opinion, and vote with the Executive.

Out of the union of these two principles, the love of office, and the general impression that coincidence with the Executive is an essential condition for obtaining office, grows that corruption of the very fountain of action, the purification of which is the aim of both the amendment and my proposition under consideration. It exists without any precontract with the Executive. He knows our wants without any formal specification from us. And we know his terms without any previous statement from him. The parties proceed together, mutually gratifying and gratified, as occasions offer, and the harmonies of the happy part of the Legislature and the Executive are complete. And were it not that there is a third party concerned, called the people of the United States, nothing would seem more pleasant or unexceptionable than this partnership in official felicity. But so it is, in truth, that the interests and liberties of the people, which we are sent here to consult, will not only be sometimes neglected, but, at others, absolutely sacrificed, while the constituted guardians are gaping after offices for themselves, or hunting them up for their relations. The nature of the corruption is such as not only easily to be concealed from the world, but, also, in a great measure, from the individual himself. And, so long as that free access, which is at present permitted by the Constitution, is unrestrained, it will continue and may increase. On every question which arises, and has relation to Executive measures, in addition to all the other considerations of honor, policy, justice, propriety, and the like, this also is prepared, to be thrown into the scale; that if a man means to gain office, he must coincide with the Executive. It is not possible for any man to decide what degree of influence this consideration has upon another, and it is nearly, if not quite, as difficult for him to decide what degree of influence it may have upon himself. For, let any man reflect upon the springs of any particular course of action, which various, concurrent, complex motives have induced him to adopt, and he will find it very difficult to apportion, to each of the concurring motives, the precise degree of influence which belongs to it. And he will also find that, if there be in the group one motive base, and consequently bashful of the light, it will shrink away into the deepest recesses of the heart, and there cover itself over with such an accumulation of plausible, specious motives, that it is beyond the power of poor human nature, in the ordinary strength of its moral sense, always to discover it. From the liability of having the source of our public actions corrupted by the infusion of such a taint, every honest mind will be solicitous to be delivered. For, whether the office, which allures our fancy, be for ourselves or for our relations, the result is the same. No man can stand up wholly independent to the hand by which he hopes to be fed, or which is in the act of feeding his children and relatives. Nor can any man, however honest or scrupulous, placed in such situation, be positively certain as to his own motive, or know whether, in such cases, his polarity with the Executive be the result of the intrinsic nature and reason of things, or whether it be the effect of the influence of those metallic strata, which unite that Executive with the centre of his best affections.

With respect to the degree in which this corruption has heretofore or may hereafter exist, it is impossible precisely to estimate. Because the offices in the gift of the Executive and the Departments are so numerous, are extended over so wide a surface, being for the whole United States; and the relations of members of Congress are so little known to each other and the world, that it is not to be expected that we, much less that the people, should be able to trace this influence, in all its ramifications. But, one thing is certain, that it exceeds popular estimation, as much as it evades legislative scrutiny. Why, sir, there is annually distributed from the great departments an amount not less than five-and-a-half millions of dollars, and from the Post Office Establishment not less than four-and-a-half millions, making the annual aggregate of ten millions of dollars. All this abundant reservoir is distributable, annually, to its objects, in streams of various magnitudes and in every direction, at the Executive will. Now, we stand at the very spot where this luscious fountain overflows in all its exuberance. Having the power, can we promise that we shall refrain from turning aside to ourselves and our relatives at least a full portion of these pecuniary bounties?

Amendment to the Constitution.

H. OF R.

Is it in human nature, generally, to practice so much stoical self-denial, as a contrary conduct would imply? I have said that it was impossible to prove the full extent of the accommodation, which we and our relatives may obtain, in one shape and another, out of the Treasury, so long as such a latitude is given to our capacity to receive; yet, every now and then, some evidence occurs, tending to give a glimpse of the amount, in which the transfer of public money may be made to run in particular directions. At this moment there lies upon our tables an account of the Navy Agent at Baltimore, who, it appears, under the directions of the then Secretary of the Navy, did purchase, in about eighteen months, of a single mercantile house in that city, bills of exchange to the amount of two hundred and forty thousand dollars, the head of which mercantile house was and is a Senator of the United States, and the brother of the Secretary of the Navy. In referring to this subject, I beg to be understood as giving no opinion on that transaction, or as representing it as exceptionable in its nature. I adduce it with no other design than to show the extent to which relations may, if they please, accommodate one another, so long as no Constitutional restrictions exist, and the impossibility of estimating the amount and of pursuing the evil into all its ramifications.

Upon this subject of offices my sentiments may, perhaps, be too refined for the present condition of human nature. And I am aware, in what I am about to say, that I may run athwart political friends as well as political foes. Such considerations as these shall not, however, deter me from introducing just and high notions of their duties, to the consideration of the members of the Legislature. I hold, sir, the acceptance of an office of mere emolument, or which is principally emolument, by a member of Congress, from the Executive, as unworthy his station, and incompatible with that high sense of irreproachable character, which it is one of the choicest terrestrial boons of virtue to attain. For, while the attainment of office is to members of Congress the consequence solely of coincidence with the Executive, he who has the office carries on his forehead the mark of having fulfilled the condition. And, although his self-love may denominate his attainment of the office to be the reward of merit, the world, which usually judges acutely on these matters, will denominate it the reward of service. And, in such cases, ninety-nine times in the hundred, the world will be right. An exception to this rule may, perhaps, exist in the cases of offices of high responsibility, to which a member of Congress may be called, on account of his distinguished and peculiar qualifications; in which the voice of the Executive is, in truth, what it ought always to be, the voice of his country. Such cases are so rare, that when they exist they make a law for themselves. They are exceptions which prove rather than invalidate the rule. For us it is honor enough to be thus intrusted with the high concerns of this people, to be thus debating, thus maintaining their liberties, or striving to improve their condition. Let us put it out of our power, and remove from us temptation to grub in the low pursuits of avarice and base ambition.

Such is the opinion which, in my judgment, ought to be entertained of the mere acceptance of office, by members of Congress. But, as to that other class of persons, who are open, notorious solicitors of office, they give occasion to reflections of a very different nature. This class of persons, in all times past, have appeared, and (for I say nothing of times present) in all future will appear on this and on the other floor of Congress. Creatures who, under the pretence of serving the people, are, in fact, serving themselves; creatures who, while their distant constituents, good, easy men, industrious, frugal, and unsuspecting, dream, in visions, that they are laboring for their country's welfare, are, in truth, spending their time mousing at the doors of the Palace, or the crannies of the Departments; and laying low snares to catch, for themselves and their relations, every stray office that flits by them. For such men, chosen in this high and responsible trust, to whom have been confided the precious destinies of the people, and who thus openly abandon their duties, and set their places and their consciences to sale, in defiance of the multiplied, strong, and tender ties, by which they are bound to their country, I have no language to express my contempt. I never have seen, and I never shall see, any of these notorious solicitors of office, for themselves, or their relations, standing on this or the other floor, bawling and bullying, or coming down with dead votes, in support of Executive measures, but I think I see a hackney, laboring for hire, in a most degrading service; a poor, earth-spirited animal, trudging in his traces, with much attrition of the sides and induration of the membranes, encouraged by this special certainty, that, at the end of his journey, he shall have measured out to him his proportion of provender.

But, I have heard that the bare suggestion of such corruption was a libel upon this House, and upon this people. I have heard that we were, in this country, so virtuous, that we were above the influence of these allurements; that beyond the Atlantic, in old Governments, such things might be suspected, but that here we were too pure for such guilt, too innocent for such suspicions.

Mr. Chairman, I shall not hesitate, in spite of such popular declamation, to believe and follow the evidence of my senses, and the concurrent testimonies of contemporaneous beholders. I shall not, in my estimation of character, degrade this people below, nor exalt them far above, the ordinary condition of cultivated humanity. And of this be assured, that every system of conduct, or course of policy, which has for its basis an excess of virtue in this country, beyond what human nature exhibits in its improved state elsewhere, will be found on trial fallacious. Is there on this earth any collection of men in which exists a more intrinsic, hearty, and desperate love of office or place—particularly fat places? Is there any in which place and official emolument more certainly follow distinguished servility at elections, or base scurrility in the press? And as to eagerness for the reward, what is the fact? Let, now, one of your great office-holders, a collector of the customs, a marshal, a commissioner of loans, a postmaster in one of your cities, or any officer, agent, or factor, for your Territories or public lands, or person holding a place of minor distinction, but of considerable profit, be called on to pay the last debt of nature—the poor man shall hardly be dead, he shall not be cold long, before the corpse is in the coffin, the mail shall be crowded to repletion with letters and certificates, and recommendations and representations, and every species of sturdy, sycophantic solicitation, by which obtrusive mendicancy seeks charity or invites compassion. Why, sir, we hear the clamor of the craving animals at the Treasury trough, here in this Capitol. Such running, such jostling, such wriggling, such clambering over one another's backs, such squealing, because the tub is so narrow and the company is so crowded. No, sir, let us not talk of stoical apathy towards the things of the National Treasury, either in this people or their Representatives or Senators.

But it will be asked, for it has been asked, shall the Executive be suspected of corrupting the National Legislature? Is he not virtuous? Without making personal distinctions or references, for the sake of argument, it may be admitted, that all Executives for the time being are virtuous—reasonably virtuous, Mr. Chairman; flesh and blood notwithstanding. And without meaning, in this place, to cast any particular reflections upon this or upon any other Executives, this I will say, that if no additional guards are provided, and now after the spirit of party has brought into so full activity the spirit of patronage, there never will be a President of these United States elected by means now in use, who, if he deals honestly with himself, will not be able, on quitting, to address his Presidential chair as John Falstaff addressed Prince Hal: "Before I knew thee, I knew nothing, and now I am little better than one of the wicked." The possession of that station, under the reign of party, will make a man so acquainted with the corrupt principles of human conduct, he will behold our nature in so hungry, and shivering, and craving a state, and be compelled so constantly to observe the solid rewards daily demanded, by way of compensation for outrageous patriotism, that if he escape out of that atmosphere without partaking of its corruption, he must be below or above the ordinary condition of mortal nature. Is it possible, sir, that he should remain altogether uninfected? What is the fact? The Constitution prohibits the members of this and of the other branch of the Legislature from being Electors for President of the United States. Yet, what is done? The practice of late is so prevalent as to have grown almost into a sanctioned usage of party. Prior to the Presidential term of four years, members of Congress, having received the privileged ticket of admission, assemble themselves in a sort of electoral college on the floor of the Senate, or of the House of Representatives. They select a candidate for the Presidency. To their voice, to their influence, he is indebted for his elevation. So long as this condition of things continues, what ordinary Executive will refuse to accommodate those who in so distinguished a manner have accommodated him? Is there a better reason in the world why a man should give you, Mr. Chairman, an office worth two or three thousand dollars a year, for which you are qualified, and which he could give as well as not, than this, that you had been greatly instrumental in giving him one worth five and twenty thousand, for which he was equally qualified? It is vain to conceal it. So long as the present condition of things continues, it may be reasonably expected that there shall take place, regularly between the President of the United States and a portion of both Houses of Congress, an interchange, strictly speaking, of good offices.

The principle for which I contend, and which is the basis, both of the original amendment, and of my proposition, is this: Put it out of the power of the Executive to seem to pay any of the members of Congress, by putting it out of their power to receive. "Avoid the appearance of evil." We have been taught to pray, "lead us not into temptation." They who rightly estimate their duties may find in public life, no less necessity than in private life, frequently to repeat this aspiration.

Mr. WRIGHT moved to amend Mr. QUINCY's proposed amendment by adding thereto a provision that each Senator or Representative, on taking his seat, should furnish a table of his genealogy.

Mr. QUINCY said he had no objection to such an amendment.

Mr. SEYBERT said the amendment proposed by Mr. WRIGHT would not effect his object, because a man might marry while a member and thus change his whole connexion.

Mr. WRIGHT reduced his motion to writing in the following words:

"Each member of the Senate and House of Representatives, when he takes his seat, shall file a list of his relatives precluded by said resolution."

Mr. RANDOLPH said such an amendment would have a strange reading in the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. QUINCY said he cared not for the mode so that he attained his end in this case. Whether the amendment he proposed succeeded now or not, it would before many years be adopted.

Mr. BACON said he assented to the general proposition of his colleague; but he saw difficulties in the detail, which, no doubt, the gentleman himself must see. He should be loth to vote on a proposition, even in Committee, on which he might, after amendment, change his vote. The subject was important; to give further time for considering it, he moved that the Committee should rise.

The motion was agreed to, and the Committee then rose.

A motion was made to print the several amendments, &c.

JANUARY, 1811.

Jared Shattuck's Claim.

H. OF R.

Mr. SMILIE said he was in favor of printing the original motion; but he suggested whether it would comport with the dignity of the House to print such amendments as the last which were offered. However their risible faculties might be amused by them, he hoped the House would not print and solemnly send to the world those things, which could scarcely be seriously meant.

Mr. TROUP was in favor of printing. He thought the proposition of Mr. QUINCY not only important, but essential to carry into effect the object of the original motion; and he had never heard a proposition more ably supported than that of the gentleman from Massachusetts. Almost every sentiment he had uttered had met his assent.

Mr. WRIGHT hoped they would be printed. As to the gentleman's feelings for the dignity of the House, he supposed every gentleman felt alike on that subject. He said he should feel gratified at any proposition he should make being brought before the public; and should not fear to meet their award. Mr. W. made some allusion to a part of the speech of Mr. QUINCY, in which he had appeared to Mr. W. to cast an ungenerous imputation on the late Secretary of the Navy, in respect to purchases in Baltimore, &c.

Mr. QUINCY disavowed any intention of making such imputation or inference.

The question was taken on printing Mr. QUINCY's proposition, by yeas and nays, and carried—yeas 75, nays 40, as follows:

JARED SHATTUCK'S CLAIM.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the report of the Committee of Claims on the petition of Jared Shattuck—59 to 29.

The report is favorable to the claimant—a bill for the relief of this person having in two former sessions passed this House, but not been acceded to in the Senate.

Mr. MONTGOMERY, in a speech of some length, opposed the claim, and moved that the Committee rise, with a view to printing the papers relating to the claim, which he conceived was not fully understood.

This motion was debated, and lost—56 to 43.

The report was also debated, and agreed to—57 to 39.

The Committee then rose and reported their agreement to the report.

After repeatedly refusing to adjourn, the House confirmed the report of the Committee of the Whole—56 to 34, as follows:

The report was referred to the Committee of Claims, with instructions to report a bill accordingly.

THURSDAY, January 31.

Another member, to wit, from Massachusetts, ORCHARD COOK, appeared, and took his seat.

The bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of Thomas Campbell," was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Friday next.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a report from the Postmaster General, on the petitions of the Synod of Pittsburg, and of sundry inhabitants of the Western country, in the States of Pennsylvania, Virginia, and Ohio, referred on the 4th and 18th instant; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, to report specially by bill or otherwise.

Mr. VAN HORN, from the Committee of the District of Columbia, presented a bill to increase the salaries of the Judges of the Circuit Court for the District of Columbia; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

Mr. ROOT, from the Committee of Claims, presented a bill for the relief of Jared Shattuck; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Wednesday next.

On motion of Mr. QUINCY, the Committee of the Whole were discharged from the consideration of the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act authorizing the discharge of Nathaniel F. Fosdick from his imprisonment;" and said bill was referred to the select committee appointed yesterday, on the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of William Mills."

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act making compensation to John Eugene Leitzendorfer, for services rendered the United States in the war with Tripoli;" to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

A message was received from the President of the United States, transmitting a letter from the Chargé d'Affaires of the United States at Paris, to the Secretary of State; and another from the same to the French Minister of Foreign Relations; also, two letters from the Agent of the American Consul at Bordeaux to the Secretary of State.—Referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations; and 3,000 copies thereof ordered to be printed for the use of the members.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter addressed to him by B. H. Latrobe, Surveyor of the Public Buildings, on the subject of the fire which took place on the roof of the Capitol this morning; which was read.

An engrossed bill concerning the Bank of Alexandria was read the third time, and passed—yeas 90, nays 23, as follows:

REMOVAL OF JUDGES, &c.

Mr. WRIGHT called for the consideration of the resolution submitted by him on Wednesday last, in the following words:

Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, two-thirds of both Houses concurring, That the following section be submitted to the Legislatures of the several States; which, when ratified by the Legislatures of three-fourths of the States, shall be valid and binding as a part of the Constitution of the United States:

"The Judges of the Supreme Court and inferior courts, may be removed from office by the joint address of the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States."

Mr. W. wished it considered barely with a view to a reference to a Committee of the Whole, and to make it the order of the day for some distant day.

The House refused to consider the resolution; 53 to 38.

AMERICAN NAVIGATION.

Mr. NEWTON, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, to whom was referred so much of the Message of the President of the United States as relates to the navigation of the United States, reported the following bill:

A Bill to secure to vessels of the United States an equal advantage in exporting articles, the growth or produce of the United States, to foreign ports, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, &c., That, from and after the — day of — next, 1811, the exportation of any article, the growth or produce of the United States, shall be, and is hereby prohibited in ships or vessels of any nation, whose laws impose on articles, the growth or produce of the United States, higher duties, when carried in vessels of the United States to the ports of such nation, than are imposed on the same articles when carried in vessels of such nation to its own ports.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That any ship or vessel taking on board, or attempting to export any article, the growth or produce of the United States, contrary to the provisions of this act, such ship or vessel, together with her cargo, shall be forfeited, and every person concerned or aiding in the violation of this act shall, severally, be subjected to a penalty not exceeding — dollars, nor less than — dollars.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That all fines, penalties, and forfeitures, recovered by virtue of this act, shall, after deducting all proper costs and charges, be disposed of as follows: one moiety shall be for the use of the United States, and be paid into the Treasury thereof, by the collector receiving the same; the other moiety shall be divided between, and paid in equal proportions to the collector and naval officer of the district, surveyor of the port, and inspectors, wherein the same shall have been incurred, or to such of the said officers as there may be in the district; and in districts where only one of the aforesaid officers shall have been established, the said money, shall be given to such officer: Provided, nevertheless, That in all cases where such penalties, fines, and forfeitures, shall be recovered in pursuance of information given to such collector by any person other than the naval officer or surveyor of the district, the one-half of such moiety shall be given to such informer, and the remainder thereof shall be disposed of between the collector, naval officer, surveyor, or surveyors and inspectors, in manner aforesaid; Provided, also, That where any fines, forfeitures, and penalties incurred by virtue of this act, are recovered in consequence of any information given by any officer of a revenue cutter, they shall, after deducting all proper costs and charges, be disposed of as follows: one-fourth shall be for the use of the United States, and paid into the Treasury thereof in manner as before directed; one-fourth part for the officers of the customs, to be distributed as hereinbefore set forth; and the remainder thereof to the officers of such cutter, to be divided among them agreeably to their pay. And provided likewise, That whenever a seizure, condemnation, and sale of goods, wares, or merchandise, shall take place within the United States, and the value thereof shall be less than two hundred and fifty dollars, that part of the forfeiture which accrues to the United States, or so much thereof as may be necessary, shall be applied to the payment of the cost of prosecution: And it is further provided, That if any officer, or other person entitled to a part or share of any of the fines, penalties, or forfeitures, incurred in virtue of this act, shall be necessary as a witness on the trial for such fine, penalty, or forfeiture, such officer, or other person, may be a witness upon the said trial: but, in such a case, he shall not receive or be entitled to any part or share of the said fine, penalty, or forfeiture, and the part or share to which he otherwise would have been entitled shall revert to the United States.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That when any nation shall repeal all statutes imposing prohibitions, or laying countervailing duties on importations into, or exportations from, the ports of such nation, of any article of merchandise whatsoever, in ships or vessels of the United States, on satisfactory proof being given to the President of the United States of the repeal of such laws, all acts of the United States which prohibit exportations from, or lay countervailing duties on, importations into the ports of the United States of any article of merchandise whatsoever in vessels of such nation, shall be, and the same are hereby repealed.

The bill was twice read, and committed.

MISSISSIPPI TERRITORY.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the report of the select committee in favor of admitting the Mississippi Territory into the Union on an equal footing with the original States.

A desultory debate of two or three hours took place on the resolution.

MESSRS. POINDEXTER, JOHNSON, GHOLSON, McKIM, SHEFFEY, HOLLAND, and WRIGHT, spoke in favor of the resolution, and MESSRS. BACON, PITKIN, QUINCY, BIGELOW, and BLAISDELL, against it. The arguments in favor of its passage were, among others, that the Territory could, when possessing a population of 60,000, claim admission as a right; that it now contained probably 45,000, and would, more than probably, before a Representative could be elected under the new Constitution, contain full 60,000 souls; that, after admitting Orleans to the rank of a State, with a minor population, at the present session, it would be the height of injustice to refuse the same privilege to Mississippi, which had been so much longer a part of the united territory, and against the admission of which into the Union none of the Constitutional objections had weight which had been urged against the admission of Orleans. The opponents of the resolution argued that some respect was due to the feelings, however grounded, of the Eastern States, in relation to the creation of new States on the Western waters; that the admission of one State during a session was sufficient; if two were admitted into the Union in the course of three months, the people of the Eastern States would be justly alarmed at the diminution of their relative weight in the scale of the Union; that, since it was acknowledged the new State could not be represented before the thirteenth Congress, there could be no occasion for pressing this subject so urgently at this time. Why not, it was asked, wait for the actual census of the Territory? The very solicitude which was manifested to get this subject through Congress, it was said, showed there was something wrong, and was a strong argument against the adoption of the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to in Committee of the Whole—yeas 62.

The Committee rose, and reported their agreement to the resolution.

Mr. PITKIN moved to postpone the further consideration of the subject indefinitely.—Motion lost—yeas 45, nays 69.

Several unsuccessful motions were made to adjourn, and to lay the subject on the table, in order to read a Message which had been presented from the President of the United States.

The question was then taken to concur with the Committee of the Whole in their agreement to the said resolution, and resolved in the affirmative—yeas 68, nays 47, as follows:

Ordered, That Mr. POINDEXTER, Mr. McKIM, Mr. HUFFY, Mr. ANDERSON, Mr. STURGES, Mr. VAN RENSSELAER, and Mr. CLORTON, do prepare and bring in a bill, pursuant to the said resolution.

FRIDAY, February 1.

A motion was made, by Mr. GARDENIER, that the House do now adjourn; and the question thereon being taken, it was determined in the negative—yeas 9, nays 59.

The bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act making compensation to John Eugene Leitzendorfer, for services rendered the United States in the war with Tripoli," was read twice, and committed to the Committee of Claims.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

I transmit to the House of Representatives a report of the Secretary of War, complying with their resolution of the 21st instant.

JAMES MADISON.

JANUARY 31, 1811.

The Message having been read, was referred to the committee appointed on that part of the President's Message of the 5th of December, which relates to the land forces and fortifications of the United States.

Mr. ROOT, from the Committee of Claims, made a report on the petition of Hopley Yeaton, referred on the 11th December last; which was read, and the resolution therein contained concurred in by the House, as follows:

That the petitioner "prays that provision may be made for his support for the few remaining days of his life," in consideration of his services in the Revolution, and, since that time, in the command of a revenue cutter. His age and infirmities are urged in support of his claim. The committee can discover no right in Congress to grant as mere gratuities the money of the nation to any individual, however meritorious his conduct might have been. They therefore recommend that the petitioner have leave to withdraw his petition.

Resolved, That the petitioner have leave to withdraw his petition.

PAY OF OFFICERS OF THE NAVY.

On motion of Mr. BASSETT the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the following bill:

FEBRUARY, 1811.

Pay of Officers of the Navy.

H. OF R.

A Bill in relation to the pensions and rations of the officers of the Navy.

Be it enacted &c., That the officers of the Navy, when not in actual service, shall receive the rations allowed by law, except when furloughed for a definite period of time, with permission to leave the United States.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That masters commandant, whilst commanding any of the vessels of the United States, shall be entitled to receive one ration in addition to those now allowed by law.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That midshipmen shall be allowed two rations instead of one as heretofore.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That if any officer of the Navy shall die by reason of a wound received in the line of his duty, leaving a widow, or if no widow, a child or children under sixteen years of age, such widow, or if no widow, such child or children, shall be entitled to receive half the monthly pay, to which the deceased was entitled at the time of his death, or at the time of receiving the wound; which allowance shall continue for and during the term of five years. But in case of the death or intermarriage of such widow, before the expiration of the said term of five years, the half pay for the remainder of the term shall go to the child or children of the said deceased officer: Provided, That such half pay shall cease on the death of such child or children; and the money required for this purpose shall be paid out of the Navy pension fund, under the direction of the commissioners of that fund."

A desultory conversation took place in relation to the provisions of existing laws on this subject, &c.

Mr. BACON, who with others was of opinion, that the emoluments of officers of the Navy were already amply sufficient, as evinced by the numerous applications for any vacancy occurring in the naval service, moved to strike out the first section of the bill, with a view to make a similar motion successively in relation to every section of the bill.

This motion was opposed by Messrs. BASSETT, WRIGHT, and MITCHILL, on the grounds of the peculiarity of the seaman's situation, his habits unfitting him from obtaining a livelihood by any other avocation, &c.

The motion to strike out the first section was carried, 58 to 35.

Mr. BACON then moved to strike out the 2d and 3d section.—Carried.

Mr. SMILIE moved to strike out the fourth section of the bill, not because he objected to it in principle, but because it was confined to officers, and did not propose to extend the benefit to seamen.

Mr. BASSETT opposed the motion, and supported the section on the ground that it proposed to extend to the officers of the Navy the same privileges that were extended to those of the Army. If the section was not sufficiently comprehensive, it was competent to any gentleman to propose amendments without destroying the section altogether.

Mr. PICKMAN and other gentlemen opposed the motion.

The motion to strike out the 4th section was negatived.

Mr. MITCHILL and Mr. RHEA successively made motions to make the pensions &c., payable out of the Treasury, under the discretion of the Secretary of the Navy instead of out of the Navy pension fund. These motions having failed of success—

Mr. MITCHILL then renewed the motion to strike out the fourth section of the bill; which was carried, 38 to 34.

The Committee then rose and reported that they had stricken out all the sections of the bill.

The House agreed to consider the report of the Committee of the Whole.

The question being about to be taken on concurring with the Committee of the Whole in striking out the three first sections, so as to take the question separately on striking out the 4th section—

Mr. W. ALSTON moved to postpone the further consideration of the subject indefinitely.

The question was decided by yeas and nays; when there were for indefinite postponement 60, against it 53, as follows:

YEAS—Lemuel J. Alston, Willis Alston, jun., Ezekiel Bacon, Abijah Bigelow, Adam Boyd, Robert Brown, William A. So the bill was indefinitely postponed.

H. OF R.

Commercial Intercourse.

FEBRUARY, 1811.

SATURDAY, February 2.

A motion was made by Mr. GARDENIER, that the House do now adjourn; and the question being taken thereon, it was determined in the negative—yeas 20, nays 63.

Mr. RANDOLPH, from the committee to whom were referred the several bills from the Senate to incorporate the Bank of Potomac; to incorporate the Farmers' Bank of Alexandria; to incorporate the Bank of Washington; and to incorporate the Union Bank of Georgetown; reported, in part, the agreement of the committee to the first-mentioned bill, with amendments.

COMMERCIAL INTERCOURSE.

Mr. EPPES moved to discharge the Committee of the Whole from the further consideration of the bill supplementary to the act concerning commerce, &c., for the purpose of recommitting the bill to the committee who reported it.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH wished the gentleman to state the reasons which urged him to move a recommitment of the bill. It was usual, in such cases to state the grounds of the motion.

Mr. EPPES said he had no objection to state the reasons which operated with him. The bill contained various provisions respecting enforcing the law of May last. The non-intercourse went into operation to-day. It had been considered by the Committee of Foreign Relations, that, in the present aspect of our affairs, it would be better to provide for the relief of our own citizens, and suspend the passage of the law for enforcing the non-intercourse, until the doubts hanging over our foreign relations were dissipated. Under these impressions, the Committee had thought it proper that a distinct bill should be reported, to admit to entry all vessels sailing from Great Britain after the second of February.

Mr. RANDOLPH wished to know whether it was in order to make a motion amendatory of the motion for recommitment?

The SPEAKER replied in the affirmative.

Mr. RANDOLPH said he had attended the House with great anxiety yesterday, with a view to make the motion which he was now about to submit as an amendment to that under consideration, but could not procure the floor. The amendment which he wished to propose, Mr. R. said, was one which he should have wished to have offered in the shape of a separate resolution, and which he came down to the House to-day prepared to offer. He should make but few prefatory remarks on this subject. Time was short; was precious; and, above all, he should wish the House to act with promptitude, in whatsoever manner it might decide on this question. It would be remembered—and, really, nothing was farther from his wish, nothing was farther from his policy, than a desire to create an unpleasant sensation or reflection in the mind of any member of this House—it would be recollected, he said, that we had made a sort of retreat from the embargo to the non-intercourse law. Among the objections which then suggested themselves to the friends as well as the opponents of that law, the ingenious one which has been taken in France never once occurred; it was not contended, he believed, that it would give to that Government a plea for heavy retaliation on us. Such, however, was the fact. The sequestrations and confiscations of American property in France, have been made avowedly in retaliation of the non-intercourse law number one. From that law, however, we escaped to another position, changed our front, and took post on the act (he forgot the title of it) concerning commercial intercourse, &c.—the act of last session. And now, Mr. R. said, it seemed they were to have a modification of that. In some parts it was to be pared away, weakened, like some parts of this building; in others buttressed and supported, no matter at what expense of public prosperity or happiness; one-half the building in a state of magnificent repair, the other leaky, and unfit for the residence of human beings.

Nothing was further from his wish, Mr. R. said, than to enter into a detailed exposition of our foreign relations, but he asked all sides of the House to lay their hands on their hearts and ask themselves what benefits had accrued from the non-intercourse law No 1, and that of last session, No. 2? Why did they continue on the statute book those acts? Why were these measures, totally imbecile as relates to foreign Powers, altogether inadequate as to coercion on them, suffered to remain in existence? Let me draw a short picture, said Mr. R. Let us suppose a Liverpool ship, containing the cotton and tobacco of the Southern States, arriving in England, was confiscated, and the proceeds paid into the British Exchequer on the plea of retaliation to that non-intercourse law, which unquestionably did affect Great Britain as much as it did France. Let us suppose, in consequence of the passage of the law relating to commercial intercourse, the Marquis Wellesley writes to Mr. Pinkney a very polite note, informing him that inasmuch as we are disposed to withdraw our measure, so hostile, the edicts under which our property had been sequestered should be suspended conditionally; that Mr. Pinkney, in rejoinder, writes a very civil note to know what is to be done with the money, the proceeds of sequestered American cargoes locked up in the Treasury vaults, and, that the Marquis should reply, Why, as to that affair, the principles of reprisal will govern it. I will say nothing of the seamen lying in the dungeons of France; not that I feel less for the rights of man than for the rights of property, but because that subject does not appear to have been touched in the notes from our Minister to the Minister of France; or, if squinted at, not deemed to be noticed by that Minister in reply. The President of the United States, said Mr. R., (continuing his hypothesis), on the day on which the promissory note becomes payable, issues a proclamation in which he suspends this act respecting commercial intercourse. I will suppose that, on the first of January, a vessel leaves Liverpool conveying a note from Mr. Pinkney, from our Consul, Mr. Maury, from any agent, however low in the diplomatic scale, stating that all the vessels on which these decrees could operate had been put in a state of sequestration, (say on the 8th of December,) would it be possible for us, however well disposed, to gloss over this vile conduct; to believe that official advice had not been received at London in time for an order to arrive thence before the first of January? But, in the case in question, our agent did not reside at a distant port, but at Paris; so that there was an interval between the 8th of December and 1st of January, in which to send an order for the release of those vessels to Bordeaux. I will suppose, in addition to all this, that an American frigate, attempting to enter the ports of Great Britain, when in this act of amity, is treated with indignity, and compelled to perform quarantine. I ask you, sir, if the proceeds of the cotton and tobacco of the Southern planters, instead of being deposited in their pockets, was locked up in the British Treasury, and they were told that it was a retaliatory measure, and must be settled by the law of reprisal—I ask whether we should not have war against that country in four and twenty hours? Unquestionably we would.

But, Mr. R. said, his object was not to make war. His experience of the temper of the House, however strongly his inclination might be that way, had certainly operated a preventive cure upon any disposition he might find within himself to turn knight errant. All he would wish to press upon the House was, the propriety of relieving the President of the United States from the dilemma in which he must now stand, in consequence of his proclamation, by an immediate repeal of that law of commercial intercourse to which this new bill from the Committee of Foreign Relations is supplementary. Mr. R., therefore, moved, by way of amendment, that the Committee of Foreign Relations be instructed to bring in a bill to repeal the bill respecting commercial intercourse between the United States and Great Britain and France, and their dependencies. I make you this motion, said Mr. R., and, for God's sake, let us once more have clear states.

Mr. EPPES said it was not his intention on the present occasion to take a tedious view of our Foreign Relations. It was sufficient for him to observe that the Executive had complied with the law of last session; that the Berlin and Milan Decrees having been withdrawn, and these being the only decrees "violating the neutral commerce of the United States," in consequence of that withdrawal, the President had issued the proclamation required by law. With regard to the injuries we had received from each belligerent, Mr. E. said, he would not pass through the chapter of wrongs. On an occasion similar to that given by France, a similar arrangement was entered into with Great Britain, carried into effect, and communication restored with her. What had been then our situation? Had our wrongs been redressed? Had they not spoliated our commerce, impressed our seamen, and heaped upon the nation every wrong which insolence and power combined could produce? Yet, in that arrangement, these injuries were left for future adjustment, and the agreement under the law in that case, as in the present, was considered a mere arrangement for the purposes of commerce. No man felt more sensibly than Mr. E. as to the sequestrations of France; no man would go farther to obtain justice than himself. But, in the present posture of the affairs of this country, he could not consent to do an act which would go to violate the faith of this nation, pledged under the sanction of Legislative authority. The proposition was distinctly made in the law, was accepted by one belligerent, the evidence furnished, as required by our own law, of the revocation of her decrees; and now, when they did not know of a single case on which the decrees had since operated, he was not disposed to annul the whole proceeding. Gentlemen would recollect that the arrangement had been made in August, and from that time until the arrival of the Essex, no circumstance had occurred to give to France a certainty that the United States had complied with the engagements into which they had entered. The case of the vessel seized at Bordeaux was not that of a vessel from the United States, but from Gibraltar. It was not known of what her cargo was composed, or what the circumstances which induced her seizure. These circumstances were all unknown; and, although as an individual, said Mr. E., I am not disposed at the present moment, until I know certainly that they are withdrawn, to take measures to enforce the non-intercourse act, before I vote for its repeal, I must possess unequivocal evidence that France has violated the faith pledged to this nation.

The arrangement with France stands precisely on the same footing as with Great Britain. In both cases the Executive accepted the faith of the nation, pledged through their Minister; and if it should turn out that we have been deceived by both, it will prove that there has been always on the part of the Executive of the United States a sincere disposition to have peace with these nations. On the subject of the spoliation on commerce by France, and her seizures and confiscations, it would be found that in every letter addressed by our Minister to that Government the restoration of that property was considered as making an essential part of the arrangement. The circumstance of the Minister being obliged to return from France, at a period perhaps rather unfavorable, might have prevented that part of the arrangement from receiving that decided character which it ought to possess. Mr. E. said his colleague was mistaken as to the alleged cause of the seizures in France; it was not a retaliation for the non-intercourse law, but for the supposed seizure of property in American ports. He believed, that it was a fact that no such seizure of property had taken place; and if the law of reprisal was to govern in this case, if anything like justice could be relied on from France, the property would be promptly restored. Mr. E. concluded by suggesting to his colleague the propriety of offering his proposition separately from the present motion. There were considerations which ought to induce the House immediately to pass regulations for the relief of our own citizens.

Mr. RANDOLPH said it would give him great pleasure to comply with the request of his colleague, were it not for the circumstance that this non-importation went into operation to-day. The truth was, if there were to be in point of fact any operation at all; if the medicine were to work; if it were to have any practical effect, he would let it pass. But although in point of fact it would do the belligerents no harm, and unquestionably do us no good; it would be made an engine for sinking the value of the property of his constituents. Mr. R. said he was opposed to this sort of legislative quackery; it went to the impairing our own Constitution—to injuring our own health, without affecting our enemies. He thought the gentleman had stated that there had been no case in which the Berlin and Milan decrees had been applied to our property since the 1st of November. In the name of common sense, said Mr. R., of what consequence is it to us, if we are plundered and robbed, whether it be under one decree or another! Will the gentleman say that there is no case in which our property has been robbed, and the proceeds put in the French treasury? It is of no matter or consequence to us, whether we are murdered and robbed on the highway, or the rights of hospitality be disregarded and we murdered in our beds under the protection of our host. As relates to us, the question is altogether immaterial. There is a deeper die of depravity in one case than in the other, as relates to the offender—not a shade of difference as relates to the party offended. It seems, sir, that we attend so much of late to mode and so little to substance, that if we are not robbed and plundered after this particular manner, we may be robbed and plundered to our heart's content after another fashion. The question with us is, whether we are robbed and plundered. It may be matter at Paris, where there is so much in the mode, but to us old-fashioned people it is no matter, so as we lose our money, how it is taken.

Mr. R. said he should have been extremely glad to have submitted this proposition in the shape of a resolution, and discussed it in the Committee of the Whole to whom the bill was referred. But could it not be discussed now? Was it not as much in the power of any member under the present motion to discuss the question whether the non-intercourse law shall be repealed? His colleague, Mr. R. said, had justified the seizure of our property in French ports as a retaliation for alleged seizures of French property in our ports, which he allowed not to have taken place. Was it of any consequence to the people of the United States, if they were plundered under false and stale pretenses, what those pretenses were? He apprehended not.

One word, said Mr. R., on the subject of the faith said to have been pledged by the act of May, last. It cannot have been so pledged. Pledged to whom? To Great Britain? Unquestionably not. To France? Unquestionably not. What is our law? A rule of action. To whom? For ourselves. We have been aggrieved by the two great belligerents of Europe; we pass a law for the regulation of our own conduct, the operation of which is to depend on certain contingencies. Is that a pledge of faith to either of those belligerents? Unquestionably not. But this it does not behoove me to prove; it behooves my colleague to show how it is a pledge of our faith.

With regard to the anxiety of the President to preserve peace, Mr. R. presumed there could be no doubt of the fact; he never doubted it. He submitted to the House whether late occurrences did not afford an opportunity of getting rid of this wretched system of lame expedients, in which they had embarked since they abandoned the embargo. It might be said that in a short time news might be received of the repeal of the Orders in Council, which would, in the opinion of some, render this motion unnecessary. The law, Mr. R. said, was a rule of conduct for him, and no foreign nation had a right to know of its existence; and if news of rescinding the Orders in Council were to arrive in town this day, he should still be clearly of opinion that they ought to repeal this law. He looked upon the law as being mischievous; as having no operation on the Orders in Council or Bonaparte's decrees. If it had none, why retain it? Why keep it here as a germ of difficulty? Let us have clear stays; I repeat, said Mr. R. Let us have tabular rasa; and, if we must fight, let us fight without parchment chains about our hands.

Mr. MITCHELL said he was glad the business had been brought before the House; he hoped it was a harbinger of our emancipation from our own laws on the subject of commerce. The policy pursued by the Government for eight or ten years past, had been to deal in commercial restrictions; and if they had been found inadequate, it was high time to think about laying them aside. For the purpose of being understood, Mr. M. begged the indulgence of the House whilst he gave a little summary of the course which had been pursued. It commenced in 1804, when the English determined to interfere with neutral vessels carrying the produce of the colonies of one of the belligerents. At that time the merchants of the seaports almost stunned our ears with their complaints of oppressive violations of our commerce. Congress were told at that time that trade was annihilated; that its profits were entirely lost; that it was impossible to pursue it any longer with a prospect of advantage; and Congress were solicited to interfere. I well remember (said Mr. M.) the course of events; because, from my situation at that time, many memorials passed through my hands. In consequence of this clamor from the seaports, and the representations from the merchants that their case was forlorn; the Government, willing to do something to relieve them in their distress, and not willing to go to the extent of authorizing them to arm, went into a system of commercial restrictions and expedients of this sort—and out of these circumstances grew the first bill for a non-importation. What was it? It was a bill to exclude the importation of unnecessary articles. I voted for the bill, because I had a disposition to take those things which, if not as good as I could wish, were the best we could get, and we could agree upon that bill when we could agree upon nothing else. What was the consequence of this measure? The law produced no effect upon the country to whom it had particular relation, although seconded at the same time by a Minister Extraordinary to negotiate under Executive directions. The next step in the history of coercing foreign nations by commercial restrictions was the embargo, in which our people were told that the state of things was so desperate on the ocean, that the most proper course for our circumstances was to stay at home. This expedient was tried; and it was an effort of independence; it was an act which would have rendered us not only nominally independent, but independent in fact. It was found impossible to carry it into effect; and under that conviction it was repealed. From that repeal sprung the non-intercourse, which after a year was laid aside. The operation of that system was to allow a trade, not permitted direct, to be carried on through intermediate ports. We have since had the law of May last, proposing an alternative to the belligerents; which has brought us into the situation in which we find ourselves—one nation professing to repeal these decrees and the other disregarding the offer.

What is our situation with regard to the nation repealing its decrees? The detention of our property at St. Sebastian's is extremely oppressive to us. We have already passed an act this session appropriating nearly a hundred thousand dollars in aid of the fund for the relief of seamen, &c., in order to bringing home our seamen thrown adrift in that and other ports. We are told, by the documents on our table, that seizures still continue; and it seems to me, from all these circumstances, that the times are not changed for the better. It was wholly immaterial, Mr. M. said, whether our proclamation reached France previous to the late seizures or not; it became them to carry into effect their own declaration. Whether they had received our engagement or not, their decrees ought to have been annulled on the first of November. In taking a review of the circumstances, and finding these commercial restrictions not to have answered the purpose for which they were designed, he was inclined to vote for the resolution on the table, going to produce a change which he thought desirable.

It seemed to him there were but three ways in which it was worth while to treat this subject.

The first course presenting itself was a determination on the part of this people to stay at home. In that case they would be perfectly free from the assaults of the belligerents, unless indeed they should come to invade our territory. This course had been attempted by the embargo; the experiment had failed; it had been given up in despair. The second course, was to go on in our non-intercourse, subject to the restrictions of foreign nations, subject to the stipulations of the belligerent Powers, and to a submission to those regulations which stronger or more warlike Powers might think proper to interpose. This course is the one that he supposed we must come to, of allowing every one who choose to make an adventure of his personal property to do so, at his own option and personal risk. A third mode remained, and that would perhaps form an interesting subject for discussion, viz: whether the persons and property of individuals should not be saved from rapine and plunder, by some protecting arms. This, it may be said, will produce war. It seems to me, on reviewing the conduct of the belligerents, they are both at war with us. If the capture of property, its seizure and sequestration; if the imprisonment of persons; and in many cases the death of these persons, do not provoke war, I know not what is cause of war. If we consider what sort of protection should be given to property, it may be in two modes; one, in which the nation, in a national form, shall think proper to extend protection to the persons and property of its citizens; or, that protection which the arms of the individuals concerned may afford to themselves under the license of Government.

In order that Congress might arrive at something less entangling than the system in which they were involved, Mr. M. said he was willing to clear away the impediments in the road to commerce, and to allow his countrymen to advance in quest of profit—to have a clear sea; and when they should be once more in the enjoyment of a free trade, it would enable Congress to consider at leisure what measures should be taken for future security and protection. For, on looking into the state of things in this country, it would be found that they were involved in paradoxes. One was, that, having a power to lay internal taxes, Congress did not choose to exercise it. A second was, that Government refusing to protect commerce by an armed force, there should at the same time be immense quantities of property sent abroad under the guardianship of its own citizens, when it was well known that that property might and would be seized by the stronger Powers under any pretence they should choose to set up. Another thing incidental to the society to which we belong, said Mr. M., is, that, with a commerce under such circumstances, we must derive from that very commerce the revenue which supports our Government. In such a state of things I am perfectly desirous that there shall be a chance once more given to the navigating and commercial part of the citizens of the United States to go on without impediments on the part of their own Government and make their voyages as advantageously as they can; that they may go abroad like industrious bees, and return laden with honey to the hive; for, looking at our financial system, bottomed on commerce, I think we ought not to superadd to the difficulties under which commerce labors, restrictions imposed by our own Government.

Mr. WRIGHT said he was not a little surprised at a gentleman's rising and proposing a direct violation of the plighted faith of the Government, pledged in the law of May last in the face of the world. He hoped that such a breach of good faith would receive no countenance in this House. What! said he, after the Legislature of the United States have legislated on the subject, making a proposition, and one Power has so far acceded to it as to revoke her decrees of Berlin and Milan in so many words, are we to shrink from a performance of the contract? Mr. W. felt not a little surprised that, after this, any Representative of the American nation would feel a disposition, upon the receipt of a letter from a Chargé des Affairs, (which he did not know that he was, by the appointment of the President and confirmed by the Senate as required by law,) that any member would be disposed to slight the nation's promise. What does this gentleman say? That our frigate Essex arrived on the 5th, and that a messenger coming ashore was prevented by the ship's being held liable to quarantine; and that the ship New Orleans Packet had been seized at Bordeaux, under the Berlin and Milan decrees. Sir, said Mr. W., what information had the French Government then received of the proclamation of the President of the United States? None; it was not till the 12th that the proclamation reached Paris, where it was received by the people with great joy. We have no expression of the opinion of the Government subsequent to that time. In relation to the seizure of this vessel, whenever an agent does an act violating the law of nations, the Government must be called upon and refuse to disavow the act before it can be ascribed to the Government. What, then, has been done in this case? There is a letter written, no answer to which had been received when it was despatched. We find, too, that the vessel seized had been to a British port, and was loaded with articles not the growth of this country. Here, sir, we find our Chargé des Affaires telling us very hastily that he has written such a letter to the Duc de Cadore, and had not received an answer. And before we are informed what were the precise facts in this case, we are to act on a one sided information, and in fact without any information at all, and to impute to the French Government an intention, without knowing whether it was their intention or not, to disregard their promise. On this single case, on the true color of which there is no certainty, we are called upon to lay the foundation of a revocation of that law. In what a situation shall we place the country, should we act on the information, and to-morrow learn that the officer who seized the vessel was punished, and the vessel given up, and that the Government of France was well disposed! The nation would be much dissatisfied indeed, if, after having held out conditions to both belligerents, which are accepted by one, without the least information, or reason to expect anything from the other Power, we were to retrace our steps. Are we, upon information that Mr. Russell had written a letter to the Duke of Cadore, to which no answer was or could have been received, faithlessly to repeal a law containing so solemn a pledge? Could any man feel a devotion to the best interests of his country, who would place it in that predicament?

Mr. W. said he was friendly to peace; but if we must have a collision let it be with that nation which continues to injure our rights. If they should determine to revoke their act, before knowing what France had done consequent on the proclamation, it would be extraordinary indeed. Here was a very hasty letter of a young man just inducted into office, who in his desire to show his zeal writes a letter to give information, which when received amounts to nothing. Besides, Mr. W. questioned the correctness of the fact stated by him of the Essex being ordered to quarantine; because the messenger who went in her arrived at Paris on the twelfth, and could not have been detained on board the vessel at quarantine. As to recommitting the bill and waiting for further information, there could be no objection to it; but as to repealing the law, it was a proposition which ought not, under present circumstances, to be entertained by the House. Mr. W. said he looked upon our engagement with France in the light of a solemn treaty, and as such binding on us. If he could be satisfied, however, that these things had been done under the authority of France, he should be as ready as any one to denounce the act, and go as far as any one to procure redress; for he had been long tired of the aggressions on our neutral rights. He would go as far as the gentleman from Virginia. (Mr. RANDOLPH,) whose zeal he admired, but conceived he had really overlooked the true merits of this case. Should France slight her faith, he would go as far as any one to avenge it, and to bring those nations who have violated our rights to condign punishment.

Mr. BURWELL said that even if he was disposed to repeal the non-intercourse law, he should still be in favor of the motion of his colleague, because, if some such provision were not made, at a period earlier than a law to repeal the act concerning commercial intercourse could pass both Houses, the merchants would be subjected to great inconvenience. It had always been his opinion, Mr. B. said, that it would be improper to adopt the amendments proposed to the intercourse bill; it had been entirely his opinion that the property about to be imported into this country from Great Britain would belong to American citizens and not to British subjects. The circumstance was evident from the rate of exchange between the two countries. If the fact was undeniable that all property imported for some time to come would belong to American citizens, and it was the object of the motion to recommit to relieve our own citizens, Mr. B. asked, where was the necessity of connecting that subject with another, which would consume a great deal of time and subject our citizens to great inconvenience? Such would be the case, because, by the instructions of the Secretary of the Treasury, the collectors are directed to consider the prohibition of importation as commencing this day. If Congress did not speedily interfere, the merchants would be exposed to great inconvenience and the officers to vexatious suits, &c.

Commercial Intercourse.

As to the non-intercourse system, Mr. B. said he was perfectly aware that it was one which could not be executed to the extent and in the spirit contemplated by Government; that it is a system which tends to diminish the revenue, and demoralize the merchants, he might perhaps say the people, of the country. But he conceived that at the present stage of the business, this question did not properly come into consideration. For, although he might not be able to satisfy any gentleman that the relations between the United States and Great Britain were of the nature of a contract; yet in his own mind, it was very evident that we had entered into a stipulation which we are bound to respect, provided France fulfilled it with good faith—he said with good faith; for he was determined never to vote for its continuance unless it was executed with good faith. He said he had never palliated her conduct; he had no idea that we could ever consent to abandon the property she had seized without a shadow of reason—property on the restoration of which it appeared to him Government ought to insist with a pertinacity which ought never to be relaxed. Our affairs with France had been in such a state of incertitude from the commencement of the session that he had not been able to make up an opinion on them. When he looked to the correspondence, Mr. B. said; he was struck with this view; that instead of procuring from the French Government a clear and definite expression of their intentions in relation to the sequestered property, we are left almost entirely in the dark on the subject. He was not disposed to carry the non-intercourse into effect, unless the stipulations on the part of France were fairly carried into effect. This must be the opinion of every man. No man would continue a measure operating against one only of the belligerents, when he was convinced that nothing but puny faith was to be expected from the other.

Mr. B. begged gentlemen to permit the original question to be taken on recommitment, and let the present motion lie over for a day or two. If the non-intercourse could not now be repealed without a disregard of our faith, why take a step which would jeopardize all our property in the ports of the Continent? This consideration deserved reflection. He feared, do as they would, that this property was not secure. He confessed, if he were engaged in commerce, under present circumstances, he should lie on his oars. At the same time no measure ought to be adopted which was likely to produce a loss of property abroad. In the present state of the country it must be an object with every gentleman in the House, that our farmers, if it were practicable, should enjoy the benefits of the continental market; for it was well known that tobacco and almost every article we exported found an extensive sale on the Continent of Europe. The export to England of cotton and tobacco, except of the finest quality of the latter, had been attended with serious loss to the merchants engaged in it; and many of the failures taking place in the United States arose from the return of bills drawn on the faith of these shipments. Every gentleman must be convinced that our trade, if confined to Great Britain, would afford very little encouragement to agriculturists. It must therefore be an object with every man, by all honorable means, to secure a trade with the Continent; though, much as the individual interest of Mr. B. and the country at large would be promoted by it, property on the Continent was, and would be, in such a state of insecurity that he did not anticipate any very important advantage from keeping that trade open.

As to the protection of our merchants, Mr. B. said he did believe that they must ultimately be permitted to run their own risk, and, if they encounter ruin abroad, to take the consequences. If such was the state of Europe, that we could make no impression there, we must submit to this state of things. Mr. B. alluded to a remark made by Mr. Macon at the last session, that the belligerents appeared to be fighting every one but themselves. Did we not now get French silks, wines, and brandies, through England? And was not our tobacco sent to the Continent in the same way? Whilst we had been interdicted by each from trading with the other, they had been carrying on an extensive commerce with each other. Mr. B. said he looked forward to the total extinction of commerce. He said it could not exist under such a system of rapine as had been pursued. We must wait for some change in Europe in which we cannot be instrumental, to enable us to act; until which it would not be proper to take any step in relation to either of the belligerents.

Mr. B. took another view of the subject. He said he had not the smallest doubt, if the French decrees were found to be practically repealed, that the British would repeal the Orders in Council. He had no doubt in his own opinion that the British Government were perfectly sick of the system it had been pursuing. That France, not dependent on commerce, should make war on it, was not to be wondered at; but that Great Britain should by a kind of blind fatuous policy unite with France in the extinction of that system which gives her strength and power, was surprising.

Mr. B. said he was not in favor of non-intercourse with Great Britain, unless the promise of France was fully and fairly executed. He would say that no member of the House reprobated more cordially than himself the manner in which our vessels had been seized in France, &c.; at the same time he had the same opinion of the injuries we had received from the other belligerent. Mr. B. concluded by remarking that gentlemen who were favorable to a repeal of the non-intercourse ought nevertheless to vote against the present motion, and for that first made, with a view to the relief of our merchants.

Mr. GARDENIER expressed his hope that in the present embarrassed condition of our affairs no gentleman was disposed to argue on this question with anything like party feeling. If ever there was a case in which it was necessary to lay aside party feelings, it was at this time. The few remarks which he should submit to the consideration of the House would have only for their object the public good and general prosperity of the people of the United States. I shall not, said Mr. G., occupy the attention of the House by bringing to their recollection the different expedients to which the country may have had recourse for the purpose of curing the evils which have afflicted it. It is enough to say that however honestly intended, and however much good has been honestly hoped from them, the result expected has not been realized. It is not too much to say that in no one instance has the system which has been in operation for four years past been productive of beneficial consequences to ourselves. It were easy to detail how pernicious has been the influence of that system on ourselves; it has produced no good, but one continued series of evil. At this time, with these effects before us, on one side of the House feeling no disposition to embarrass the operations of the Government, and on the other side no disposition to persevere in this fatal system, we should look at our actual condition to provide a remedy for it.

After the first proposed non-intercourse law had failed at the last session; after the failure of the project of the Chairman of the Committee of Foreign Relations, (Mr. Macon,) who reported the bill, which every and nobody was for, we adopted the law of the 1st of May. The President has acted on it. Mr. G. here quoted the law, to show the nature of its provisions. During the recess of Congress, the French Government notified this Government that the unlawful edicts of France would cease on the first of November then next ensuing; and on the second of November the President issued his proclamation, not in the words of the act, as I understand it, that France had so revoked or modified her edicts as that they had ceased to violate the neutral commerce of the United States; not that it was a fact existing in his knowledge, but that it had been officially made known to him that on a certain day they would be revoked, I am not, sir, disposed to find fault with this proceeding. Perhaps it may be considered, the intention being made known to him, that he was, from the courtesy between nations, bound to believe the fact. He was to take for fact that the unlawful edicts were revoked, because it was promised that on a certain day they should cease. But, sir, I submit it to the cool judgment of the House whether, although, from this sort of courtesy necessary and proper to be exercised in a negotiation between the United States and France, the President was bound to believe that these edicts were so modified as to cease to exist; whether the British Government was bound to believe it? To the British Government was given by the law three months to abandon her Orders in Council—after what? After the French Government had intimated an intention to rescind its decrees? No; after the French decrees had been so revoked or modified as to cease to operate on the neutral commerce of the United States. The same reason of courtesy which was obligatory on the President would not operate on her rival belligerent, Great Britain, to oblige her to believe it. It may then be questioned whether that state of things existed which Congress had contemplated, three months after which the non-intercourse with Great Britain was to commence. The actual intention of Congress was this: Each nation taking the ground that her edicts were consequent on the unlawful edicts of the other, and each asserting so stoutly, that it was really difficult to know whether either was in the wrong, and, if either of them, which; the law was passed to ascertain which would persist. So far it was a well-judged law; so far as it provided that if one ceased to violate our rights, and the other did not follow her example, we should be in a state of non-intercourse with that other. But we should have given that other a fair and reasonable time to know whether she would abandon her system or not. If she did not, it would then appear, that that Power, supposing it to be Great Britain, was most seriously intent on injuring us. Therefore, in that event there would have been but one voice in the nation. For this reason, although I had no agency in it, I was always pleased with this feature of the law.

But I must say, sir, that it does appear to me that the course pursued has not produced the state of things which must have been the object of the law and of Congress; for, instead of dating the proclamation from the time when these edicts had ceased to violate the commerce of the United States, it was dated from the time when France had promised they should so cease; and, as between France and us, I have no objection to the proposition. But, as between us and Great Britain, to take the second of November, when France was to withdraw her decrees, as the time from which to count three months' interval, was irregular; because it was not and could not possibly be known whether she had actually revoked them. Whatever France had promised, the fact of revocation could not have been known to the President.

But if, to carry into effect the purpose, and what I deem the legitimate object of this bill, it was proper to take the promise of France at the last summer, and because such a promise was made, it was right to infer that such an act was done; for the purpose of dealing fairly with both nations, I ask why the proclamation was not issued as to both? Did not Great Britain also promise, if France fulfilled her engagements, that she would also revoke her edicts, declaring that she would wait until that fact was ascertained? Here, sir, is promise for promise. If the promise of one to rescind be taken as rescinding, so the promise of the other to rescind is to be taken in the same way. In this part of the argument, I am bound to consider both nations as intending to keep their word with us. The fact undoubtedly is, if France in point of fact has ceased to violate our neutral commerce, Great Britain must have ceased to violate it too; because this state of things then existed: Both powers conditionally engaged to revoke their illegal edicts—France did so, it being understood that the United States caused Great Britain to revoke her orders and blockades; Great Britain followed her example, it being understood that France keeps her word.

In this posture of our affairs it does strike me we cannot without partiality, evident and palpable, remove all restrictions against one, and continue them against the other. While I approve the courtesy with which the Executive received the declaration of France that her edicts would be rescinded, I cannot advocate the disbelieving a declaration precisely similar in substance from the other belligerent. It may well be doubted, as to the operation of the non-intercourse law, whether that state of things existed in which the President could say that the edicts of France had been modified. He has not said so, and he could not say so, sir, because he could not know it. All he could say he has said, to wit: that it was officially made known to him (not that he knew it of his own knowledge) that the decrees were to have ceased on a certain day. Have we really given to Great Britain the three months required by the law? From the time of promise we have, but not from the time of actual cessation to violate our neutral rights. Have the edicts of France been so revoked as that they ceased on the first of November to violate our neutral rights? Assuredly, whatever reason there may have been to suppose they had been so modified, every gentleman must now be convinced they were not so modified, because new seizures took place in December. In what situation then, sir, do we stand? If this law of May last be a pledge in one view, it is a pledge in another. We have given a pledge to Great Britain, if she cease to violate her edicts within three months after France shall do so, we will have no non-intercourse act as to her. Well, if on the 8th of December, France had not ceased (and that she certainly had not) to injure our neutral rights, I ask whether it be fair to count time from the 1st of November? Should we not at least commence with the 8th of December, because France had not then ceased her violations? It does appear to me, sir, that there can be but one answer to this question. Great Britain was not bound to believe France, but to put an end to her edicts when France should cease to violate our commerce.

The original policy of this law, sir, I do not hesitate to say, is departed from if you begin to calculate time from the first of November. We are now in a state of non-intercourse with Great Britain, and I know not how we are to get out of it unless by a repeal of the law. It surely cannot be imputed to Great Britain as wrong that she did not believe the belligerent opposed to her. Now the actual state of things is, that neither has revoked its edicts as far as we know anything about it. If neither has ceased her violations, the fact required by the law has not existed.

Now, though the President may have executed his power fairly; yet, if this act is to be our guide, we are not yet in a condition to ascertain the result of our experiment, and therefore ought not to be in a state of non-intercourse. Is it the intention of the House, after what has occurred, that the President's proclamation growing out of this should take effect—that we are to be on friendly terms with France alone—when not a single instance has occurred in which she has departed from her measures? Would you, under present circumstances, and under a different state of our laws, pass a law that we shall have intercourse with France and none with Great Britain? Assuredly you would not. No gentleman would agree to it. And the same reasons which would induce us not to agree to it should induce us to put an end to that state of things in which we are placed. I am agreed that we shall wait to hear from France; it is perfectly right; but it is equally right to wait to hear from England how she will act when the state of things arrives on which she has pledged herself to act. This can only be done by a repeal of the law, and there can be no use in sending back to the Committee of Foreign Relations a bill reported under the belief of the existence of a state of things different from that which we are officially informed does exist. If there be any other mode by which we can resume an impartial position between the two belligerents, I am willing to agree to it; for that was the real object of this law, to ascertain whether justice would be done by either. I am free to say that I do not believe that commercial restrictions will induce either to abandon its course unless the other does. Neither will begin. What measures should be adopted in that case is not for me to say. If we continue to be injured by both the belligerents, one thing is proved: that this non-intercourse system is not strong enough to bring either or both of them to terms. You cannot operate on them, unless perhaps by a promise to go to war with one if the other shall revoke its edicts, &c.

As to the argument in favor of delaying a decision of the present question, the sooner it is decided the better. Vessels now arriving from Great Britain, who is no more to blame than France is, are subject to confiscation, and not English but bona fide American property is thus confiscated. But, as the gentleman from Virginia says, let us have clear stays, let us begin to legislate anew. Our present system has not produced any good, nor can it; and if France should revoke her edicts, we can re-enact the non-intercourse.

To conclude, sir, I put the question in this plain, palpable form: Both belligerents, for aught we know, continue in force their unjust edicts. But we are in a state of intercourse with one, and non-intercourse and inhospitality with the other. Shall this state of things continue? Gentlemen must say no. If so, the next question is, how shall we put an end to this unreasonable, partial state of things? Only by repealing this act, leaving ourselves at liberty to devise such new system as shall be best suited to our circumstances and the present state of the world.

Mr. McKim was decidedly favorable to the recommitment of this bill for the reasons assigned by the chairman, &c., so as to relieve citizens of the United States from unreasonable difficulty; but he was opposed to the amendment offered to the motion, because it could not be adopted without a manifest breach of faith, and he hoped it would always be one of the first of objects with the Government to keep its faith with all the world. I am not of opinion, said Mr. M., that the law passed last session, authorizing the President's proclamation, was merely a rule of action for our own citizens. It went further. It held out a motive to Great Britain and France to induce them to cease depredations on our commerce.

It appears that France has availed herself of our proposition, and has officially announced that her decrees ceased operation on the 1st of November last. Agreeably to the terms of the law, the President has announced this fact by proclamation. France having acted on this law, it will be out of our power, without the most flagrant breach of good faith, to say that we will repeal that law; that France shall not derive the benefit contemplated by it. The gentleman from New York has observed that there is a distinction made in our procedure toward the two nations; that we have no evidence that France has so revoked her edicts that they ceased to violate our neutral commerce. When we compare the circumstances of the arrangement of April, 1809, with Great Britain, and that of November last with France, we shall find the expressions in both cases to have been much alike. Great Britain stated to our Government that her Orders in Council, on a given day, should have ceased; France, that her edicts would cease to operate. I can see no distinction here. It is the courtesy between Governments to take the assurance for the act, and not to wait, as individuals, to see whether they would do what they promised, &c. The President, in both these cases, has pursued this course—a course, in my opinion, seldom deviated from.

A great deal has been said relative to the inconveniences of the non-intercourse, embargo, and the restrictive system generally. That has no bearing on this question. The real question is—Is our faith pledged to France, and shall we comply with it? If restrictive measures are inconvenient, it is no argument against our complying with our engagements. We are bound to carry the law into effect. I hope this nation will never be guilty of a breach of faith, but will continue at all times to fulfil the engagements she has entered into. For these reasons, sir, though I am anxious that the bill should be recommitted, I am as anxiously opposed to the repeal of the law, as proposed by the amendment.

Mr. Fisk said that, on taking his seat this morning, nothing was further from his expectation than the discussion in which he found the House engaged: although unexpected, this discussion was not unimportant. It was important as related to the commercial interests of the country, and to the honor, character, and good faith of the Government; and he regretted that he had been prevented from taking his seat in time to hear the arguments of the honorable gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. RANDOLPH,) in support of the amendment he had offered to the consideration of the House. We are called upon by this resolution, said Mr. F., to instruct the Committee on Foreign Relations to prepare and bring in a bill, to repeal the act concerning commercial intercourse, &c., passed the 1st of May last. This directs our attention to the provisions of the law proposed to be repealed. The law embraces two principles—the interdiction of the entrance of foreign armed vessels into the harbors or waters of the United States, and a provision that, if Great Britain or France should, before the 3d day of March next, so revoke or modify her edicts as that they shall cease to violate the neutral commerce of the United States, the fact shall be declared by proclamation; and, if the other should not, in three months thereafter, also revoke or modify her edicts in like manner, that then the third, fourth, fifth, sixth, seventh, eighth, ninth, tenth, and eighteenth sections of the act to interdict the commercial intercourse between the United States and Great Britain and France, should be revived and have full force against the nation refusing or neglecting to revoke or modify her edicts, and the restrictions of the act of the 1st of May last were to cease in relation to the nation so revoking or modifying her edicts. The operation and effect of the sections of the act, revived by the proclamation, will be a prohibition of the importation of any goods, wares, or merchandise, of the growth or manufacture of the nation refusing to revoke her edicts, and a free intercourse with the nation revoking.

On the 2d day of November last, the President, pursuant to the authority given by the act of the 1st of May, issued his proclamation, declaring that it had been officially made known to this Government, that the edicts of France, violating the neutral commerce of the United States, had been so revoked as to cease to have effect on the 1st of November—consequently, the sections of the act interdicting importations from England were revived, and are this day to take effect. By the law of the 1st of May, we made an offer, embracing a promise, to both the belligerents. We said to Great Britain, revoke your Orders in Council, and we will exclude every article of French merchandise from our markets—to France, revoke your decrees, and we will exclude British merchandise. These offers were made to both nations. England neglects—France accedes to the proposition we make, and gives our Government official assurances that, after the first of November, the Berlin and Milan decrees will cease to have effect. What, then, becomes the duty of this Government? Why, undoubtedly, to observe and fulfil, with good faith, the promise it has made; and yet we are debating whether we shall observe it, or by a solemn act resolve that we will be released from it; that we will pay no regard to this national engagement. While we complain of the "punica fides" of other nations, we are about to violate the plighted faith of the American Government; to commit the very fault we so readily and justly condemn in others. On this 2d day of February, when the offer our Government has made is to assume the more imposing and solemn form of an obligation, are we to deliberate whether it requires our observance or not? In all the railing accusations made against the American Government, not even its enemies have charged it with a wanton violation of its good faith. And, sir, rather than our Government should by any act merit this imputation, I would see one half of all the American property sacrificed. On this day, the law of the 1st of May becomes a national compact between the American and a foreign Government; and whatever may now be our views of the policy and advantages of the measure, we are not at liberty at this time to revoke or abandon it. We are pledged to carry it into effect with good faith.

The honorable gentleman from Virginia has told us that this law is our own; that it is a rule of conduct. I admit the definition to be correct. All laws, even the laws of gravitation, are rules of action. But this law is not a mere municipal regulation to govern the conduct of the American people in relation to measures confined to themselves, without regard to others. The rule of conduct prescribed by this act, is more extensive; it connects a course of policy we have promised to pursue, with the interest and policy of another Government. There are now two parties to be governed by this rule, and we cannot, consistent with good faith, as one of the parties, say that we will not regard this rule of conduct, which, on the happening of certain contingencies, we are pledged to observe. Has it not been officially announced to us by the French Government that their edicts would, on the first day of November, cease to have their effect? Has not this modification been made known by the President's proclamation? Yes, sir, these events have happened, and we are bound in good faith to carry into effect the act prohibiting importations from Great Britain, unless indeed the British orders shall have been also modified or revoked on this day; because we have, by a legislative act, declared that, on the happening of these events, all importations of British goods into this country should cease.

But, it is contended by some gentlemen, that the French edicts are not revoked, and the seizure of the "New Orleans Packet" at Bordeaux, in November, is relied on as evidence that the Berlin and Milan decrees were then, and in that instance, enforced against American property. The information contained in the Message of the President, communicated to this House the day before yesterday, in relation to this seizure, renders it doubtful whether the New Orleans Packet was seized for a violation of the Berlin and Milan decrees, or for some other cause; and we have no evidence that this seizure was made by the order of the French Government. When the despatch of Mr. Russell left Paris, the views of that Government, in relation to this act, were unknown to our agent. It is uncertain upon what grounds the seizure was made. And in this state of uncertainty, shall we determine the grounds upon which it was made, and say that it was made for a violation of the decrees which that Government have assured us were revoked, when the next arrivals from France may bring information that the French Government have disavowed this act of the custom-house officer, and restored the property? No, sir, let us wait for further intelligence before we act upon this subject. Suppose that we should pass this resolution, and repeal the act of the 1st of May, and, by the time this repealing act becomes a law, information should be received from France that her edicts, violating our neutral commerce, have ceased to have their effect; that American vessels and produce are admitted into all the ports of France upon terms consistent with the rights of a neutral Power, upon the conditions, however, mentioned in the President's proclamation? Are gentlemen aware of the difficulties in which such a state of things must involve us, and of the dangers to which all American property in the power of France would be subjected? It is certainly possible that the next despatches may bring information of the total revocation of the Berlin and Milan decrees, however much the contrary may be apprehended; and I am willing to own, sir, that I have no great confidence in the success and protection which commerce is to find under that Government, which causes accounts to be published in its official papers of the conflagration of merchandise. I am ready to admit, that all hopes of commercial freedom and prosperity, in such times and under such a Government, will probably prove illusory. But your attention is directed to another quarter. Let it be admitted that the French decrees are still in force, and let us suppose that the British orders have been repealed or modified before this day, can we feel justified in repealing the act of the 1st of May? Certainly not. For if Great Britain revokes her edicts, and France does not, then we are pledged to carry this act into effect against France; and, in either event, we are not at liberty now to repeal it, unless we entirely disregard the promise we have made. We are bound to wait until we can learn the state of things in England on this day; until we can ascertain whether the British orders are this day in force against us or not; and, until this information can be obtained, we are not, in my opinion, at liberty to repeal this act. To repeal it would be an injury to the merchants instead of a benefit; it would expose them to increased risks and dangers.

We have been often advised to leave commerce unrestrained, and told that the merchants knew better than Congress the dangers to which trade was exposed. But the predictions which have been made on this side of the House, of the hazards to which trade was exposed, although at the time deemed evil and unfounded, have, unfortu-tunately, proved true. When, under the non-intercourse system, the avenues of trade to Tonningen and St. Sebastian's were left open, the merchants, in fancied security, crowded these markets, and the voyages have resulted in the seizure and sequestration of their vessels and cargoes; and, before gentlemen urge, as objections to the system of commercial restrictions we have pursued, the embarrassments which trade has suffered, they ought to show that, independent of these restrictions, trade would have been free and unembarrassed. For the captures, seizures, and sequestrations of American property have not been in consequence of any acts passed by Congress.

However averse we may feel to rely much longer upon experiments of commercial warfare, such at this time is the state of our foreign relations, as to preclude any material change in the attitude we have taken. The most we can consistently do, with the information now before us, is to recommit the bill reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations, in order to make way for an act to relieve American vessels and merchandise, in certain cases, from the operation of the act of the 1st of January last, which is to take effect this day. Thus far we may go, but to proceed farther, at this time, would, in my opinion, be premature. I therefore hope the bill will be recommitteed, and the proposed amendment be rejected.

Mr. QUINCY was in favor of the motion under consideration, but did not rise to go into the discussion. As to the violation of our faith, he said he would ask one question; whether our faith's pledge did not rest upon this single point; that on the first of November the edicts of the French Emperor were repealed? If they were not, all pretence of a pledge of the faith of this nation under the law was fallacious. I ask the House, said Mr. Q., if we have not perfect evidence that this was not the case? Look at the letter just laid on our table. Our faith was pledged upon the fact of the revocation of the decrees occurring; and that fact not having occurred as late as the 11th of December, no edicts having been repealed, we are at liberty to do as we please. In the first place, I will state a fact, that this Government has no evidence of any act done on this subject by Napoleon the Great. All the evidence we have on the subject is a declaration of the Minister of Foreign Affairs. If gentlemen recur to the Berlin and Milan decrees, they will find that those decrees are fundamental laws of the French Empire, and for their repeal of course require the same formality and authenticity as for their enactment. If they are not repealed in the form of the repealing law in such cases, the fact has not occurred upon which the faith of the nation rests; upon gentlemen's own ground. Now, sir, I ask if there be a gentleman in this House who pretends that there ever was a repeal of the Berlin and Milan decrees? What evidence have we on this point? In the first place the fact that the brig New Orleans Packet was seized at Bordeaux under the Berlin and Milan decrees by the collector of the customs; so that, so far as related to the custom-house at Bordeaux, the fact had not been announced in December. We have next the declaration of Jonathan Russell, who in his letter to the French Minister of Foreign Affairs, although he goes into a course of reasoning against the seizure of the vessel, declares that it will not be pretended that those decrees have been revoked. How then, sir, can gentlemen rest anything on the plighted faith of this nation, when that faith was pledged, if pledged at all, on a contingency which has not occurred? The French Emperor, in order to hold the plighted faith of this nation, according to gentlemen's own reasoning, must have done an act which was a repeal of a fundamental law of the Empire. No such act has been done; the faith of the nation then is not pledged.

Mr. CHEVES said he was not sorry that this amendment had been proposed; he was not sorry that the subject was now agitated, because it had already had the effect of eliciting private opinion on a subject on which every one hesitated and doubted how to act; and because it would enable them to embody public sentiment. But, after so much had been done, he hoped, for several reasons, that the question on the repeal of the law would not now be taken, but that the bill would be referred to the Committee of Foreign Relations. The honorable and eloquent gentleman who had made the motion (Mr. RANDOLPH) was not more dissatisfied with the state of our foreign relations than he was; or more satisfied of the futility of those measures lately adopted. Mr. C. said he had never been satisfied of the wisdom or propriety of the law of May last in any other view than one. He believed it would make the country act apart worthy of its character; it would precipitate us on a particular enemy—and this he believed the country required. He believed a more direct and proper course should long ago have been resorted to. The questions now before the House were, whether the bill should be recommitteed to the Committee of Foreign Relations for the purpose of amendment merely, or whether the motion for recommitment should be coupled with one which it appeared to him could not with propriety be ingrafted on it. The motion as originally made went to the modification of a law; the proposed amendment to a repeal of it. It appeared to him that the latter should properly rise as a substantive question. He should not be sorry if the bill was recommitteed merely for the purpose of singing its requiem; he should not be sorry if it should eventuate so as to remove the trammels in which the act of May might have shackled us. He said he wished, as much as any one, that the nation should be untrammelled and in a situation to act in a manner worthy of its former spirit and its honor. But in the present case he believed the nation could not act, and that it was committed as to the course it should pursue. He would meet gentlemen on that footing. Unless, he said, a breach of faith was intended, they ought not to adopt the proposed amendment. If the Berlin and Milan decrees were not revoked on the first of November, he agreed that the House were not under an obligation to reject the amendment proposed. But it was not in this stage of the business proper to adopt it. The gentleman who moved it predicated it on the facts communicated by our agent in France, or on the general conduct of that nation. He had said that the engagement was ineffectual; that the House was not bound to carry it into effect, because they were informed by the late communication from the President, that it had been violated on the part of France; because it had not been acted on in the spirit of good faith; because her depredations had been such as to make this matter embrace but an imperfect part of them. And if this appeared to him to be the case, Mr. C. said he should concur with the gentleman in opinion. But that not being the case, he said he would endeavor to show that we are placed in such a situation as to oblige us, in observance of good faith, to adhere, at least for a time, to the measures we have adopted. He would say his fears were that it had been violated on the part of France; but that there was no reason for acting with precipitation. The vessel bringing Mr. Russell's letter having left France 1st of January, and conveying no later authentic information, was a circumstance from which he argued unfavorably. But there was no reason for precipitation; and they would act with propriety if they should wait till later intelligence was received. If, within a reasonable time no disavowal of the seizure should be made on the part of France, he should be disposed to take it as prima facie evidence of a violation of her faith. But were the House compelled now to act? Could they not delay for a few days? He thought they might; and therefore objected to the consideration of the proposition to repeal the law of May last, at this moment; and wished it postponed till they could enjoy the advantage of further information. If they were now to act, and should shortly be informed that the act was disavowed, what would be their situation? Would it not be a breach of plighted faith or compact? Was it not better that the nation should preserve all it had left—its good faith? Its property and honor had been sacrificed; and all that was left was its good faith. If that were cherished, it would operate as an ennobling principle. He hoped the House would therefore hesitate; and, as long as they might suppose that they should depart from good faith by adopting the amendment proposed, that they would refuse to agree to it. As the gentleman who moved the amendment excelled in honorable personal sentiment, Mr. C. said he would believe that he also cherished an honorable national sentiment. But he apprehended that no violation of her faith by France was ascertained, either by the declaration of France or by the occurrence of delay sufficient to warrant the presumption that the seizure at Bordeaux was an authorized act. There had been a violation in fact of the engagement, but it was not ascertained to have been under the authority of Government. It was neither ascertained by a positive declaration or sudden silence that such was the fact. If it was, he should be willing to adopt the proposed amendment.

One gentleman had observed that the amendment ought to be adopted because the nation had heretofore endeavored, by all the means in its power, to counteract the measures of the belligerents and failed, &c. He said he differed from the gentleman in opinion that all the measures which could be tried had failed. He believed the country to be equal, without the imposition of direct taxes, to meet all its foes, to call forth all its energies; and he should not believe that it was not the disposition of the country. The evil was that Congress had not applied the proper excitements; it was not because the Government had not come up to the tone of the people. When the exigencies and necessity of the nation should call for it, the people would bear even direct taxes. But nothing of that kind need be looked to; the credit of the nation remained unshaken, its faith unbroken. Let us preserve that, said Mr. C., and we are safe; and I believe the time is not far distant when it will be the interest and true wisdom of the Government, as it is the actual disposition of the people, to resist the injuries inflicted on us.

Another gentleman had said that an incorrect construction had been given by the Executive to the law of May last. Mr. C. said he differed from the gentleman as to the construction. He quoted the law, which provides that when either of the belligerents shall so revoke or modify its edicts as that they shall cease to violate the neutral commerce of the United States, then certain consequences shall follow. The argument of the gentleman from New York (Mr. GARDENIER) was, that the law provided that when either of the belligerents should cease to violate our rights, &c. then such effects should follow. But Mr. C. said, the law provided that whenever either of the belligerents should so revoke or modify its edicts as that they (the edicts) should cease to violate, &c. then the President was to issue his proclamation, &c. Had not France so revoked or modified her edicts? Had she not said that her decrees would cease to exist on the first of November? What was this but a modification as required by the law? Though she should not act in conformity to her revocation, it would not produce any change in the fact. Though she should continue to violate the commerce of the United States, she will notwithstanding have so modified her edicts and decrees as that they should cease to violate the commerce of the United States. The seizure of the Orleans Packet was a violation of our rights; but the decrees were nevertheless extinct. What is a decree? A declaration of the volition of the mind. One declaration causes it to exist; another causes it to cease. The late seizure of our vessels, if authorized, is a violation of our rights, but not under those decrees; for the decrees have been declared not to be in force.

But, said another gentleman, (Mr. QUINCY,) the decrees were not revoked, because they were fundamental laws of the Empire; and the alleged revocation was but a declaration of the Minister, and that it was necessary that the decrees should be revoked by a higher authority. It is necessary, said Mr. C., for the gentleman to prove that it is not an equally high authority. I deny, that it is not. It is necessary for the gentleman's argument to prove that the substance consists in the form. I deny it, sir. There is a form in which acts are enacted; but forms may be dispensed with. Is it true that the fundamental laws of the Empire, the municipal laws, are obligatory on foreign nations? and is it necessary to the treaty-making power or to the execution of it, that the party treating should be possessed of a perfect knowledge of the laws of the country with which it is treating? No, it has nothing to do with it. It is not a matter of inquiry by the negotiator. The treaty-making power, the Sovereign of the country, declares that they shall be revoked. Sir, shall we hesitate in believing that the Government of France is a despotism; that all power resides in its ruler? When such is the Government with which you treat, what do you want but a declaration of the Governor to show what is the law of the country? No man doubts its supremacy. The declaration of his will is complete evidence of what shall be considered as obligatory on that country. Have we not then an unequivocal declaration of his will? To me it appears we have. I say, sir, that the decrees were removed, and that if the violation of our rights continued tomorrow, yet the decrees were so revoked on the first of November as that they did cease to violate our commerce. If our rights are now violated, it is a violation independent of the decrees, by the mere will of an arbitrary and powerful Government. If the decrees are thus revoked, we must have evidence satisfactory indeed to prove that they are in fact adhered to. This evidence we have not; but if it be afforded by an express declaration or uncourteous silence in answer to the remonstrance of our agent in France, it will then and not till then be an incumbent duty to act on the subject.

For these reasons I am of opinion we ought not at this time to act on a question not necessarily connected with a recommitment of the bill. I hope that the committee will be permitted to go on and prepare to meet circumstances which may occur. And, sir, I should not be sorry if the committee had no other duty to perform than that of chanting its requiem. I do not consider the law a benefit. I admit that nothing good is likely to result from a commerce with France; whilst her enormous duties exist, it will be a commerce without any benefit and therefore illusory.

Mr. WHEATON said, if it was agreed on all hands that the people of this nation were in an embarrassing situation; if it was equally agreed that our embarrassments had risen out of the law passed in May last, why not repeal that law? Mr. W. said he was not disposed to criminate the conduct of those who enacted that law, nor was it necessary at this time to criminate the conduct of the President of the United States in issuing his proclamation in pursuance of it. But in order to get rid of the embarrassments consequent on that law and the proclamation of the President, it was proposed that the law should now be repealed; and he thought no gentleman had as yet pretended to point out any mode by which this nation was to be freed from those embarrassments, other than a repeal of the law out of which they had grown; and it seemed now to be the wish of all, or almost all, that this law were out of the way, provided it could be removed consistently with that good faith which gentlemen seemed to think pledged by this Government to the nations upon whom this law was intended to operate. The principal difficulty appeared to be with respect to the faith pledged to the French Government.

It had been said that one of the objects of this law, the repeal of the Berlin and Milan decrees, had actually been obtained on the first day of November last; and, that being the case, that the Government was now pledged to carry the law into effect. Whether the decrees were repealed or not, Mr. W. said, he did not pretend to say. The President of the United States was, on the 20th day of November last, convinced of the fact. Whether the Berlin or Milan decrees were or were not repealed under all the formalities necessary under the French Government for such an act, Mr. W. said, he could not conceive that this Government was in any manner pledged to the Great Emperor to revive a measure against Great Britain so embarrassing to the great interests of this country. It seemed before this law had been enacted a sequestration had taken place other than that under the Berlin and Milan decrees, the effects of which had been more pernicious to the commerce of this country than those decrees. Permit me to ask, said Mr. W., if a man steal one of my horses, and I promise him if he would not steal another I would not prosecute him for stealing the first; and it should turn out that before I made this promise he had stolen the second horse, and he finally refuses to restore either—let me ask whether I should be bound in good faith not to prosecute him for stealing the first? We do not require of the French Emperor a promise of restoration, but a promise that he shall do so no more. Before we passed this act, however, he had done other acts than those contemplated by the law, from which more mischief had resulted than from all he had done before—ought he not to have made restoration before he could claim a performance of this promise from us? Would anything have been more reasonable, and was not that the opinion of our Executive all along? Did he not, in the communications to our Minister in France, tell him expressly that this law in favor of France should not be carried into effect unless the French Emperor should as well revoke those decrees as provide for a reparation of the mischief he had done in the mean time? I contend, sir, that it was not within the view of the President, when he issued his proclamation, that it should have effect unless restoration was made of the property so taken away. Besides, sir, have we a right to expect, or did this law contemplate anything more on the part of Great Britain than the rescinding her Orders in Council? But it seems now, sir, that the French Emperor deserves less at our hands but demands more than when this law was made; not only the rescinding of the Orders in Council, but something further which was never contemplated by the law; that is, a repeal of a blockade enacted in 1806. And our Government have given the British Government to understand that she would derive no benefit from rescinding the Orders in Council without also revoking the blockade instituted in 1806. Sir, are not the expressions in this law the same as in that of 1809, under which an arrangement was made with the British Government? Did the President in pursuance of that law issue his proclamation? He did. Was there any provision then made for a revocation of the blockade of May, 1806? There was not. Then neither this Government, France, or England, had any right to expect that that blockade was to be looked to or affected by the law of May last.

FEBRUARY, 1811.

H. OF R.

Now, sir, under all these circumstances, when the French Government demands more and deserves less, are we bound to carry the law into effect? No, sir; not even though we were certain the decrees of Berlin and Milan were repealed. Notwithstanding I shall always expect an ingenious argument on any subject from the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. CHEVES,) I was a little surprised at the ingenuity of the argument, that although the Berlin and Milan decrees were repealed to-day, and to-morrow the same conduct should be pursued under other decrees—that in that case the French Government would have been said to have complied with our intentions—

[Mr. CHEVES explained. He had only spoken of the construction of the law, and had not intended to say that the revocation of the Berlin and Milan decrees would exonerate us from noticing other injustice. If we had satisfactory evidence of subsequent injustice, he should be disposed to act on it as he would have done on the Berlin and Milan decrees.]

Mr. WHEATON appeared to be satisfied with this explanation, and concluded his remarks.

Mr. WRIGHT spoke in explanation of his former observations.

No member appearing disposed to rise—

Mr. RANDOLPH said, that if no gentleman wished to take up more of the time of the House, he felt very little disposition to do so: at the same time he wished to be distinctly understood, as to the pledge of public faith. His idea was, that the state of things under which the law passed remained unaltered; but in his opinion no possible act, whether of a friendly or hostile character, on the part of France or Great Britain, could have tied the hands of this Government in relation to the law in question. He could never believe that it was anything more than a rule of conduct to our own Government and to our own people; a warning to the people of what the law was to be; a preparatory caution to them; or, if gentlemen chose to go so far, a pledge on the part of this House to their constituents as to what our future conduct would be towards the two belligerents. He protested against the right of any foreign Government to interfere in the expounding of the laws of this land, unless where their subjects were aggrieved by them. The only mode in which this Government could become bound to another was by treaty.

Let us look back a little while, said he. We once had, if I recollect right, a report before this House declaring that only three possible alternatives presented themselves to the country—war, embargo, or disgrace. I put it emphatically to the advocates of that position—are those, who would have neither war, or embargo, willing to concede that by their act the nation has been disgraced? I put it to the gentlemen whether any pledge of this kind, given by a vote of this House, can at a subsequent time be conjured up, to terrify us into the adoption of measures, which every man acknowledges to be pregnant with great public detriment, if not with ruin.

My object in bringing forward this motion was to give that practical relief to the people whom I represent which they now do, or soon will stand in need of—to do away a system which has no effect upon their enemies, whose deleterious operation is confined to themselves alone. I want, sir, to relieve the Virginia planter, and not to settle questions of good or bad faith, or of mode or courtesy, with the French Emperor or his courtiers. We do appear to me to have involved ourselves in a most embarrassing situation. I am sometimes inclined to doubt whether some frenzy has not seized upon us. Gentlemen get up and depict in the strongest colors that they can command the injuries we have received from both belligerents. It seems to be the unanimous sentiment that they cannot be disguised or palliated, that they are self evident, and that it is a waste of time to attempt to describe, much more to demonstrate them. When, hey-presto! in the next breath we stand in such a relation to the Emperor of France that it is sacrilege to doubt—what? His disposition to injure us? No. That in fact he has injured us? Not at all—to doubt that he has in any one instance, although the proof is all the while staring us in the face—that in any one instance, this Imperial and Royal Personage has been found to depart from his imperial and royal word! God bless us! and is this the man of whom and of whose acts such pictures are drawn on all sides of this House, by men of all descriptions? Are the practical wrongs which the people of this country have received to be salved over with douceurs of etiquette? If that be the case we should send some dancing-master, some master of the ceremonies; if any such we have among us, to exchange bows with Duroc, the Imperial Grand Chamberlain; things might be settled in the style of the old minuet de la cour; they might make their honors, go all around the room in great state, and would, no doubt, end precisely where they began.

Some of the assertions—for he would call them nothing else—which had been advanced in the course of the debate, Mr. R. said, he did not hold himself bound to notice. He must say that argument he had yet heard none on the chief point in dispute; viz: that the faith of the United States is pledged, and that that faith will be broken if the act be repealed. An honorable gentleman from New York (Mr. FISK) had proposed to get over this difficulty. How? Not by repealing the act regulating commercial intercourse with the belligerents, but, forsooth, by suspending its operation. It is said, that on this second day of February, in the year of our Lord—(we still count by the Christian era in this country, I thank God!) one thousand eight hundred and eleven—you stand bound to carry into effect a rigorous non-intercourse with England. You cannot repeal it—but then you may say suspend it! How long? From session to session, as some laws have been suspended, ever since I had a seat in this House? I take the gentleman at his word and agree so to suspend. I am for substantial relief, and if the term suspension will operate as a salvo on the conscience of the gentleman from New York, no doubt it will be equally potent and operative with others.

Again, listen to my worthy colleague near the door (Mr. EPPES.) He too conceived that we were pledged to France. In redemption of that pledge he had brought in a bill for the rigorous enforcement of non-intercourse with England. He now moved to recommit the bill. Why? "There hung" he said, "a cloud over that quarter"—it was, however, but a "speck" in the horizon, not of war, but of treachery and ill faith. What, sir, had the Committee of Foreign Relations proposed to do? It was to carry into effect with good faith this contract which they say we have made with France, and which I say we did not make. Was it not the object of the bill, which the gentleman this morning moved to recommit, to carry into effect the stipulations said to have been entered into between us and France? Unquestionably it was. The gentleman, then, by his own showing, has found cause in the conduct of the French Government for failing to do that which by his own argument the United States are bound in good faith to execute; over which they have not any discretionary power whatever. The question is surrendered, sir, entirely on the other side. The expedient of the gentleman from New York to suspend the operation of the law—the proposition of the gentleman from Virginia to delay carrying it into execution, as he had contemplated before the late intelligence from Paris, are virtually and substantially, in principle, the same with my own, which has excited so much reprehension. The power to suspend of the gentleman from New York implies the power, practically, to repeal; and it is admitted by the gentleman from Virginia that a state of things has arisen in which he feels, if not released from his obligation, yet that it hangs so loosely about him, that he will desist from carrying it into effect. Upon the argument of either gentleman, the question is yielded. If the honor of the United States is mortgaged, let it be forthwith redeemed. If it be indeed pledged let us not come halting to this House with the national faith in one hand and expedients to evade it in the other. There can be on such a question no recurrence to expedients. This is the second of February. The time has arrived—the hour now is, when gentlemen, by their own arguments, if their arguments be just, are bound to fulfil the contract, which I do not, undertake to expound, but which they say has been made, certainly in a manner very novel to our Constitution, between the House of Representatives on the one hand, and Bonaparte on the other—a bargain which, like the bargains of old, with the devil, there is no shaking off. It is a bargain which credulity and imbecility enters into with cunning and power: it is like the stock in a neighboring turnpike, which you can neither sell nor give away, but which operates as an eternal lien upon every shilling of your property. Yes, sir! I call upon gentlemen to make good their promise to His Majesty the Emperor of the French and King of Italy—to redeem their pledge—to cut off in fact nearly the whole of our existing trade, in return for the liberty of trading by license from the three favored ports which it has pleased His Imperial Majesty to privilege. No man believes—I beg pardon, sir—I was about to say, but I will not, that no man believes one syllable of this breach of faith on our part. I have too much confidence in the honor of gentlemen not to be convinced that they have persuaded themselves to this effect, although it is incomprehensible to me. Bound, sir, to whom? To Bonaparte? Bound to Shylock? Bound to render up not only the pound of flesh but every jot of blood in the Constitution. Does he come forward with his pockets swelled with American treasure—do his minions, fattened upon our spoil, whether obtained by public rapine or private extortion—do they come forward calling upon us to make sacrifices of our best interest on the shrine of their resentments, in the name too of good faith! As well might the mechanic with whom you deal present you his bill after forcing you to deliver your purse on the highway.

I did not intend, sir, to say anything on this subject; but except the gentleman from New York, (Mr. MITCHILL,) not one has risen on this side of the House who has not contended that a breach of faith is involved in my proposition. I am sorry to speak of sides of the House, but they have been already named in the most significant manner. I wish, sir, that as the gentleman from New York and myself are likely to be alone on this question, he could derive as much consolation from voting with me as I shall have from having the support of his learning and ingenuity.

Mr. RHEA, of Tennessee, said that the law of the first of May last was not a law made by the House of Representatives alone, but by the constituted authorities of the United States, and was a most solemn obligation. The operation of that law did not depend on the bill reported by the Chairman of the Committee of Foreign Relations, now proposed to be recommitted; that bill might be rejected and lost; but the law of the first of May would go into effect immediately after twelve o'clock in the night following this day. The bill, to recommit which the motion is made, is not that on which a non-intercourse with Great Britain is bottomed; it is an auxiliary only, but not an essential one, to the law of the first of May; and contains provisions more effectually to enforce it.

FEBRUARY, 1811.

Commercial Intercourse.

H. OF R.

The opinion respecting the law of the first of May, at the time it was enacted, is the same as that now entertained by me. It is not a law of mere internal police for the citizens of the United States, containing regulations of conduct in their commercial proceedings. It is a law offering a friendly proposition of contract and agreement, involving the destinies of nations. By that law a proposition of friendly agreement was offered in the most conciliatory manner, and consistent with the most rigid neutral principles, to Great Britain and to France. The language of that law, in other words, is: You, Great Britain, and you, France, have respectively, by your commercial restrictions and edicts injured the United States, and deprived them of the enjoyment of their neutral rights; one other proposition is made to you. If you, France, or you, Great Britain, will repeal your respective edicts, so that they shall cease to violate the neutral rights of the United States, and will inform the President of the United States that you have so done, then he shall announce the same by proclamation; and if the other of you will not, within three months after the date of that proclamation, have so revoked your edicts as that they shall have ceased to violate the neutral rights of the United States, then, and in that case, a non-intercourse shall be enforced between the United States and whichever of you shall refuse to repeal your edicts.

At the time the law was enacted, it was not known that France and Great Britain, or either of them, would agree to the proposition offered in that law; that law, therefore, was impartial. Copies of that law were immediately sent to the Ministers of the United States at Paris and at London, with intent that the copies, with the least possible delay, be officially presented to each Government, that they might act on the subject as they might judge fit and proper. Great Britain had the power of choice and election as well as France, whether she would prefer a friendly and amicable intercourse, or a non-intercourse with the United States. France has agreed to the proposition offered by the United States in the law of the first of May. France has preferred a friendly and amicable intercourse with the United States, and, in pursuance thereof, has revoked her Berlin and Milan decrees, so that they have ceased to violate the neutral rights of the United States; and in consequence the President of the United States issued his proclamation accordingly. No information is arrived, declaring (and it is not believed) that Great Britain has repealed her Orders in Council, so that they have ceased to violate the neutral rights of the United States. The day of the existence of the non-intercourse is at hand; Great Britain has itself only to blame for the state of things that will be, that is, for the non-intercourse and the events consequent thereto. The law of the first of May is now absolute. France has acted on it, and made it irrevocable. That law may be revoked by a violation of good faith on the part of the United States, or on the part of France. If any compact can be of greater dignity than a treaty, the law of the first of May, made by the constituted authorities of the United States, and agreed to and acted on by the constituted authority of France, forms that compact. That compact and agreement, dignified in its nature and superlatively pre-eminent, by reason that it is founded on a law consented to by the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States, is a firm and bona fide pledge and guarantee of amity between the United States and France. And shall we now be asked to adopt a motion to instruct the Committee of Foreign Relations to report a bill to repeal the law of the first of May, and thereby to violate a compact solemnly agreed to and sanctioned by the United States and France? Shall the Representatives of the people of the United States be called on to do an act which, if done, would effectually destroy and erase every principle of good faith, would sink this nation deep in infamy and disgrace, and which, in all human probability, would eventually draw after it a war with France and her allies? If the proposition to amend be adopted, and the law of the first of May be repealed in consequence thereof, is there one nation on earth who thereafter would trust the United States, or confide in any declaration they would make? If Great Britain had agreed to the proposition offered by the law of the first of May, and if France had refused to agree to it, or delayed that agreement, I would, said Mr. R., in that event, have urged the non-intercourse against France. France has agreed to that proposition, the President of the United States has proclaimed the fact. Great Britain has not, as far as is known here, agreed to that proposition, and, in consequence thereof, the law of the first of May commands the non-intercourse to progress against Great Britain and her dependencies. Words adequate to express my ideas on this important subject are denied to me. It only remains to declare, that I will pronounce my solemn negative against the proposition offered to amend the motion for recommitment.

Mr. GARDENIER spoke at length in amplification and explanation of his former remarks.

The question was then taken on Mr. RANDOLPH's motion to instruct the committee to report a bill for repealing the law of May last, and decided in the negative—yeas 45, nays 67, as follows:

MONDAY, February 4.

On motion of Mr. ROOT, the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act to incorporate the Bank of Potomac," together with the amendments reported thereto, by the select committee, on Saturday last, were committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

Mr. POINDEXTER, from the committee appointed the thirty-first ultimo, presented a bill to enable the people of the Mississippi Territory to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of such State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Thursday next.

FEBRUARY, 1811.

Amendment to the Constitution.

H. OF R.

Mr. NEWTON laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of State to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, enclosing a table of customs, payable in Great Britain, upon the productions of the United States, taken from Meacall's book of rates, of 1803; which were ordered to be referred to the Committee of the whole House on the bill to secure to vessels of the United States an equal advantage in exporting articles, the growth or produce of the United States, to foreign ports; and for other purposes.

Mr. MORROW, from the committee appointed on the Message of the President of the United States, on the thirtieth ultimo, presented a bill for the disposal of certain copies of a collection of the laws, treaties, and other documents, relative to the public lands; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill to authorize the election of sheriffs in the Indiana Territory; and, after some time spent therein, the bill was reported with amendments; which were read, and concurred in by the House, and the bill ordered to be engrossed, and read the third time on Friday next.

Mr. EPPES, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, reported the following bill:

A bill supplementary to the act, entitled "An act concerning the commercial intercourse between the United States and Great Britain and France, and their dependencies, and for other purposes."

Be it enacted, &c., That no vessel, owned wholly by a citizen or citizens of the United States, which shall have departed from a British port, prior to the 2d day of February, 1811, and no merchandise owned wholly by a citizen or citizens of the United States, imported in such vessel, shall be liable to seizure or forfeiture on account of any infraction or presumed infraction of the provision of the act to which this act is a supplement.

The bill was twice read, and referred to a Committee of the Whole.

AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, on the amendment to the Constitution, proposed by Mr. MACON.

The first question was on accepting the amendment proposed by Mr. WRIGHT to Mr. QUINCY's amendment, (requiring each member to exhibit a list of his connexions excluded from office by Mr. QUINCY's proposition;) which was decided in the negative—ayes 31, noes 62.

The second question was on the adoption of Mr. QUINCY's amendment (going to exclude blood connexions from office;) negative—ayes 25.

The question then recurred on the main resolution, and was decided in the affirmative—ayes 63, noes 31.

The Committee then rose and reported the resolution without amendment.

Mr. RHEA, of Tennessee, moved an indefinite postponement of the subject, which was decided in the negative—yeas 32, noes 80, as follows:

Sturges, Jacob Swoope, John Thompson, George M. Troup, Nicholas Van Dyke, Archibald Van Horn, Laban Wheaton, Robert Whitehill, Ezekiel Whitman, James Wilson, Robert Witherspoon, Robert Wright.

Mr. HUBBARD then moved to amend the resolution, so as to read as follows:

"No Senator or Representative, who may have been such at the time of the election of any President, or during the term for which he shall have been elected, shall be appointed to any office, place, or employment, under the authority of the United States, until the expiration of the Presidential term in which such person shall have been a Senator or Representative aforesaid."

The question on the adoption of Mr. HUBBARD's amendment was decided in the negative—yeas 46, noes 67, as follows:

A discussion here arose on the question, whether the majority of two-thirds, mentioned in the Constitution, was necessary on all intermediate questions, or only on the final vote to pass the engrossed resolution.

Messrs. WRIGHT, BOYD, and RHEA, of Tennessee, were of opinion that two-thirds were necessary in any stage of its progress; and Messrs. MACON, TROUP, SHEFFEY, W. ALSTON, MITCHELL, and CHEVES, maintained the contrary position.

The House adjourned, without coming to a decision on this point.

TUESDAY, February 5.

Another member, to wit: from Pennsylvania, JOHN ROSS, appeared, and took his seat.

Mr. SEYBERT presented the petition of sundry manufacturers of coarse linen cloths, in the city of Philadelphia, praying an increase of duties on the importation into the United States of foreign manufactured linen.—Referred to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures.

Mr. PITKIN, from the committee appointed, on the thirtieth ultimo, on the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of William Mills," reported the agreement of the committee to the bill, without amendment; and the bill was ordered to be read the third time to-day.

Mr. ROOT, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was committed the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act making compensation to John Eugene Leitzendorfer, for services rendered the United States in the war with Tripoli," reported the same, with an amendment; which was read, and, together with the bill, committed to a Committee of the Whole to day.

On motion of Mr. JOHNSON, the select committee were discharged from the further consideration of the bills to incorporate the Farmers' Bank of Alexandria, and to incorporate the Union Bank of Georgetown; and they were committed to the Committee of the Whole on the bill "to incorporate the Bank of Potomac."

On motion of Mr. QUINCY, the Committee of the Whole were discharged from the consideration of the bill authorizing the sale and grant of a certain quantity of public land to the proprietors of the Middlesex Canal, and it was committed to the Committee of the Whole on the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act providing for the sale and grant of a certain quantity of public land to the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal Company."

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill for the relief of Richard Tervin, William Coleman, Edwin Lewis, Samuel Mims, Joseph Wilson, and the Baptist Church at Salem Meeting-house, in the Mississippi Territory. The bill was reported without amendment, and ordered to be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act making compensation to John Eugene Leitzendorfer, for services rendered to the United States in the war with Tripoli," and the amendment reported thereto by the Committee of Claims. The bill and amendment was agreed to, and concurred in by the House, and ordered to a third reading to-morrow.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill providing for the sale of a tract of land lying in the State of Tennessee, and a tract in the Indiana Territory. The bill was reported without amendment, and ordered to be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

BANKS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. CHEVES, from the select committee to whom were committed the several bills from the Senate to incorporate the Bank of Washington, to incorporate the Farmers' Bank of Alexandria, and to incorporate the Union Bank of Georgetown, made a further report, in part, of the agreement of the committee to the first mentioned bill, with amendments; which were read, and, together with the bill, committed to the Committee of the Whole on the bill from the Senate "to incorporate the Bank of Potomac."

The report is as follows:

The committee, to whom was referred sundry bills to incorporate sundry banks in the District of Columbia, having already reported in part, beg leave further to report:

That, in their opinion, the bills referred to them would authorize the establishment of a banking capital, which, with the banks already incorporated, would exceed what is required by the present state of the commerce, the population, the real capital, and the other reasonable exigencies of the District.

It is not, in the opinion of the committee, practicable, by the mere institution of banking establishments, to add to the wealth of the community, or to the utility, though it may increase the quantity of the circulating medium. On the contrary, they believe that a superabundance of paper circulation may, by destroying its credit and value, defeat its own end, while it will tend greatly, and almost entirely, to remove the circulating specie of the country. A paper circulation, within reasonable limits, is probably a great benefit; but, if unrestrained, or, what is worse, encouraged to transcend those limits, it will more probably become a great evil; and this evil it is the duty of legislative bodies, at least not to invite; for it will not be confined to those who, as the projectors of these institutions, are willing to adventure their property therein, but will be visited on those unsuspecting and unwary members of society who, with propriety, on such a subject, rely on a legislative guardianship.

The allegations, that there is abundance of capital, and that there is a want of capital, both of which have been alleged in favor of these institutions, equally prove, that they should be limited. If there be a want of real capital, there is no basis for an excess of this artificial capital; they are relative, and ought to be proportional to each other. The committee, pursuing and adopting these principles, but with some latitude, as they suppose, in favor of the applicants, have already reported the bill to incorporate the Bank of Potomac, and now beg leave to report, with sundry amendments, the bill to incorporate the Bank of Washington. The first they selected, because it had been some years in successful operation, and was, in other respects, unexceptionable; and the last because there is no other like institution in the City of Washington. If these shall be incorporated, there will be in

ENCOURAGEMENT TO MANUFACTURERS.

Mr. NEWTON, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, to whom was referred that part of the President's Message at the commencement of the session which relates to the encouragement of American manufactures and navigation, made a report; which was read, and referred to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

The report is as follows:

The Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, always disposed to encourage and extend the industry, agriculture, and manufactures, of the United States, beg leave to suggest the propriety and expediency of subjecting the articles specified in the subjoined resolution, to additional duties. They beg leave to refer to a report on this subject, made the 21st of June, 1809, and solicit that it may be taken as part of this.

Resolved, That additional duties ought to be laid on the following articles imported into the United States, to wit:

On ready-made clothing and millinery, — ad valorem:

On cotton manufactures from beyond the Cape of Good Hope, — ad valorem;

On lead shot, —.

Resolved, That zinc, alias spelter, be hereafter admitted free of duty.

"Report of the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, to whom was referred so much of the Message of the President of the United States as relates to the revision of our commercial laws, for the purpose of protecting and fostering the manufactures of the United States, and also the petitions and memorials of sundry manufacturers of hats, of cotton goods, of hemp into linen, of shot, of woollen cloths, and of salt, made to the House of Representatives, June 21, 1809.

The committee are fully impressed with a conviction of the importance, difficulty, and delicacy, of the subject submitted. It is a mine which even the industry and laborious researches of philosophers cannot exhaust. The committee are apprized, that on this subject men of great science and experience have supported, and do still support, diversity of opinions. With such impressions, they cannot approach it without circumspection. On a review of the reports made on the policy of fostering and protecting our manufactures, the committee find that the plan therein recommended and pursued has received the support of Congress; and likewise the countenance of the nation, if silence on, and long acquiescence in that plan, can authorize them to infer it. In giving to our manufactures the support necessary to withstand foreign competition, skill, and capital, the committee have on all occasions endeavored to avoid the danger of fastening on the community oppressive monopolies. For a manifestation of the solicitude which they have at all times felt, and the caution which has always presided over their deliberations on this interesting subject, they beg leave to refer to the following reports, which they solicit may be taken as parts of the present:

Report on the memorial and petitions of sundry manufacturers of gunpowder, &c.; 10th February, 1802. 1st vol. of Reports, page 217.

Report on the petition of sundry manufacturers of cordage, &c.; 18th February, 1802, Ibid. page 219.

Report on the petition of sundry manufacturers of paper, &c.; 8th March, 1802, page 226.

Report on the petition and memorials of sundry calico printers and dyers, &c.; 24th January, 1804, page 394.

Report on the petition of the president and directors of the New York Dutchess County Slate Companies, 15th of November, 1804, p. 491.

Report, on the memorial and petition of the Philadelphia Typographical Society; 22d January, 1805, page 253.

Report on the petitions and memorials of Paul and Joseph W. Revere, and sundry coppersmiths; 21st January, 1808, 2d vol. page 121.

The like spirit which dictated those reports maintains, without any diminution, its influence over the committee, and represses every disposition to depart from restraints, the observance of which becomes indispensable, if the public good be the sole object in view.

The shortness of the present session, and the want of materials, preclude the committee from giving this subject a full investigation. Though the committee have to regret that they are prevented from going into a minute discussion of the advantage that would result from a judicious encouragement of manufactures, yet they cannot refrain from expressing an opinion that additional duties at this time may be laid with advantage on the importation of certain articles. It must be obvious to every person, on the slightest attention, that the citizens of the United States possess sufficient ingenuity and skill to make up all the articles of wearing apparel and millinery that may be wanting for use. It is no less clear that shot, over and above our own consumption, can be supplied, and that other manufactures in which lead is the article of chief value, have progressed so rapidly as to deserve the fostering care of Government. The importation of cotton manufactures from the Cape of Good Hope interferes not only with our own cotton manufactures, but also comes into competition with fabrics imported from Europe, made of the cotton of the United States. Manufactories are in operation for supplying, and preparations are in great forwardness for increasing the supply of coarse cotton manufactures. If some encouragement be given to establishments of this description, the probability is, that a quantity of these manufactures, equal to the demand, may be supplied. Bedticking, of a quality superior to that which is imported, can be had in abundance.

The use of salt as a necessary of life cannot be dispensed with. To keep in the market a quantity commensurate to the consumption of the nation is certainly an object of moment. In a time of peace importations of this article are abundant, and the price low; but should the United States at any time be forced into war by a concurrence of inauspicious events—and they have no power to prevent it—the scarcity consequent on such a state of things would greatly increase the price of this article, and the pressure would of course be sensibly and severely felt by that portion of the community least capable of bearing it. The scarcity and high price of salt during the American war, produced no little distress. The apprehension lately entertained, that a deficiency in the necessary supply of this article would be the consequence of an interdiction of commerce with the belligerent nations of Europe and their dependencies, gave rise to some objections, not easily removed, against the adoption of that measure. To prevent effectually a want of salt, on the occurrence of any event, is certainly an object deserving the serious attention of Congress. Assurances are made with confidence that a supply of this article can be furnished by our own manufactories, equal to the demand, if encouragement be given by a moderate duty on imported salt. A nation erects a solid basis for the support and maintenance of its independence and prosperity, whose policy is to draw from its native sources all articles of the first necessity. As the encouragement sought can be given, it is respectfully submitted to the consideration of the House, whether the manufacture of salt is not, in a national point of view, an object of primary importance, and highly deserving its patronage.

The committee, with great deference, submit the following resolutions:

Resolved, That additional duties ought to be laid on the following articles imported into the United States, viz:

On ready-made clothing and millinery, two and one-half per cent ad valorem.

On cotton manufactures from beyond the Cape of Good Hope, on bedticking and on corduroys, and fustians, two and one-half per centum ad valorem—and on shot and other manufactures in which lead is the article of chief value, one-half cent per pound.

Resolved, That a duty of eight cents per bushel on imported salt, would give encouragement to the manufacture of that article in the United States."

AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION.

The House resumed the consideration of the unfinished business of yesterday.

The SPEAKER having decided that a vote of two-thirds was required to pass the resolution to a third reading, as well as on its final passage,

Mr. RANDOLPH appealed from the decision of the Speaker.

Much desultory discussion took place on this appeal. On the one hand it was said that a question on engrossment could not determine the sense of the House on the final passage of the resolution; and that, as an agreement by a majority of two-thirds to have the resolution engrossed would not have rendered another vote by two-thirds unnecessary, reason and analogy would dispense with anything more than a bare majority on the question of engrossment. On the other hand it was contended, that as, by the Constitution, the majority on a question to amend was changed to a vote of two-thirds; and as a vote of a bare majority, in ordinary cases, against a bill's going to a third reading would destroy the bill, so in this case a vote of a majority (as prescribed and defined by the Constitution for this particular case) would have the same effect, and, consequently, that a vote of two-thirds against the resolution's going to a third reading would totally destroy it.

The Speaker's decision was confirmed by the House—yeas 61, nays 59, as follows:

And so the said proposition of amendment to the Constitution of the United States was rejected.

The bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of William Mills," was read the third time, and passed.

CHESAPEAKE AND DELAWARE CANAL.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill for the sale and grant of a certain quantity of land to the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal Company.

Mr. EPPES moved to strike out the first section of the bill, and spoke in support of the motion.

Mr. VARNUM spoke in favor of the motion.

Mr. VAN DYKE replied to Mr. EPPES.

The Committee rose without coming to a decision; and the House adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, February 6.

On motion of Mr. KENNEDY, the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures were directed to inquire into the expediency of establishing, by law, an uniform mode of gauging in the several offices of the customs throughout the United States.

Mr. EPPES, from the Committee of Ways and Means, presented a bill for imposing additional duties upon all goods, wares, and merchandise, imported from any foreign port or place; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

Mr. EPPES, from the same committee, also presented a bill authorizing a loan of money for a sum not exceeding —; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Tuesday next.

Mr. CHEVES presented a petition of John Macnamara, of Charleston, South Carolina, stating that his vessel brought into Charleston, in October, one thousand eight hundred and nine, a number of French families, refugees from Cuba, together with their slaves, who had been forcibly expelled from that Island; in consequence of which, his vessel and cargo had been condemned for a violation of an act which prohibits the importation of slaves, and praying such relief in the premises as may appear just and proper.—Referred to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures.

An engrossed bill providing for the sale of a tract of land lying in the State of Tennessee, and a tract in the Indiana Territory, was read the third time, and passed.

An engrossed bill for the relief of Richard Tervin, William Coleman, Edwin Lewis, Samuel Mims, Joseph Wilson, and the Baptist Church at Salem Meeting-house, in the Mississippi Territory, was read the third time, and passed.

The bill from the Senate, entitled "An act making compensation to John Eugene Leitzendorfer, for services rendered the United States in the war with Tripoli," as amended, was read the third time, when Mr. BASSETT moved that the said bill be recommitted to a Committee of the whole House; and the question thereon being taken, it was determined in the negative.

The bill was then passed, as amended.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill, entitled "An act providing for the final adjustment of claims to land in the Territories of Orleans and Louisiana," with amendments; to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

Mr. MORROW, from the Committee on the Public Lands, made a report on the petition of the inhabitants of the third township, in the eighth range, in the county of Washington, Ohio, referred the twenty-eighth ultimo; which was read, and the resolution therein contained concurred in by the House, as follows:

Resolved, That the petitioners have leave to withdraw their petition.

Mr. LEWIS, from the committee appointed the nineteenth ultimo, presented a bill making further appropriations for completing the Capitol, and for other purposes; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

ADDITIONAL DUTIES.

Mr. EPES laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury to the Committee of Ways and Means, respecting the imposition of additional duties on importations of foreign goods.

The following is the letter:

WASHINGTON, January 18, 1811.

SIR: I am instructed by the Committee of Ways and Means to ask for such information as may be in possession of the Treasury Department, on the following points, viz:

1. What diminution of revenue will be produced by the exclusion of articles, the growth, produce, or manufacture, of Great Britain, her colonies, dependencies, &c.

2. What particular articles, or classes of articles, will bear an increase of the present duties, and to what extent, taking into view the security of the revenue, and the sum to be produced?

And any other information which may tend to show whether it is more expedient to increase the per cent. on articles paying ad valorem and specific duties generally, or whether the public interest may be promoted, and the deficiency of revenue supplied by an increase of duty on particular selected articles, or particular classes of articles.

With respect and esteem, I have the honor to be, your most obedient servant,

JOHN W. EPES.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, Jan. 28, 1811.

SIR: In answer to your inquiries respecting the diminution of revenue, which must result from the exclusion of articles of British produce or manufactures, I beg leave to refer you to a report made to the House of Representatives, on the 28th February, 1806, and which, together with the statements annexed to it, gives a detailed view of the importations from the British dominions, and from all other countries, for the years 1802, 1803, and 1804. More reliance may be placed, as to any general result, on the statements for those years, than on those for any subsequent period. There was a very extraordinary increase of commerce during the years 1805 and 1807, but although the amount of importations was much larger, the proportion from the different countries had not been materially altered. From the last three years no correct inferences can be drawn. The time requisite to prepare similar statements for the last six years would also delay an answer; and the annual reports of importations in American and foreign vessels, will furnish such additional facts for any one year as may be wanted.

It appears from that report, (page 9,) that the net duties (after deducting drawbacks) on merchandise imported from the British dominions, and from all other countries, might be established as follows:

British dominions. All other countries.

On merchandise paying duties ad valorem , including the additional duties called the Mediterranean fund - -	$4,257,000	1,238,000
On all other articles, deducting salt, the duty on which is now repealed - -	1,629,000	4,741,000
	5,886,000	5,979,000

At that time, however, in the years 1802 and 1804, non-importation from Great Britain would not have diminished the revenue to that extent, as the continent of Europe being then open to the United States, a great number of articles usually imported from Great Britain would have been supplied by other countries. A considerable diminution must take place in relation to all the articles which cannot be thus supplied, or which may now be manufactured in the United States. And it was principally on account of the uncertain state of commerce with the rest of the world, that in the annual report of the 10th December last, I stated that "the probable defalcation in the revenue could not, for obvious reasons, be at this time estimated with any degree of precision."

In relation to the other inquiry of the committee, it appears to me, that the discrimination between the dutiable articles would at this time be inexpedient. Those which will certainly continue to be imported, particularly spirits, wines, teas, sugar, and coffee, are for that reason, those on which an increase of duty would be most productive. But that consideration alone does not seem sufficient to recommend a higher rate of increase on those than on other articles; and I think that a general and equal increase on the rates of duties now paid, is, for the present, the most eligible mode.

I have the honor to be, &c.

ALBERT GALLATIN.

Hon. JOHN W. EPES,

Chairman Committee of Ways and Means.

DEPOSITES IN STATE BANKS.

Mr. POTTER said that at a time when they were introducing bills for the purpose of borrowing money and for laying additional duties, and thereby increasing the taxes on their constituents, he thought they ought to make the best of the resources already in our power. The stockholders of the United States' Bank (said he) have offered one million two hundred and fifty thousand dollars for the renewal of their charter; and it is believed they would give considerably more, if they could have a charter unencumbered with other conditions. This sum of money they would give the United States for a charter, for the advantage of the Government deposits, and for the universal credit and extensive circulation it gives to its paper, which is receivable for all debts due the United States. As there now appears no probability of the extension of that charter, and as the deposits will be soon withdrawn, and in all probability placed in State banks, I am not willing they should have that privilege without paying an equivalent. It appears to me that those interested in the State banks, that expect to be benefited by the deposit of the money of the United States, in their opposition to the renewal of the charter of the Bank of the United States, have manifested a strange kind of patriotism; and, as it appears to me, of the French kind; which is a love of money more than a love of country. I am not willing they should have this money for nothing, when it is worth at least six per cent, to those from whom it is collected. The State banks that may have those deposits will not only derive very great advantages from them, by enabling them to increase their discounts and dividends; but it will give to their bills a more extensive circulation. This money is certainly worth three per cent. to the State banks. If then our deposits should be only three millions, at that rate the interest would be ninety thousand dollars per annum, and if we should release our commerce from the operation of our own restrictions, it might soon amount to ten millions, which would give an interest of three hundred thousand dollars, a sum worth saving. I find a considerable sum of this money in the bank at Pittsburg, and from that neighborhood we have had a remonstrance against the renewal of the charter of the United States' Bank. Another considerable sum is in two banks in the State of Rhode Island, at present amounting to seventy-eight thousand two hundred and twenty six dollars. This is worth three per cent. to them, and I will give that interest for it with the same advantages and indulgences that they have had, and give unquestionable security for it. My object is to provide by law for the deposit of this money, by giving it to those banks that will give the Government the most for that privilege, and afford ample security for the same. This will prevent the Secretary of the Treasury from having it in his power to give exclusive advantages to certain banks, and will relieve him from part of his responsibility and from the charge of partiality. And for that purpose I beg leave to submit the following resolution, which will give the banks of all parties an opportunity to compete for this privilege; and they that will give the most for it will have it, and the nation be benefited by the money:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of providing and directing by law that the deposits of the moneys of the United States be made in such of the State banks as shall pay the most for that privilege, and comply with such terms and conditions as may be necessary to secure any moneys which may be placed in the same.

Mr. EPPES was opposed to the principle of this resolution. He thought it improper that the deposits of the public money should be set up to the highest bidder—the subject was already generally referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, or he would not object to a resolution for inquiry. Mr. E. stated the provision of the law on the subject of deposits.

Mr. LOVE hoped the resolution would pass.

At the suggestion of Mr. GARDENIER the resolution was adopted, and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

COMMERCIAL INTERCOURSE.

The House went into Committee of the Whole on the following bill reported by the Committee of Foreign Relations:

A Bill supplementary to the act, entitled "An act concerning the commercial intercourse between the United States and Great Britain and France, and their dependencies, and for other purposes."

Be it enacted, &c., That no vessel owned wholly by a citizen or citizens of the United States, which shall have departed from a British port prior to the second day of February, one thousand eight hundred and eleven, and no merchandise owned wholly by a citizen or citizens of the United States, imported in such vessel, shall be liable to seizure or forfeiture, on account of any infraction or presumed infraction of the provisions of the act to which this act is a supplement.

Mr. EMOTT moved to amend the same by striking out the words in italic, and to insert in their place "or merchandise." The bill, as amended, would read as follows:

"That no vessel or merchandise shall be liable to seizure or forfeiture on account of any infraction, or presumed infraction, of the provisions of the act to which this act is a supplement."

Mr. EMOTT.—Mr. Chairman: As the bill which is now on your table is calculated to relieve our merchants in part from the restrictive system, which has again been attempted to be put in operation, I so far approve of it; but as it does not appear to me to go far enough, I rise for the purpose of moving an amendment, which, if adopted, will once more give us a clear deck; and while I am up, the Committee will permit me, as concisely as the nature of the subject will admit, to assign the reasons which induce me to propose the amendment.

By the law of the first of May last, the President was authorized, in case either of the great belligerents, before the third of March, revoked her anti-neutral edicts, to proclaim the same, and if the other did not in three months also revoke, a non-intercourse with her was to follow. On the second day of November, the President had proclaimed, as a fact, that France had made the necessary revocation; and it follows, if he was correct as to the fact, that on the second day of this month the non-intercourse went into operation against Great Britain.

As many formerly, and more latterly, have doubted as to the fact thus proclaimed, it becomes, sir, a duty which we owe to ourselves and to the people, to inquire into its existence; for if it be true that no such repeal, as was contemplated by the law, has taken place; if indeed the President has been deceived, or was mistaken, we cannot too soon make it known, and relieve the country from the vexation and embarrassment which must result from the present state of things.

If, sir, additional motives were necessary, we may find them in the bills which have this morning been introduced into the House by the Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, at the instance of the Secretary of the Treasury, one of which goes to lay large additional duties, and the other to authorize a loan. The reasons assigned by the Secretary for this new and heavy tax on our citizens are, that as the greater part of our duties on imports are collected on goods coming from Great Britain and her colonies, and as those duties will cease with the revival of the non-importation, it becomes necessary, in order to prevent a defalcation in the revenue, to tax the production of other countries much beyond the present rate. On this presumed defalcation, too, in some degree depends the proposition for a loan, or, if a loan be necessary, the amount of

it. In this point of view, it becomes highly important to ascertain whether the non-intercourse has gone into operation; for if it has not, I trust we shall not proceed to give form and shape to the recommendation of the Secretary, that we shall not burden the country with new taxes, or subject it to large loans.

In the commencement of this inquiry, Mr. Chairman, we naturally ask ourselves, what edicts are to be revoked, and how are they to be revoked? It is not material to extend this inquiry to Great Britain, as we know of no revocation on her part, and, under all circumstances, we have not, I fear, much reason to believe that there will be such revocation. But it may be well to notice here something which has the appearance of inconsistency, on the part of our Executive, towards that Government.

The non-intercourse law of March, 1809, contains a provision, that "in case either France or Great Britain shall so revoke or modify her edicts, as that they shall cease to violate the neutral commerce of the United States," the President should declare the same by proclamation, and the non-intercourse was then to cease as to the nation revoking. It was under this law, and in consequence of the power so given to the President, that the celebrated, though ill-fated arrangement, was made between the Executive and the British Minister, Mr. Erskine. Now, sir, by referring to this arrangement, you will find, that on April 18, Mr. Erskine proposed to Secretary Smith the revocation of the Orders in Council of January and November, 1807, as a compliance on the part of Great Britain with the terms of the act of March; and our Secretary, on the same day, declaring that the withdrawing of such orders would be deemed satisfactory by the President, the arrangement was completed on the 19th, and a proclamation accordingly issued on the ground, and assuming the fact, that the British edicts had ceased to violate our neutral commerce, and again opening the intercourse between the two countries after the 10th of June.

This arrangement, and the short and hasty correspondence connected with it, you will recollect, sir, were presented to Congress with the Message, at the opening of the Summer session of 1809, and we then passed a law, the object of which was to ratify and to carry into effect the arrangement. Here, then, we have an explicit opinion from both the Executive and the Legislature, that the only British orders which came within the spirit and intent of the law of March, were those of January and November, 1807, and that, when those orders were revoked, the edicts of Great Britain ceased to violate the commerce of the United States.

I pray you now, Mr. Chairman, to turn with me to the law of May last; you will there find the precise phraseology of the act of March: "In case either Great Britain or France shall so revoke or modify her edicts, as that they shall cease to violate the neutral commerce of the United States," the President is to make known the fact by proclamation. The authority given to the President is in both cases the same, and it was to have been presumed that it would have been exercised on the same terms. But, sir, it will be found, on referring to the papers that, under the act of May, the Executive made a further requisition. The revocation of the Orders in Council of January and November was not to satisfy us, but the blockade of the year preceding was to be also annulled.

In the letter from Secretary Smith to our Minister at London, of the 5th of July, 1810, and which enclosed a copy of the law of May, it is said, "that in explaining the extent of the repeal which is required on the British side, Mr. Pinkney will let it be distinctly understood, that it must necessarily include an annulment of the blockade of 1806;" and our Minister, accordingly, in his letter to Lord Wellesley, of the 21st of September, tells him it is his duty to state "that an annulment of the blockade of May, 1806, is considered by the President to be as indispensable, in the view of the act, as the revocation of the British Orders in Council." Nay, so far has the President gone in this particular, as to give the French Government a pledge that this will be required on the part of Great Britain. In the letter from Secretary Smith to General Armstrong, of the 5th of July, 1810, the latter is authorized, if it should be found necessary, to "let it be understood that a repeal of the illegal blockades of a date prior to the Berlin decree, namely, that of May, 1806, will be included in the condition required of Great Britain."

It is not my intention, at this time, to enter into a discussion on the subject of blockades, nor am I to be understood as giving countenance to the system of paper blockades, whether that system proceeds from or is attempted to be enforced by England or by France; but, sir, I have gone into this examination to show that the President has acted differently under two laws which ought to have had the same practical construction, because the terms used in them were alike; that under the law of May, 1810, he added a condition to a settlement with Great Britain, which he did not require under the law of March, 1809; and why this difference?

Will it be said, that when the arrangement was made with Mr. Erskine, the President had no knowledge of the blockading orders of May, 1806? Not so, sir. By recurring to a report made by Mr. Madison, as Secretary of State, in December, 1808, of belligerent decrees and orders affecting neutral commerce, you will find this very blockade; and certainly what he knew as Secretary in December, he must have known as President in the April following. Shall I be told the President had discovered that the blockade had been "avowed to be comprehended in, and identified with, the Orders in Council?" I fear this will not be a satisfactory answer. For, in this case, if the Orders in Council are rescinded, the connexion between them and the blockade will then stand as it was supposed by the Executive to stand when the arrangement was entered into.

H. OF R.

Persons, Mr. Chairman, more prone to jealousy than myself, and who are disposed to find fault with the late Executive projects, may perhaps point to that passage in the letter from Secretary Smith to Mr. Pinkney, of the 22d of May, 1810, in which it is said, that the President has read, with surprise and regret, the reply of Lord Wellesley to the note requiring explanations with respect to the blockade of France, which "evinces an inflexible determination to persevere in the system of blockade," as affording a reason for this added condition: they may say that it was thrust in when our Administration were satisfied that it would not be acceded to by the British, and for the purpose of preventing an accommodation with, and keeping up the irritation against, that nation. But while, for myself, I disclaim this inference, I must confess that I am at a loss to assign a sufficient motive for the difference in the two cases.

As to France, sir, what were the edicts to be revoked, and how revoked? I shall have occasion, before I sit down, to notice the Berlin and Milan decrees. But were there not other decrees?

We have before us the Rambouillet decree, with a date of the 23d of March, 1810, which declares that "all vessels navigating under the flag of the United States, or possessed in whole or in part by a citizen or subject of that Power, which, counting from the 20th of May, 1809, have entered, or shall enter into the ports of our Empire, of our colonies, or of the countries occupied by our arms, shall be seized, and the product of the sales shall be deposited in the surplus fund." Thus embracing almost the whole of continental Europe; for, with the exception of the Russian ports on the Baltic, and two or three places in the European peninsula, every port frequented by the Americans belonged either to the Empire of France, to the colonies of that Empire, or to countries occupied by the forces of the Empire. The seizures under this decree were consequently great and distressing to our merchants.

This decree purports to be an act of reprisal on this country, and for what cause? Not for any act of hostility by us; not for any seizures or confiscations of French vessels or French property under the authority, or within the limits of this Government. No, sir, a pretence of this kind appeared too absurd to be inserted even in a French decree. It is true that General Armstrong, in his letter to Secretary Smith, of the 10th of September, 1810, communicates a verbal explanation which accompanied the last letter of the French Minister: "If you confiscate French property under the law of non-intercourse, they will confiscate your property under their decree of Rambouillet." Ay, sir, and they have given a practical explanation that they would confiscate their property under the decree, although we did not confiscate their property under the non-intercourse law. Look at the decree itself, and you will find the motive, or rather the pretext for this act of reprisal. It is grounded on the passing of the act of the 1st of March, 1809, and it is grounded on that alone.

Thus, because we deemed it advisable to pass a law which we supposed was a mere municipal regulation, inasmuch as it related to our own citizens, or our own territories; a law, which, according to its letter, applied equally to both belligerents, and which, as it was not to commence its operation until the 20th of May, contained in itself a notice sufficient to prevent any injury to French subjects; for this cause, and for this alone, the Emperor adopts, as an act of reprisal, a decree which subjects to seizure and confiscation, not only American property which should reach the Continent after notice of the decree, or even after its date, but property which arrived there at any time for the preceding twelve months. I will not stop to inquire what would and what ought to have been the feelings of the Administration and of the country, if such an outrage had been committed by England for such a cause. But, sir, if the French Government is allowed to have in the act of March an excuse for reprisal, we had better discontinue making laws altogether; for it is difficult to find in our statute book a law less hostile to France, or more within the right of an independent Government to enact.

To see the true character of this decree, we must approach it a little nearer; and with the letters of the Duke of Cadore in my hand—those letters, sir, which have occasioned our present embarrassments—I am strangely deceived if this proceeding of the French Government does not appear to partake of the nature of an offence which, as respects individuals, is called swindling. It is a taking of property under false pretences.

In the letter from the French Minister to General Armstrong, of the 5th of August, 1810, we find the French Government attempting to justify the issuing of the Rambouillet decree at the time it did, because it, until "very lately," had no knowledge of the non-intercourse law. "The act of the 1st of March has raised the embargo and substituted for it a measure the most injurious to the interests of France. This act, of which the Emperor knew nothing, until very lately, interdicted to French vessels the commerce of France. Reprisal was a right, and commanded by the dignity of France." Permit me, sir, to recall to your recollection a fact, that this decree, although it is dated the 23d of March, was not issued until the 14th of May, 1810, and to refer you, for the evidence of this fact, to the letter from General Armstrong to Mr. Smith, of the 24th of May, in which the General states, that "on the 14th instant was published here (at Paris) a decree of the Emperor, dated at Rambouillet on the 23d of March, and that several of our ships and cargoes, with regard to which compromises have been made under the sanction of the Council of Prizes, have been seized again to satisfy the provisions of the new decree."

From the date of our law, the 1st of March,

1809, until the time of publishing the decree, the 14th of May, 1810, we have nearly fifteen months, and yet the Emperor, until lately, "very lately," knew nothing of the law. What, sir! was he, during all this time, so totally inattentive to the affairs of this country, as not by himself, or his agents, to peruse our public journals, containing the law? Had he never, do you believe, heard of the arrangement of Mr. Erskine under this very act? Did his Minister, in this country, and his host of Consuls and Agents, omit, during all this time, to send him this obnoxious statute? But, we are not left to inference on this subject; a slight review of our public documents will place this pretence in its true light.

General Armstrong, in a note to the Duke of Cadore, which followed the letter of the 5th of August, tells him that the act of March, and all other acts of this Government, which interested France, had been communicated by him officially and promptly, and informs his Excellency, that he "can at any time ascertain the correctness of this statement by referring to the archives of his own department." In a letter from the General to the French Minister of the 10th of March, 1810, it is stated, that the law "was first communicated to His Majesty in June or July last, (1809), and certainly did not then excite any suspicion of feeling unfriendly to the American Government." Far from this, its communication "was immediately followed by overtures of accommodation." But, more direct still: On the 15th of March, 1809, a copy of the law of the 1st of March, was transmitted by Mr. Smith to our Minister at Paris, and we have a copy of his letter to Count Champagny, of the 29th of April, 1809, in which he states that he has the honor of presenting to his Excellency a copy of the law of March, and presses it upon the consideration of the French Government. In addition to all this, we have the letter from Count Champagny, the modern Duke of Cadore himself, to General Armstrong, of the 22d of August, 1809, in which, speaking of the measures of this country, we perceive this passage: "The embargo has been raised, a system of exclusion has been substituted for it." Thus, then, it appears conclusively, that the French Government had an official knowledge of the act of March as early as April, 1809, a full twelvemonth before the decree; and if the testimony of our Minister is to be received, (and is there any one who does not give it full credit?) the law was not viewed as a hostile act, or one requiring reprisal.

Allow me now, Mr. Chairman, to present you with another view of this decree. The Duke of Cadore, in his letter of the 5th of August, 1810, says: "Now Congress retrace their steps; they revoke the act of the 1st of March; the ports of America are opened to French commerce, and France is no longer interdicted to the Americans." And in his letter of the 7th of September, he uses these expressions: "His Majesty has always wished to favor the commerce of the United States. It was not without reluctance that he used reprisals towards the Americans, while he saw that Congress had ordered the confiscation of all French vessels which might arrive in the United States." "As soon as His Majesty was informed of this hostile act, he felt that the honor of France, involved in this point, could not be cleansed but by a declaration of war." Now "the American vessels, which shall arrive in France, will not be subjected to confiscation, because the act of Congress, which had served as a motive to our reprisals, is repealed." From this exposition of the views of the French Government, handed to us by the Minister of Exterior Relations, we perceive that he places the Rambouillet decree entirely to the account of the non-intercourse law of March; and from the course of reasoning used by him, it seems to be admitted that the decree, and the seizures under it, could not be justified, but while the obnoxious law was in force.

But we here again meet with another of the mistakes of this most just Government, which is so jealous of its honor and so friendly to our commerce. The fact happens to be that the law never was repealed. By its own limitation it expired with the then session of Congress, and, of course, went out of existence on the 28th of June, 1809. Thus this poor law, which is now brought up in judgment against us, had quietly descended to the tomb of the Capulets almost a year before the Emperor and King thought it consistent with his interest, or for the honor of his empire, to commence his measures of retaliation. The limitation clause could not have escaped the attention of His Majesty when he read the law; and, I trust, we yet have pride enough to believe that he knows there is an American Congress, and notices the periods of our meeting and departure, if he is careless about our proceedings. When, therefore, Napoleon issued the plundering decree of Rambouillet, he knew that the law, on which he placed his justification, had long since expired. But he knew a further fact, that the law never did affect French vessels. The British navy kept them at home, and we excluded English vessels only. Such was the practical and the only practical operation of our law.

I am aware that the apologists of the Emperor will point to the act of the 1st of June, 1809, as reviving or continuing certain sections of the law of March. Let me not be misunderstood, Mr. Chairman. I do not mean to insinuate that the Emperor has apologists in this House, in this ark of independence and liberty of a great people; but, in whatever place this suggestion shall be offered, it may be answered that the French Government have not noticed the last law in their decree, or in any of their official papers. And it may be further remarked, that the law of June, like that of March, was limited to the end of the next session of Congress, and, of course, ceased its operation on the 1st of May, 1810. As the decree issued on the 14th of May, and the seizures under it were after that time, it would seem, to a man of common understanding, who believes the transactions between nations are, or ought to be, regulated by the rules of honest, plain dealing, that the Emperor, when he had knowledge of the fact, would have loosened his hold on our property. And yet we find that, when we approach him on this subject, he laughs us to scorn.

The object which I had in view, in this examination of the Rambouillet decree, was, to mark its true character, to show that this decree emphatically outraged our neutral rights, and that, if it was submitted to by this country, our code of national rights will be found hereafter in the same books with those of the Kingdoms which belong to the Confederation of the Rhine. Our merchants are induced to adventure to France by a prospect of large profits, and by promises of great security if their vessels have not been "denationalized." They take there many a valuable cargo, until the amount of property becomes an object of imperial attention, and then it is seized upon by an irresistible and unrelenting hand, without notice, and upon pretexts void of any foundation. Can a decree, or order, or edict, be pointed out in the long history of our wrongs and our sufferings, which is more strongly marked with injustice, or which more strongly violates our neutral commerce?"

I will not detain the Committee by entering into a particular examination of the French decrees, which, in the commencement of the last year, authorized the seizure of such a number of American vessels at St. Sebastians, at Naples, and in the North of Europe. It would lead me too far into the views and conduct of the French Government towards this country, for the purposes of this discussion. But, sir, in this volume of documents, I see, with emotions which I am sure are in unison with those of the American people, the famous note, signed "Champagny, Duke of Cadore," of the 14th of February last, written to justify those seizures, and, as he says, "that the President may the better know the friendly intentions of France towards the United States, and her favorable dispositions to American commerce," in which we are told that we are "without just political views, without honor, and without energy." And are we so sunk in the estimation of the mighty Conqueror that he thinks it necessary and proper to use this as his official language towards us? Surely, sir, he mistakes the character and the spirit of this people if he believes they are to be broken down, or brought into his views, by insults or threats. As our Government had, a few months before, discharged and disgraced a British Minister for a supposed insult by an insinuation, it was to have been expected that, on this occasion, equal spirit would be shown. But to such as formed corresponding expectations, what will be their feelings when they find that the only Executive notice of the note is found in the letter of Mr. Smith to General Armstrong, of the 5th of June last, in which the Secretary says, that, as the John Adams is daily expected, and as your farther communications by her will better enable me to adapt to the actual state of our affairs with the French Government, the observations proper to be made in relation to the seizure of our property, and to the letter of the Duke of Cadore, of the 14th of February; it is, by the President, deemed expedient not to make, at this time, any such animadversions."

Let us now see, Mr. Chairman, whether these decrees have been "so revoked or modified as that they ceased to violate the neutral commerce of the United States."

These decrees have two distinct operations, the seizure of our property, and the subsequent sale of that property; and, without attempting to prove a proposition which appears self-evident, I shall take it for granted that, if it was an infringement of our rights to seize the property, it is equally an infringement of our rights to proceed to the confiscation and sale of such property. Nay, sir, if we allow to the French Government the plea of retaliation, the infringement of our rights will commence with the confiscation and sale of our vessels after the cause of retaliation has been removed by us, and known so to be by the Emperor. A revocation or modification of these decrees, so that they should cease to violate our fair commerce, therefore, would look as well to an indemnity for the past as a security for the future; it necessarily includes a restoration of the property already taken, as well as an engagement against future captures. This appears to have been, at one time, the opinion of our Administration; for you will find, by recurring to the letter from Secretary Smith to General Armstrong, of the 5th of June, 1810, which enclosed a copy of the law of May, the determination of our Executive is thus made known: "If, however, the arrangement contemplated by the law should be acceptable to the French Government, you will understand it to be the purpose of the President not to proceed in giving it effect, in case the late seizure of the property of the citizens of the United States has been followed by an absolute confiscation, and restoration be finally refused." And in the letter from Mr. Smith to General Armstrong, of the 5th of July, this determination is expressed with added strength: "As has been heretofore stated to you, a satisfactory provision for restoring the property lately surprised and seized by the order, or at the instance of the French Government, must be combined with a repeal of the French edicts, with a view to a non-intercourse with Great Britain; such a provision being an indispensable evidence of the just purpose of France towards the United States."

Without asking for the evidence which the President had as to the repeal or modification of these decrees, I now put it to the Committee whether every member of it is not perfectly convinced that if any modification, or suspension, or repeal, has taken place, it goes no farther than to restrain future seizures, leaving the property already seized to take the course of confiscation and sale? Do we not know, that, in the months of October and November, our vessels and merchandise have been brought under the hammer in pursuance of those decrees; and have we not lately seen, in our public journals, a list of some eighteen or twenty ships advertised by the French Government for sale at Bayonne, on the 5th of December? Nay, sir, the Executive was informed, before he issued his proclamation, by the letter from the Duke of Cadore to General Armstrong, of the 12th of September, 1810, that, "as to the merchandise confiscated, it having been confiscated as a measure of reprisal, the principles of reprisal must be the law in that affair." Words cannot be found which would more satisfactorily "evince an inflexible determination" to retain the property. As the principles of reprisal are to be the law, it follows that a restoration of the property depends on the discretion of the Emperor, and is not to be claimed by us as a matter of right, but of favor. And what have we to propose, according to the principles of reprisal, to obtain the restoration? Is it, that we have suffered the non-intercourse law to expire? Why, sir, this had taken place long before the letter of the Duke of Cadore. Is it a restoration of French property seized under the law of non-intercourse? This cannot take place; because, in truth, there was no such seizures.

We will now examine whether there has been such a revocation of the Berlin and Milan decrees as warranted the proclamation. And here, let me remark that, when the President acted under this law, he was not exercising the treaty-making power. He was the mere agent of the Legislature, and as such agent, he was confined and limited by his letter of attorney, the law. He had not, therefore, as has been asserted, a discretion, nor had he anything to do with considerations of comity or courtesy. He was to ascertain when there was an actual and practical revocation, and then make known the fact; the consequences were left with the Legislature. Indeed, sir, this power to give publicity to a fact might have been committed to one of the Secretaries, or to a clerk in the offices, and if it had, we should have smiled at the suggestion that its exercise depended on considerations of courtesy.

Mr. Chairman, when the proclamation first appeared, my impression was, and such, too, I understood to be the general impression, that the President had some document unknown to the American people. The letter of the Duke of Cadore, of the 5th of August, was already before the public, but it was not credited that on this letter the proclamation had been issued. Since we have received the Message the subject is at rest. It is now known and acknowledged that the President had not, and to this moment has not, any other evidence of a revocation. Now, sir, in this letter, I see neither the form nor the substance of a revocation.

As to form—it is not accurate to say that, in a despotic Government, like that of France, they have no forms. The essential principle in a despotism is, that there should be a power absolute and beyond control, and whose will is law. But this will, to be law, must be known; and the manner in which this will is promulgated, is always, and of necessity, a matter of form. Now, without referring to the organization of the French Government, we need only advert to known edicts to ascertain the form in which the decrees of the Emperor appear, and, of course, the repeal of his decrees. They always run in the name of the Emperor, and are signed by him. Thus, the Berlin decree, "Napoleon, Emperor of the French and King of Italy;" signed, "Napoleon." The Milan decree, "Napoleon, Emperor of the French, King of Italy, and Protector of the Rhenish Confederation;" signed, "Napoleon." The Rambouillet decree, "Napoleon, &c., &c., &c.," signed, "Napoleon." The Duty decree of the 12th of September last, "Napoleon, Emperor of the French, King of Italy, Protector of the Confederation of the Rhine, and Mediator of the Swiss Confederation;" signed, "Napoleon." I have produced these instances, because they appear in the documents on our tables, and I think I may assume it as a fact, that the French decrees all issue in this form. If a contrary practice has prevailed, in a single case, I may ask for it.

What is the understanding of the French courts and officers, on this subject. I have already presented you with that part of the letter of the Duke of Cadore, of the 5th of August, in which he says, that since Congress have retraced their steps, by revoking the act of the first of March, "France is no longer interdicted to the Americans." Now, sir, if this letter is in the form of a decree, it revokes or modifies the Rambouillet decree equally with those of Berlin and Milan, inasmuch, as long as the former continued in force, France was interdicted to the Americans. And yet we find, in a letter of the Duke of Cadore, of the 7th day of September, our Minister inquiring "Has the decree of His Majesty of the 22d day of March last been recalled?" And General Armstrong, in his letter to Mr. Smith of the 10th of September, remarks, that this inquiry "may appear to have been useless, after the declaration, that American ships which will hereafter arrive in the ports of France shall not be subject to confiscation; but understanding from the Council of Prizes, that until some act be taken which had the effect of recalling, by name, the decree of the 23d of March, they must consider it both as existing and operative, and of course binding upon them," he had presented the subject again.

Here, then, we have the opinion of the French court, most known and most important to us, the Court of Prizes, that the letter of the Duke of Cadore is not in the form of a decree, and has not the force and effect of a decree. In addition to this, we have the act of seizure of the brig New Orleans Packet, by the director of the customs at Bordeaux, in December last, under the Berlin and Milan decrees. As the letter of the Duke of Cadore had been published in France prior to this period, no one will believe that if it was in form of an edict of the Empire, the seizure would have been made.

But if the contents of this letter had been embodied in a formal act, would it have amounted to such a revocation or modification of the Berlin and Milan decrees, as that they ceased to violate our neutral commerce?

FEBRUARY, 1811.

Commercial Intercourse.

H. OF R.

I remark, first, that the revocation, if it be one, was a future and not a present revocation. "The decrees of Berlin and Milan are revoked, and, after the first of November, they will cease to have effect." Now, sir, although there is an affected obscurity in this sentence, the intent is most obvious. As long as a law continues in operation, so long it must be unrepealed, and as these decrees were to have effect until the 1st of November, it follows, that on no construction can they be considered as revoked until that period. Indeed, on this point the Duke of Cadore is quite explicit in his letter to General Armstrong of the 7th of September, in which he tells him, that American vessels arriving in France before the first of November, although not liable to confiscation, "will be subjected to all the effects of the Berlin and Milan decrees."

But, again; the revocation, if any, was not only future, but it was also conditional; "it being understood, that in consequence of this declaration, the English shall revoke their Orders in Council and renounce the new principles of blockade, which they have wished to establish, or that the United States, conformably to the act you have just communicated, shall cause their rights to be respected by the English." A condition—a qualification—a restriction. Is it not obvious, from the very terms of the letter, that it contains a condition, that the repeal is a qualified one? The words "it being understood," are not only expressive of this, but they are singularly appropriate. If however, we were inclined to doubt, we must be satisfied by the letter, of the Duke of Cadore to General Armstrong, of September 7th, in which it is said, that the Emperor "repeals his decrees of Berlin and Milan, under the conditions pointed out in my letter to you of the 5th of August."

Our Ministers, General Armstrong and Mr. Pinkney, appear to have puzzled themselves much about this condition, to discover whether it was a condition precedent, or a condition subsequent. To me, sir, the idea of a condition subsequent to a repeal, is rather novel; but it may nevertheless be just. In common understanding, it is believed, that when a law is repealed it is extinct, and if it be so, then its appendage, the condition, would seem to be at an end of course. But in the view which I am about to take of this subject, it is not necessary to settle this point, as it must be conceded, that whether we call the condition a condition precedent, or a condition subsequent, the same consequence will follow: if the condition is not complied with, the decrees must be in force still. Now, sir, it appears to me, that the conditions, attached to this pretended or proposed repeal, are of a nature which have not, and will not be complied with.

First, sir, as to the conditions on the part of England: The English shall revoke their Orders in Council, and renounce the new principles of blockade which they have wished to establish." With respect to the Orders in Council, I have nothing to say either as to their justice or their policy. Heaven knows they have been to us, from the moment of their inception, sore evils; the causes of great vexation, embarrassment, and losses; and I hope the period is not far distant when we shall be no longer disturbed by them. But, sir, I wish to call your particular attention to the other branch of the condition, that relating to blockades. We have been so long in the practice, and justly in the practice, of complaining of paper blockades, that at the first blush we are induced to believe the condition relates to them, and to them alone. Are these the blockades which are intended? Let the Emperor and King answer for himself. In the official note from Count Champagny to General Armstrong, of the 22d of August, 1809, we have this declaration: "A place is not truly blockaded until it is invested by land and by sea; it is blockaded to prevent it from receiving the succors which might retard its surrender. It is only then that the right of preventing neutral vessels from entering it exists." But we have it under the hand and seal of the Emperor himself, what he means by the "new principles of blockade." In the Berlin decree there is an enumeration of real or pretended interpolations, on the part of Great Britain, in the law of nations; among which we discover these; "that England does not admit the right of nations as universally acknowledged by all civilized people;" "that she extends to ports not fortified, to harbors and mouths of rivers, the right of blockade, which, according to reason and the usage of civilized nations, is applicable only to strong or fortified ports." And it is declared that "the decree shall be considered as the fundamental law of the Empire, until England has acknowledged that the rights of war are the same on land as at sea"—"and until the right of blockade be restrained to fortified places actually invested by competent forces."

There can be no misunderstanding on this subject. The Emperor offers to give up his Berlin and Milan decrees, if the British will renounce their new system of blockade; and in these very decrees he explains what he means by this new system; that, besides paper blockades, it is the attempt to blockade the mouths of rivers and harbors and ports not fortified. Now, sir, I will admit, if we could prevail on Great Britain and France thus to limit the right of blockade, it would add much to our security at home; for as we have no fortified places, although we may have places with fortifications, it would follow that we should never be subject to a blockade. But is it true that according to the usages of nations this is a novel system, or one now, for the first time, put in use by the British? Or is it believed, that a nation like England, whose effective force for offence and defence is a maritime force, can or ought to subscribe to a system of blockade which confines its exercise and right to "fortified places actually invested?" What would be the effect of such a system in the present war? France has surely not to apprehend an invasion from England; and if any of the commercial places on her extensive coasts are fortified, the fortifications may be dismantled or destroyed with great safety. As soon as this is done they become "harbors and ports not fortified," and have no longer to apprehend any inconvenience from the pressure of a naval force. Is it not obvious that England will not comply with her part of the condition, and that the Emperor never expected that she would?

As to the conditions on the part of this country—"The United States, conformably to the act you have just communicated, shall cause their rights to be respected." What rights, Mr. Chairman? The right of not being vexed or endangered by paper blockades? Yes, sir, and more; the right of not being interrupted in a commercial intercourse with cities situated on rivers, as Antwerp for instance; or to carry on a free trade with all the Continental ports and harbors not fortified, although the whole British navy may be cruising at the mouth of the river, or in sight of the port. But we have a further declaration of neutral rights which the French Emperor says he will allow when France has a marine proportioned to the extent of her coasts and her population, and which, so long as the British shall continue to be masters of the sea, he insists we shall claim and exercise. Thus, in the note from Count Champagny to General Armstrong, of the 22d of August, 1809, "France admits the principle that the flag covers the merchandise. A merchant vessel, sailing with all the necessary papers from its Government, is a floating colony. To do violence to such a vessel by visits, by searches, and by other acts of an arbitrary authority, is to violate the territory of a colony. This is to infringe on the independence of its Government." In other words, the flag is to protect the property, and search is not to be permitted. I pray you, sir, to bear in mind, that since the formation of this Government, and under every Administration, the right of blockading, by an actual present and efficient force, ports and places not fortified; the right of search, and the principle, that enemy property is not protected by the character of the vessel, has been recognised or conceded.

But how are we to cause these rights to be respected? By putting in force the non-importation law? Suppose the British should not believe themselves excessively injured by this measure; that, in fact, it operated to their advantage, and we are suffered to bring on premature decay and old age, by this political quackery. Would this satisfy the Emperor? No, sir. He would soon tell us that we had not caused our rights to be respected. It is idle to believe that he will deem the non-importation a compliance with his condition; nor, to me, does his language convey this idea. We are to oppose, or declare ourselves against the British, and in the spirit of our law and of his declaration, we are to cause our rights to be respected, not by self-destroying measures, but by actual force and open hostility, if the English nation will not, without it, subscribe to the terms which have been presented to it. Recollect the history of our embargo and former non-intercourse, the propositions made under them by our Government to the French Government, and how these propositions were received, and you will be satisfied of the nature and extent of the present condition.

And now, let me ask, whether we are prepared for these conditions? Whether we believe in all the rights which the French Emperor condescends to claim for us from the British, although he will not admit them himself? And, whether we are prepared to go to war for them? To me the conditions, both on the part of this country and Great Britain, appear inadmissible. At all events, I think that the President, before he acted on a proposition so loose and general, which admits of so much doubt, and can, by fair construction, be carried to such extravagant lengths, ought to have asked and received explanations and particulars.

But it may be said that the letter of the Duke of Cadore, if not itself a decree, is evidence that there is a rescinding decree. To my mind, Mr. Chairman, it has internal marks to the contrary; but, without troubling the Committee with any further comments on the letter, I observe, that viewing it as a mere matter of evidence, it may be fortified or explained by other evidence. I have already read to you parts of the letters from Secretary Smith to General Armstrong, of the 5th of June and the 5th of July, which declare the determination of the President not to carry the non-intercourse law into effect against England, unless France not only revoked her decrees, but restored our sequestered property. We are to presume that our Minister made known this determination to the French Court, as it was his duty so to do. Now, with this declaration before him, is it to be credited that the Emperor would revoke his decrees, when he was given to understand that the revocation would lead to no result on our part, inasmuch as he did not release our property? Is it not obvious, from this circumstance alone, that the letter is a mere proposition in answer to the one made by our Government, expressive of the views, and stating the terms on which the Emperor would revoke?

Again, sir, we have the letter of Mr. Russell to Secretary Smith, of the 11th of December, 1810, informing our Government that the brig New Orleans Packet had been seized at Bordeaux a few days before, under the Berlin and Milan decrees, by the director of the customs. And we have had communicated to us, by the President, the note from Mr. Russell to the Duke of Cadore, of the 10th of December, stating this seizure to have been made under the decrees, and giving an additional fact, that the case of this vessel was the first which had occurred after the first of November, to which the decrees could be applied. As this seizure was made under the decrees, it shows the impression in France to be, that they still are existing and in force; and the evidence is the stronger, as coming from the custom-house of one of the principal trading towns, where surely the revocation must have been officially known, if it had taken place. I am aware it is said that Mr. Russell must have been misinformed as to the cause of the seizure, or that the custom-house officer mistook his duty. But as to both of these suggestions, I will only remind you of the silence of the French Government. The remonstrance of Mr. Russell was handed to the French Minister on the 10th of December, and the vessel which bore the despatches, brought Paris accounts to the 27th of December, and did not leave France until the 1st of January. If Mr. Russell had any explanation or answer from the French Government, it would have been communicated to us; but he had none. The silence of the French Minister is equal to an express affirmance of the act of the custom-house officer, and is an admission that the decrees have not been revoked.

But, without multiplying proofs, I will content myself with referring the Committee to a French State paper, the report of Champagny, Duke of Cadore, Minister of Foreign Relations, to His Majesty the Emperor and King, dated at Paris, the 3d of December, 1810, as it appears in the Aurora of the 1st of this month. In this report we have the following remarkable passages:—"The orders issued by the British Council had overturned the laws of the commerce of the world. England, whose existence is wholly attached to commerce, thus cast disorder among the commerce of nations; she has torn from it every privilege. The decrees of Berlin and Milan repelled these monstrous novelties."—"Sire, as long as England shall persist in her Orders in Council, your Majesty will persist in your decrees. Your Majesty will oppose to the blockade of the coasts the Continental blockade, and to the pillage on the seas, the confiscation of English merchandise upon the Continent. It is my duty to say to your Majesty, your Majesty cannot, henceforth, hope to recall your enemies to more moderate ideas otherwise than by your perseverance in this system."—These passages leave nothing for inference; they are full and explicit. The Berlin and Milan decrees are not only unrevoked, but they will remain so until the English Orders in Council are withdrawn.

Will gentlemen yet say, after this damning proof, that there is not evidence of the existence of the decrees; that on the first day of November they ceased to violate, in practice and in principle, our neutral commerce! If they are not now satisfied, I beg to know what will satisfy them? Are we to wait until His Majesty, in person or by proxy, gives our Administration a formal notice that they have mistaken his intention? Is it according to the modern usages of nations, or the custom of our great and good friend, to give such notice? No, sir, the notice you will receive will be the capture, and if not the condemnation, the keeping of your property; and that notice you already have. It will be strong complaints against the British Orders in Council, and bitter taunts against neutrals for submitting to them; those you also have. It cannot, and it ought not to be concealed, the decrees are not withdrawn. Whether doubts existed when the proclamation issued, they must now be removed; and we ought to adopt measures to rid the people speedily from the oppressive weight of this incautious act of the Executive.

Mr. Chairman, there remains still one view to be taken of this subject. It is said that we have made a contract with France, which in good faith we are bound to fulfil: that in consideration of a repeal of the French decrees, we have covenanted and agreed with the Emperor to resume the non-importation system with Great Britain, and are not at liberty to vary this assumption, on our part, in any particular. It is not my purpose to examine this curious proposition: but are its advocates aware of its extent? The law of May is without limitation, and if it has fastened itself on Great Britain, there is no provision for taking it off, even if that nation should lay herself at our feet to gain our favor. In the spirit of this new law of contracts, the non-intercourse becomes perpetual, unless the Emperor shall be graciously pleased to release us from our engagement. But, admitting that our hands in any case might be tied, they can only be so when good faith is preserved towards us; the contract surely must be binding on both parties, or on neither. Now, sir, from the papers with which the Executive has furnished us, it appears, that the promise of the Emperor was broken at the very moment when made.

We deem ourselves injured by the Orders in Council; and why? because they restrict our commerce with the Continent. But for that, this country, considered as a neutral country, is not interested in them. To rid ourselves of these orders, we have recourse to a variety of expedients, and finally, settle down in a non-importation with England. But if it should happen that by the regulations of the continental Powers themselves we are deprived of such trade, what interest have we then to oppose ourselves to these orders? Suppose a case: we make a contract with the Emperor which has for its object the removal of the orders and a free commerce with France; but after the contract is made, the Emperor himself interdicts the trade; is the contract still binding? And yet this is precisely our situation. If the English, by their orders and blockades, formerly kept us from the Continent, the French have now taken their place.

Look at the state of your commerce with the Continent under the recent French regulations. General Turreau, in his letter to Mr. Smith, of the 27th of November, 1810, says, that certificates of origin can only be given to American vessels loaded with the produce of the United States, and destined for a port in France. Again, in his letter of the 12th of December, 1810, the General says, that the importation into France of cotton and tobacco, are specially prohibited; but in his letter of December 25th, 1810, he observes, that by his despatches of the 1st of July, 22d and 30th of August, cotton may be imported into France in American vessels, and under certain regulations. And what are these regulations? You will find them, sir, in the French decrees of the 9th of July, 1810, annexed to his correspondence: "Thirty or forty American vessels may import into France (under license) cotton, fish, oil, dye-wood, salt-fish, cod-fish, hides, and peltry." "They can only depart from Charleston and New York." Thus, then, according to explanations of the French Minister in this country, we are by the Emperor excluded from all the ports of the Continent except France; for we well know that without a certificate of origin, our property would be liable to seizure. We can carry, even to France, but few articles, and those of our own growth, and are thus deprived of a trade in colonial produce, although it may come from countries friendly to the Empire, and have been fairly stamped with an American character. And of the little which we are allowed to take, the greater part must go from privileged places and under French licenses.

But this is not all. At the very time when the Duke of Cadore was writing his smooth but insidious letter of the 5th of August, a decree of duties was prepared and issued, which is virtually a prohibition to carry even by license. On this very fifth day of August, a list of duties was sent to the French custom-houses, by which long staple cotton is put at eighty cents the pound, other cotton sixty cents, and tobacco forty cents. On the 12th of September, 1810, we have another duty decree, by which American potash is charged with about one hundred and twenty-five dollars the ton, codfish two dollars the hundred pounds, and American rice four dollars the hundred. Is it possible for us, under these regulations, to carry on a commerce with the Continent? Surely not. I am aware, that a few privileged ships, furnished with imperial licenses, have made tolerable voyages, and some small number "under license," and by special permission of His Majesty the Emperor and King, may yet succeed; but this is a trade not belonging to us but to France, and let France look to it. And yet, after seeing all this, we are this day seriously debating on the extent of our obligation to the Emperor. We have buckled on the non-importation, and insist on carrying the load, although we are tottering at every step with its oppressive weight, and all this because the Emperor has suffered his Minister to write us a note full of professions which mean nothing, and promises which are not to be performed.

Why, then, sir, suffer the present state of things to exist? Why permit it to be believed for a moment that, for such causes as I have recited, a non-intercourse is in force against Great Britain? Are gentlemen so wedded to the restrictive system, notwithstanding our dear-bought experience, that they are anxious again to travel the round of measures which proved so disastrous to this country? Are we to have again in succession a non-importation, an embargo, a forcing embargo, and a non-intercourse? I think this was the order in which we proceeded. And why all this? Is it because by it we shall injure Great Britain or benefit ourselves? If the former is a legitimate object, as some seem to believe, to be unceasingly pursued, no matter at what expense of property or character, are we quite sure that this is the means of doing it?

If our merchants are not allowed to import as well as export, they will be driven to abandon the ocean; for no cargo which they can make up will bear the double freight of the outward and homeward voyage, which it must do if the vessel is to return empty. This, according to the law, is to be the case as it respects England. As it regards the ports of the Continent under French rule, the joint operation of the British Orders in Council, and the new French anti-commercial regulations, will put an end to our trade there, at least a direct trade. Do we not then in adopting this system give up the carrying trade of the world to Great Britain? Even your own products will find their way to market in British bottoms; for though you may prevent English vessels from entering your ports, you cannot prohibit their approaching your coasts or taking in cargoes at places which do not belong to you. As to their goods, they will get into the country as long as there is a demand for them, notwithstanding any measures which you may adopt. But without examining the effects of the restrictive system in all its bearing towards Great Britain, let me say that I fully concur with my honorable colleague on the other side of the House, (Mr. MITCHILL,) in the remarks he made a few days since on the inefficiency of this system to coerce foreign Powers, and the necessity of a speedy abandonment of it. In one respect, however, I differ from him. I mean in the opinion he seems to entertain of the embargo, and as this is a part and parcel of the restrictive system, one to which our present law seems to point, and on which we may be soon called upon to act, I shall ask the indulgence of the Committee while I submit a few remarks.

My colleague, Mr. Chairman, professes to believe that if the embargo had not been broken; and had been persisted in a few months longer, it would have accomplished its object; we should have had the British lion crouching at our feet, willing to accede to any terms to prolong his existence, which it seems would have depended on our will and pleasure. This is, indeed to draw a flattering picture of our power and of our consequence. What Bonaparte, with his millions of soldiers and his scores of princes and kings, has not been able to effect after years of war, we can do by a little bit of paper marked with strange characters by the Clerk of this House. This is, indeed, a great discovery, and its inventor deserves—a place in our Patent Office. If, however, the charm will be broken when the embargo is evaded, I am afraid it will detract from the merit of the discovery; for as certainly as you pass your restrictive laws, as certainly will they be evaded, and that too by friends and by foes. They will press hard on some, who, from necessity, and will hold out temptations to others, who, from cupidity, will break through them.

But, sir, it appears to me that however inconvenient or injurious the embargo might have been to Great Britain, and inconvenient and injurious it certainly was, it could not, as it did not, coerce that nation. To have this effect, a commercial intercourse with these United States must not only be necessary to the well-being, but to the very existence of England. Does any man really believe, that if this country should be absolutely destroyed by some convulsion of nature, or become a province of the Great Empire, that Britain would therefore, and for that cause alone, go down? Do we not know, that England existed with almost its present population before this country was discovered? and is it not certain that even in our own times she lived through a war with us, although we then had no commercial intercourse with her? Can you believe, that the embargo was more oppressive to Great Britain, whose commerce and resources it affected but partially, than to us, whose commerce it destroyed totally? In truth, the period when the embargo pressed most hardly on England, was when it commenced its operation. She was suddenly cut off from the supplies which this country had afforded her, and our market for her manufactures was closed against her. She had to seek new vents for her goods, and to search in other places for raw materials. The longer you kept on your embargo, the less she must have been affected by it.

Commercial Intercourse.

H. OF R.

With all her privations, is it not certain that England derived some positive advantages from our embargo? As in politics and legislation, one fact is at any time worth two theories, I will mention one or two circumstances. We have heard much in this country of the scarcity of gold in England, and know that the House of Commons raised a bullion committee to inquire into the causes of this scarcity. This committee made a report, which has since been published, containing among other things, a statement of the testimony delivered before them; and I wish to call your attention to the deposition of Mr. Hughan, a West India merchant. He says, that the exchange between Jamaica and England, for the two last years, has uniformly been very high in favor of England; at one time, for bills at ninety days sight, it was at twenty per cent., and was then (1810) at ten per cent. above par; and declares, that the principal cause for this high exchange, is the great export of manufactures through that channel for the Spanish settlements in Cuba and the Main. He states that a considerable part of the supply of manufactured goods now furnished to the Spanish colonies from Jamaica, used formerly to be furnished from the United States; and that one very powerful and the most powerful cause of this change was, the operation of the American embargo. Mr. Irving, the inspector general of the customs, also gave testimony, and produced a statement of imports and exports. In these tables, I turn to the exports to Jamaica for two years, 1804 and 1809, and discover that the official value of those in the former year is £4,096,193 sterling, and in the latter £8,755,193; making a difference in favor of the latter of £4,658,997 sterling. As Mr. Irving says that the official valuation was fixed in 1696, since when there has been no alteration, and that the difference between the official and the actual value of British manufactures in 1809, appears to have been from forty-five to fifty per cent., we must add to the excess £2,329,498, making it £6,988,495 sterling; or upwards of thirty-one millions of dollars.

Now, sir, you will find, by recurring to the commercial report of the Secretary of the Treasury, of 28th February, 1806, that, taking the average of the years 1802, 1803, and 1804, (and I go back to those years, because it was before the commencement of our restrictive system,) our annual imports from the dominions of Great Britain, in Europe, amounted to twenty-seven millions four hundred thousand dollars. And will gentlemen yet say, that the embargo would have ruined England, if it had been continued? If she could exist with an American exportation of twenty-seven millions, she surely may with thirty-one millions. Are we still confident that our embargo has been productive of no advantage to Great Britain? By our commercial restrictions, we have cramped the enterprise of our merchants, and drawn them from a field which must produce a rich harvest to those who cultivate it. I have on a former occasion, observed that Spanish America would soon afford a free and open commerce, which would of itself satisfy all our wants, and be equal to all our wishes. The value of this commerce is felt by the English, and they now have it. We, on the contrary, by our schemes of non-intercourse, and double duties, and navigation laws, not only leave them in the possession, but prevent our merchants from entering the lists with them. Nay, as if apprehensive that at some future time these prospects might be too tempting for our people, we have lately taken pains to raise the prejudices of the Spaniards against us, by declaring ourselves the owners of one of their provinces, and marching an armed force to take possession of it.

One farther fact. What has been the effect of the embargo and the other restrictive laws on the British Provinces to the north of us? Let the merchants of the trading towns of the Hudson answer you. Before the embargo, the Canadas were in a sickly state; they are now healthy and flourishing. Formerly, their chief trade was with the Indians, and for furs; now, they are rivals in your own business, with your most commercial States. While our capital and enterprise have been decreasing, theirs have been increasing; and in proportion as our trade has been hampered and diminishing, the commerce of the British Provinces has been fostered and extending itself. Their population and wealth and importance have been wonderfully advanced by our restrictive laws. There is no deception in this, Mr. Chairman. Many of the leading towns in the interior of the State which I have the honor, in part, to represent, will be my witnesses. Ask their merchants why they are idle and about to remove, and they will answer you that you have driven their customers and their business to Canada, and that they must follow them. I forbear to press this subject farther, and I have merely adverted to these facts to show, that if Great Britain will be injured by our restrictive laws, she may also be benefited.

FEBRUARY, 1811.

What will be the effect of this non-importation or non-intercourse system on ourselves? We must have money to carry on the Government; ay, sir, and much money too; for appropriation bills have already made their way through this House, by which we have granted about six millions for the expenses of Government during the current year. And how do you expect to get this sum if imports are prohibited? I know the Secretary of the Treasury has recommended a large increase of duties, but a table of duties without imports is mere paper, it will bring nothing. Indeed, without your non-intercourse, a temporary additional duty, so large as that recommended, if it does not totally suspend importations, will not produce much for your Treasury. It is holding out a temptation for smuggling.

Your merchants—how are they to be affected by this system? Do we not know that those trading to Europe have, during the last season, exported large quantities of the products of this country, and are we yet to learn, that, owing to the embarrassments of commerce, much of that property remains unsold, and of that which has been disposed of, a part, and not an inconsiderable part, is yet unpaid for? And yet we are by our own regulations to prevent their making investments, or receiving remittances. If we do so, we shall not only prostrate many an individual, but we may shake the mercantile world to its centre. Having his property locked up in Europe, the merchant will not be able to meet his engagements; the property will be lost to him, and bankruptcy and ruin must follow. Your West India traders—The course of that business, you are informed, is to send out cargoes in the Fall, which are disposed of to planters, who pay in the produce of the islands when the crops come in. As this takes place in March, and we close our ports on the 2d day of February, it follows, that these merchants will also be sacrificed. These will be the particular effects of enforcing the non-importation at this time. The general effect will be, as I heretofore observed, to drive our merchants from the ocean; your external commerce will wither at the touch of this baneful law, and your merchants will sink under the reiterated strokes which we, their protectors, have aimed and are aiming at them.

But is this system to injure the merchant alone? What is to become of that useful class of citizens connected with shipping: the sailor, the ship-carpenter, the sail-maker, the blacksmith, the rope-maker, and the long list of mechanics and laborers who find support and employ from your merchants? Must they not be reduced to want, and become objects of charity, or do as many have already done, leave the country? The agriculturists—Where will the grower of hemp find a market for his stock, if you have no shipping? What is to be done with the cotton, the tobacco, and the grain which remain on hand, if your merchants can no longer export? Must they not be wholly lost to the planter and the farmer, or sacrificed by them to the speculator? Are there not other evils which must result from this system? In the former non-importation law, care was taken to make such exceptions as allowed the people to receive articles considered of necessity; but this law is general, and applies to all articles the growth, produce, or manufacture of Great Britain and her colonies. The Southern planter requires coarse cloths for his blacks, and the northern farmer plaster for his fields, and both the one and the other must have salt; and yet, sir, under this law we are to have neither cloth, nor plaster, nor salt. These are some of the evils which must grow out of a non-importation system, such as that which has been attempted to be put in operation by the proclamation of November: that they are of the most serious kind, every person who hears me will admit, and that they are greater than the country will patiently bear, I verily believe.

Mr. Chairman, I feel that I have already trespassed upon your patience and that of the Committee. I trust, however, the nature and importance of the subject under discussion will be an apology for the range I have taken. I will now only observe, that I have attempted to establish the following positions: That no such arrangement has been made with the French Government as comes within the intent of the law of May, and that the assurances made to our Government were deceptive. That the proclamation of November was issued without authority, and that the non-intercourse is not in force. And that the evils which must result from an attempt to enforce this law by the custom-house officers, under the instructions which accompany the proclamation, are of a nature so serious and oppressive as to require the immediate interference of Congress.

Thus viewing the subject, I deem it my duty to propose an amendment to the law now before you, which, if adopted, will do away the effect of the proclamation, by permitting vessels to enter, and merchandise to be imported as freely as if the proclamation had not been issued.

Mr. EMOTT concluded by moving the amendment, which will be found in the commencement of his remarks.

THURSDAY, February 7.

On motion of Mr. NEWTON, the Committee on Commerce and Manufactures were instructed to inquire whether any, and, if any, what, alterations are necessary to be made in the act, entitled "An act supplementary to the act concerning Consuls and Vice-Consuls, and for the further protection of American seamen;" and that they be authorized to report by bill, or otherwise.

Mr. RHEA, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, presented a bill to amend an act, entitled "An act regulating the Post Office Establishment;" which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

FEBRUARY, 1811.

Payment of Claims—District of Columbia Banks.

H. OF R.

Mr. JENNINGS, from the committee appointed on the twenty-eighth ultimo, on the petition of sundry inhabitants of the Indiana Territory, made a report thereon; which was read, and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the bill to authorize the laying out a public road from the line established by the Treaty of Greenville to the North Bend in the State of Ohio.

The House proceeded to consider the amendments of the bill, entitled "An act providing for the final adjustment of claims to lands, and for the sale of the public lands in the Territory of Orleans and Louisiana;" and the same were concurred in by the House.

A motion was made by Mr. GHOLSON that the House do come to the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of providing, by law, for the temporary government of that part of the territory ceded by France to the United States, in the year 1803, which lies on the east side of the river Mississippi, on the north of the river Iberville and the Lakes Maurepas and Pontchartrain and the Gulf of Mexico, on the west of the river Perdido, and on the south of the Mississippi Territory; and that the said committee have leave to report by bill, or otherwise.

The resolution was read, and referred to the committee appointed on that part of the President's Message at the commencement of the session, which relates to that part of West Florida acquired by the cession of Louisiana.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate disagree to the amendments made by this House to the bill, entitled "An act making compensation to John Eugene Leitzendorfer, for services rendered the United States in the war with Tripoli." They have passed the bill, entitled "An act to enable the people of the Territory of Orleans to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of such State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, and for other purposes," with amendments; to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

PAYMENT OF CLAIMS.

Mr. ROOR, from the Committee of Claims, who were instructed, by a resolution of the eighteenth ultimo, to inquire into the expediency of repealing or suspending the operation of the several acts of limitation, so far as they now operate to bar the payment of sundry claims against the United States therein described, made a report thereon; which was read, and referred to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

The report is as follows:

That by the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, of the 12th of December last, made to the Senate, it appears the five first-mentioned classes of claims may be admitted without danger of fraud, and that sufficient guards against fraud may be interposed in the three last-mentioned classes. The committee concur with the Secretary in this opinion. They beg leave further to observe, that they can discover no difference in the equity of claims on lost certificates, and on those which have not been lost, but are barred; they, therefore, submit the following resolutions:

Resolved, That provision ought to be made by law for the payment of the five following classes of claims, to wit:

1. Loan office certificates.
2. Indents for interest on the public debt.
3. Final settlement certificates.
4. Commissioners' certificates.
5. Army certificates.

Resolved, That it is expedient to provide by law for the payment of the three following classes of claims, to wit:

1. Credits given in lieu of Army certificates cancelled.
2. Credits for the pay of the Army, for which no certificates were issued.
3. Invalid pensions.

Resolved, That it is expedient to provide for the renewal of lost or destroyed certificates.

BANKS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the several bills for incorporating the District banks.

The bill incorporating the Farmers' Bank of Alexandria was first taken up, and amended, by reducing the capital from $1,000,000 to $500,000, striking out the section relative to the qualification of the President, limiting the duration to ten years, &c.

The Committee then took up the bill to incorporate the Banks of Potomac, of Washington, and Union Bank of Georgetown; which were severally assimilated in their provisions, and agreed to in Committee.

When an adjournment being called for, was carried.

FRIDAY, February 8.

Mr. NEWTON, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, presented a bill to erect a light-house on Boon Island, in the State of Massachusetts, to place buoys off Cape Fear river, to erect a beacon at New Inlet, in the State of North Carolina, and to place buoys at the entrance of the harbor of Edgartown, in the State of Massachusetts; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-day.

Mr. N., from the same committee, also presented a bill in addition to the act, entitled "An act supplementary to the act concerning Consuls and Vice-Consuls, and for the further protection of American seamen;" which was read twice, and ordered to be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

Mr. PITKIN, from the committee to whom was committed the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act authorizing the discharge of Nathaniel F. Fosdick from his imprisonment," reported the same, without amendment, and the bill was ordered to be read the third time to-day.

The House proceeded to consider the message from the Senate, announcing their disagreement to the amendments made by this House to the bill, entitled "An act making compensation to John Eugene Leitzendorfer, for services rendered the United States in the war with Tripoli:"

when a motion was made by Mr. Root, that the House recede from their said amendments.

A motion was also made by Mr. SWOORE, that the further consideration of the message aforesaid be indefinitely postponed; and, the question being taken thereon, it was determined in the negative.

The question was then taken on the motion of Mr. Root, to recede from the amendments aforesaid, and resolved in the affirmative.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act making a further distribution of such laws of the United States as respect the public lands;" in which they desire the concurrence of this House.

The House then resumed the consideration of the unfinished business of yesterday, on the report of the Committee of the Whole, on the several bills for incorporating the banks within the District of Columbia; the amendments made in Committee of the Whole were concurred with, and all the bills were ordered to a third reading.

The House considered, in Committee of the Whole, the reports of the Committee of Claims unfavorable to the petitions of John Calhoun and William Gamble. The reports in both cases were reversed, and the petitions recommitted to the Committee of Claims, with instructions to report by bill.

ARTHUR ST. CLAIR AND JOHN CRAIG.

The House then went into a Committee of the Whole, on the report of the select committee on the petitions of Arthur St. Clair, and of John Craig; and, after some time spent therein, Mr. SPEAKER resumed the Chair, and Mr. MAcon reported that the Committee had had the said report under consideration, and directed him to report their agreement to each of the resolutions therein contained, as follows:

"Resolved, That the prayer of the petition of Arthur St. Clair is reasonable, and ought to be granted."

"Resolved, That the prayer of the petition of John Craig is reasonable, and ought to be granted."

The House proceeded to consider the said report of the Committee of the Whole; and, on the question to concur with the Committee of the whole House in their agreement to the resolution first recited, it was resolved in the affirmative—yeas 68, nays 39, as follows:

Mr. CLAY, Mr. MCBRYDE, and Mr. HALE, were appointed to prepare and bring in a bill, pursuant to the said first recited resolution.

The question was then stated to concur with the Committee of the Whole in the second recited resolution; when an adjournment being called for, was carried.

SATURDAY, February 9.

Another member, to wit: MATTHEW LYON, from Kentucky, appeared, and took his seat.

Mr. NEWTON, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, presented a bill for the relief of Thomas and John Clifford, of Philadelphia, and Charles Wirgman, of Baltimore; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

TERRITORY OF ORLEANS.

The House proceeded to consider the amendments of the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act to enable the people of the Territory of Orleans to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of such State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, and for other purposes."

One of the amendments proposed to define the western boundary of the Territory, so as to make the Sabine the boundary from the ocean to the 32d degree of north latitude, and thence due north until it intersects the northern boundary line of Orleans Territory.

Mr. PITKIN said, although what he had said on this subject appeared to have no weight when the bill was before the House, he hoped when the bill came from the Senate, that those who were friendly to the bill would agree to the amendment. Even as the boundary was now fixed, there was a small tract of land on this side of the Sabine, which had been in dispute; but, perhaps, the western boundary might as well be fixed at the Sabine as anywhere.

Mr. MITCHELL said he had at first had some hesitation in yielding his assent to this amendment, not because of the extent of it, for the United States might have a claim of a greater extent, and had a color of title to the Rio Bravo, but because the line had been alleged to be a small river a little to the east of the Sabine; and because it was concluded by the officers of the parties on the Sabine that the intervening territory should not be occupied. But he did not believe that these claims of Spain were to be considered of any moment. In taking the Sabine as the western boundary the United States would undoubtedly exercise great moderation in the extension of their limits; and this line would be far from including all the territory which they might hereafter claim; and, in acceding to this boundary, he wished not to be understood as surrendering any claim the United States might have to a greater extent.

The amendment of the Senate was agreed to without opposition.

Another amendment of the Senate proposed to amend that part of the bill declaring that the Convention should be chosen by the free male inhabitants, by adding the word "white," so as to exclude free colored people of mixed blood from voting.

Mr. SMILE expressed the hope that the House would not agree to this amendment. The bill only provided for the election of a Convention to form a constitution; after which these people would permit whom they chose, to vote for Congress, &c. He could not help remarking that, so delicate was the Convention which framed the Constitution, on this point, that it had used only the word "persons." The amendment could answer no good purpose, and an agreement to it would not be very honorable to the House.

Mr. POINDEXTER said he had been impressed with a belief, when this bill was formerly before the House, that the population other than white formed a large proportion of the population of the Territory; but he had since understood that they were not now permitted to vote, and were excluded from the militia. When Louisiana was first acquired by the United States, a corps had been formed, composed of this description of people; but, on an apprehension of insurrection, they were dismissed, and their commissions revoked, &c.

Mr. MITCHELL thought the House had better reject the amendment. The act declared that all the people within certain limits should compose a State, and gave them a right to make all regulations, &c., for their government. The most safe depository of this sort of power would be the Convention in the first instance, and the Legislature in the second. He was, therefore, opposed to the amendment, because the Convention and Legislature were better able to decide the question than the House.

The amendment of the Senate was negatived—yeas 49, nays 60, as follows:

COMMERCIAL INTERCOURSE.

On motion of Mr. EPPES all the orders of the day were laid on the table, and the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill supplementary to the act concerning commercial intercourse, &c.

Mr. EMOTT's motion being under consideration, to amend the bill so as to repeal the law of May last, &c., Mr. RHEA made a motion superseding that, viz: to strike out the whole of the bill.

Mr. EPPES said, that when, on a former day, this bill, designed only for the relief of our own citizens, was under discussion, subjects not at all connected with its merits were brought into view. A gentleman from New York (Mr. EMOTT) presented to the House on that occasion his view of our foreign relations, and exercised all his ingenuity to show, as it is but too often the practice here, that the Government of the United States is exclusively wrong, and the Government of Great Britain exclusively right. It seems that in this enlightened age new duties are assigned to a Representative. Under the pressure of every injury which foreign influence can inflict, a Representative is considered as discharging his duty, if, with a fine-spun web, he can present, under a suspicious aspect, either the motives or the acts of the Executive branch of his Government. No nation, ancient or modern, unless in the last stage of corruption, can be produced where, as in the United States, periods of difficulty have been seized by the Representatives, and the weight of their talents exclusively employed for increasing the public embarrassments. The speech of the gentleman from New York, however well he may have covered it under mildness of manner and a fine-spun argument, is designed to convey to the people an idea, that the Executive has manifested partiality towards France in the late arrangement. The gentleman tells us, that while the Minister of one foreign nation was denounced here for an implied insult, the letter of the Duc de Cadore to Mr. Armstrong is passed over almost in silence; that the Secretary of State, in a letter to General Armstrong, tells him that the President thinks it unnecessary to make any remarks on it. The gentleman ought to have gone further, and stated the whole fact: that the letter of General Armstrong in answer to the Duc de Cadore was approved by the President; that, by the approval, he adopts as his own the language and sentiments of that letter. The letter of General Armstrong, by the approval of the President has become the act of his Government. For the sentiments contained in that letter the American Government is responsible and not General Armstrong. The firm, manly, and eloquent reply of General Armstrong to the Duc de Cadore stands precisely on the same footing as if it had been originally written under the directions of the Government. General Armstrong did not wait for instructions. He repelled, in a style comporting with the dignity of his station, the charges of the Duc de Cadore. The President, through the Secretary of State, approves his letter, adopts it as his own, and says he has nothing to add. Well, indeed, sir, might he say so, because the Minister had already said, in a style as pleasing to his country as to his Government, all that the occasion demanded. But, sir, the gentleman from New York cannot agree with his colleague in considering the President of the United States correct in issuing his proclamation. Why, sir, does the gentleman disapprove of the President's proclamation? Because, says the gentleman, the letter of the Duc de Cadore, of August, was not a repeal of the Berlin and Milan decrees. It is a mere promise that on a certain day they shall be withdrawn. When, sir, the President received the declaration of Mr. Erskine, the British Minister, that, on a particular day, the Orders in Council would be withdrawn, and issued a proclamation founded solely on that declaration, his conduct was warmly approved by men of all parties. The gentleman from New York joined in the burst of applause heaped on that Executive act. Was the letter of Mr. Erskine a repeal of the British orders? Unfortunately, we know practically it was not. Was it such a repeal as the gentleman contends ought to have taken place of the Berlin and Milan decrees, viz: under the sign manual of the Emperor? No, sir, it was just such a letter as that of the Duc de Cadore. In both cases the word of the Minister was taken as a pledge, and, on examining the two letters, so far as they may be considered a pledge, the words are nearly the same. I approved of the arrangement with Mr. Erskine; so did the gentleman from New York. I cannot see any difference in the ground taken by the Executive, except that one arrangement was with Great Britain and the other with France. The one affected the interests of Great Britain; the other affects the interests of France. The gentleman from New York, more nice in distinctions than myself, may, perhaps, satisfy himself and the people that these two cases are marked by lines so strong as to render the conduct of the Executive in the one case an object of applause and approbation for himself and his friends, and in the other of suspicion and censure. It is not, however, my intention to pursue the gentleman through his argument. There is one part of it which I consider it a duty to pass in review, inasmuch as it is calculated to give to the public an erroneous view of the grounds taken by the Executive in the recent negotiation with Great Britain. The gentleman says, the President has not only required of Great Britain to withdraw her orders, but her blockades also. This, he says, she cannot and never will yield. This declaration is made, too, in the presence of the agent of Great Britain, who must have heard with delight the American Executive held up to suspicion, and an American Representative declare, on the floor of Congress, that demands were made on Great Britain, not sanctioned by the law of the last session. In order, sir, to support this declaration, the gentleman gives a view of the demands of the Executive on Great Britain totally incorrect and contradicted by every part of the correspondence before us. The gentleman tells you, that we have demanded of Great Britain not a withdrawal of the Orders in Council only, as contemplated by the law of last session, but of her "novel blockades." To establish the demands of the Executive, he turns, not to the correspondence, but to the Berlin or Milan decrees, and takes for our demand on Great Britain the definition of blockade given by the French Emperor. The gentleman is entirely mistaken as to the demand made of Great Britain by the Executive. The revocation of but one blockade, viz: that of May, 1806, is included in the demand of the Executive. The features of this blockade render it different from all other blockades. It is, in fact, from its character, more like the Order in Council, a permanent regulation of commerce, than a blockade. I will, however, first show from the correspondence, that the President did not, under the act of the last session, require the revocation by Great Britain of any blockade except that of May, 1806; and then, that from the peculiar features of that blockade, it must have been included in the demand made under the act of the last session. In the Message of the President, at the commencement of the session, page 4th and 5th, we find the demand stated in the following terms:

"Under the modification of the original orders of November, 1807, into the orders of April, 1809, there is, indeed, scarcely a nominal distinction between the orders and the blockades. One of these illegitimate blockades, bearing date in May, 1806, having been expressly avowed to be still unrescinded, and to be, in effect, comprehended in the Orders in Council, was too distinctly brought within the purview of the act of Congress, not to be comprehended in the explanation of the requisites to a compliance with it. The British Government was accordingly apprized by our Minister near it, that such was the light in which the subject was to be regarded."

This is the language of the President. In pages 38 and 39, of the correspondence, we find the declaration of Mr. Smith, our Secretary of State, to General Armstrong, in the following words:

"If the non-intercourse law, in any of its modifications, was objectionable to the Emperor of the French, that law no longer exists.

"If he be ready, as has been declared in the letter of the Duke of Cadore, of February 14, to do justice to the United States, in the case of a pledge on their part not to submit to the British edicts, the opportunity for making good the declaration is now afforded. Instead of submission, the President is ready, by renewing the non-intercourse against Great Britain, to oppose to her Orders in Council a measure which is of a character that ought to satisfy any reasonable expectation. If it should be necessary for you to meet the question, whether the non-intercourse will be renewed against Great Britain, in case she should not comprehend, in the repeal of her edicts, her blockades which are not consistent with the law of nations, you may, should it be found necessary, let it be understood, that a repeal of the illegal blockades of a date prior to the Berlin decree, namely, that of May, 1806, will be included in the condition required of Great Britain; that particular blockade having been avowed to be comprehended in, and, of course, identified with, the Orders in Council. With respect to blockades, of a subsequent date or not, against France, you will press the reasonableness of leaving them, together with future blockades not warranted by public law, to be proceeded against by the United States in the manner they may choose to adopt."

In pages 45 and 46, we have the declaration of General Armstrong and the Duke de Cadore. Mr. E. then read the following:

PARIS, January 25, 1810.

"SIR: A letter from Mr. Secretary Smith, of the first of December last, made it my duty to inquire of His Excellency the Duke of Cadore, what were the conditions on which his Majesty the Emperor would annul his decree, commonly called the Berlin decree; and whether, if Great Britain revoked her blockades, of a date anterior to that decree, his Majesty would consent to revoke the said decree? To these questions I have this day received the following answer, which I hasten to convey to you by a special messenger:

ANSWER.—"The only conditions required for the revocation, by his Majesty the Emperor, of the decree of Berlin, will be a previous revocation, by the British Government, of her blockades of France, or a part of France, (such as that from the Elbe to Brest, &c.,) of a date anterior to that of the aforesaid decree."

In page 47, we have the statement of Lord Wellesley to Mr. Pinkney:

"I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your note of the fifteenth ultimo, wherein you request to be informed whether any, and, if any, what blockades of France, instituted by Great Britain during the present war, before the first day of January, 1807, are understood by his Majesty's Government to be in force?

I have now the honor to acquaint you, that the coast, rivers, and ports, from the river Elbe to Brest, both inclusive, were notified to be under the restrictions of blockade, with certain modifications, on the 16th of May, 1806; and that these restrictions were afterwards comprehended in the Order of Council of the 7th of January, 1807, which order is still in force."

In page 71, of the correspondence, Lord Wellesley declares, in a letter to Mr. Pinkney:

"The blockade, notified by Great Britain in May, 1806, has never been formally withdrawn. It cannot, therefore, be accurately stated, that the restrictions which it established rest altogether on the Order of Council of the 7th of January, 1807; they are comprehended under the more extensive restrictions of that order. No other blockade of the ports of France was instituted by Great Britain, between the 16th of May, 1806, and the 7th of January, 1807, excepting the blockade of Venice, instituted on the 27th of July, 1806, which is still in force."

From this, sir, it appears that if we are to credit the President, the Secretary of State, General Armstrong, the Duc de Cadore, and the British Minister, Lord Wellesley, the demand was confined to the blockade of 1806. Was this blockade such a violation of the neutral rights of the United States as to come decidedly within the act of the last session? Let us examine its features. This blockade is a compound one, presenting three distinct characters:

1. It obstructs a trade from one port to another of the same enemy—France for example. This trade has been denied latterly though not formerly, by Great Britain, to be free to neutrals. The United States assert the neutral right to it.

2. It obstructs a trade from the port of one enemy to the port of another—from a French to a Dutch port, for example. This is a principle not before asserted by Great Britain. The present Cabinet of Great Britain contended against its conformity to the law of nations, in opposition to their predecessors, who attempted to justify the orders of January, 1807, on that principle.

3. It obstructs the direct trade of neutrals from their own country to any part of the coast from the Elbe to Brest—a coast not less than a thousand miles. For this part of the blockade there can be no defence which is not applicable to the Orders in Council. This blockade has been continued for four or five years. No force, either adequate or inadequate, has been stationed for carrying it into effect. No new notification has been given. It is, in fact, like the Orders in Council, a permanent regulation of commerce, and has nothing of the character of a blockade, except the mere name. This blockade consists in great part of the same prohibition with the orders of January, 1807, in which it is said to be comprehended; that is, against a trade along the belligerent coast. If the orders be unlawful, therefore, the blockade must be so; and if the orders be repealed as a violation of neutral trade, in compliance with the act of Congress, the obligation to repeal the blockade, as a like violation, cannot be contested. This blockade of May, 1806, is in violation of the principles laid down by all authors on the subject of blockade. It is in violation of the principles laid down in all the treaties which attempted to define a blockade. It is in violation of the principles contended for by every Administration under the American Government, from the period of WASHINGTON to the present time. The correspondence under General WASHINGTON's Administration, between the Secretary of State and Mr. Hammond, may be referred to for the principles asserted under that Administration. In the correspondence before us we have the principles as laid down by General Marshall and Mr. King. To these I will refer.

H. OF R.

Commercial Intercourse.

FEBRUARY, 1811.

Mr. E. then read the following extracts of letters from Mr. King and Mr. Marshall:

"Seven or eight of our vessels, laden with valuable cargoes, have been lately captured, and are still detained for adjudication; these vessels were met in their voyages to and from the Dutch ports, declared to be blockaded. Several notes have passed between Lord Grenville and me upon this subject, with the view, on my part, of establishing a more limited and reasonable interpretation of the law of blockade, than is attempted to be enforced by the English Government. Nearly one hundred Danish, Russian, and other neutral ships have, within a few months, been, in like manner, intercepted, going to and returning from the United Provinces. Many of them, as well as some of ours, arrived in the Texel in the course of the last Winter; the severity of which obliged the English fleet to return to their ports, leaving a few frigates only to make short cruises off the Texel, as the season would allow.

My object has been to prove that, in this situation of the investing fleet, there can be no effective blockade, which, in my opinion, cannot be said to exist without a competent force, stationed and present at or near the entrance of the blockaded port."

LONDON, May 23, 1799.

"It seems scarcely necessary to observe, that the presence of a competent force is essential to constitute a blockade; and although it is usual for the belligerent to give notice to neutral nations when he institutes a blockade, it is not customary to give any notice of its discontinuance; and that consequently the presence of the blockading force is the natural criterion by which the neutral is enabled to ascertain the existence of the blockade, in like manner as the actual investment of a besieged place is the only evidence by which we decide whether the siege is continued or raised. A siege may be commenced, raised, recommenced and raised again, but its existence at any precise time must always depend upon the fact of the presence of an investing army. This interpretation of the law of blockade is of peculiar importance to nations situated at a great distance from each other, and between whom a considerable length of time is necessary to send and receive information."

Extract of a letter from Mr. Marshall, Secretary of State, to Mr. King, dated

"The right to confiscate vessels bound to a blockaded port, has been unreasonably extended to cases not coming within the rule, as heretofore adopted.

"On this principle, it might well be questioned, whether this rule can be applied to a place not completely invested by land as well as by sea. If we examine the reasoning on which it is founded the right to intercept and confiscate supplies, designed for a blockaded town, it will be difficult to resist the conviction that its extension to towns, invested by sea only is an unjustifiable encroachment on the right of neutrals. But it is not of this departure from principle—a departure which has received some sanction from practice—that we mean to complain. It is, that ports, not effectually blockaded by a force capable of completely investing them, have yet been declared in a state of blockade, and vessels attempting to enter therein have been seized, and, on that account, confiscated."

I have shown, from the correspondence, that the blockade of May, 1806, was the only one included in the demand of the Executive. I have shown that it is not only a violation of our neutral rights, but of the principles contended for by men of all political parties under every administration of this country; and I cannot but express my regret that the gentleman from New York should consider that, under the law of the last session, this blockade ought not to have been included in the demand of the Executive on Great Britain; that he should declare in the hearing of the British agent that demands had been made by the Executive of the United States which it would be extremely convenient for us if Great Britain would allow, but which she never could yield. The gentleman from New York has entered into an argument to show that the Berlin and Milan decrees are not repealed. We have just heard of the arrival of a French Minister; he has left France at a time to bring us certain information on this question. I have no wish to enter on this interesting question, with a bandage round my eyes. Whether France has complied with her engagements; whether France has failed in her engagements, cannot be a subject of ingenious speculation many days longer. Whatever may be the information received, I shall endeavor to adhere to what I deem the real interests of my country, and, so far as I am able, to maintain its rights against the unprincipled aggressions of every foreign nation.

I will now make a few observations on the bill before the House. It contains but a single section, and exempts from forfeiture goods owned wholly by citizens of the United States, which shall have departed from a British port prior to the second day of February, 1811. When the report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the subject of modifications of the non-intercourse system was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, it appeared to be the unanimous sentiment of the committee, that goods which had left a British port, before the President's proclamation reached the port ought to be exempt from the penalty of the non-intercourse law, although they might not arrive until after the 2d day of February. It was considered not inconsistent with an honest compliance with our engagements with France, and seemed to be required.

by that general principle of policy which is adhered to in all free countries, of allowing sufficient notice to its citizens of the commencement of penalties and forfeitures. The bill for enforcing the non-intercourse system was reported with that limited provision. After the bill was printed various statements were received by the committee, all tending to show that the orders of our merchants were sent out in September and October; that, from the change in the actual state of commercial capital in this country, goods were at present purchased with cash, and not only became the property of our citizens under the orders of merchants sent before the President's proclamation issued, but were at the risk of the purchasers; that these goods were actually paid for before the President's proclamation issued; that they could not be brought in before the second day of February. The committee, having previously decided that time ought to be allowed for the President's proclamation to reach a British port, and taking into view the great injury our own citizens would sustain from a rigorous construction of the law, determined to extend the time to the ultimate period at which a citizen could put his property on board without infringing the laws of his country. It is not supposed that the construction put upon the law is strictly within its letter—it is, however, perfectly within its object. It was designed to operate on the nation refusing to modify or withdraw its edicts. To give it a construction which would either confiscate property bona fide American, or lock it up in British ports, would be to destroy our own resources, and produce no effect on Great Britain. Under the sixth section of the law, it is not made unlawful to put on board British manufactures with the intent to import them, until the expiration of the three months after the proclamation; its being unlawful after that period depended on Great Britain's following the example of France and revoking her edicts; according, therefore, as the citizen was more or less sanguine, his interest might be more or less involved by supposing that Great Britain would withdraw. Orders sent previous to the issuing of the President's proclamation violated no existing law. Those sent afterwards cannot be considered as given in violation of law, inasmuch as the commencement of the law depended on a contingency, viz: the modification or withdrawal of the British orders. There is another circumstance which operated on the committee: The law of the last session was not considered by the committee as a plain rule of action which every citizen could clearly comprehend, and so arrange his affairs as to avoid its penalties. The fourth section of the act of last session revives certain sections of another act, on the happening of a certain event, three months after that event shall have been proclaimed by the President. This reviving section does not declare that from and after three months from the date of the President's proclamation there shall be non-intercourse, but that particular sections of a former non-intercourse law shall be revived.

Each of the revived sections contain the words "20th of May next," and it has been made a question whether these words are revived as part of the sections. It is not supposed by me that such is a proper construction of the law. It is only stated for the purpose of showing that the law was not in that clear, decided form in which penal statutes ought to be enacted. In the construction given to the law, more regard was paid to its objects and principles than to its strict letter. And, if, for the purpose of affording relief in cases peculiarly hard and operating on our own citizens exclusively, we have placed on the law a construction not warranted by its letter, I hope we shall be justified by the purity of the motives under which we have acted.

Mr. EMOTT explained.

Mr. STURGES said he was happy that he felt himself so situated that he could avoid that course of discussion upon the present occasion, so much reprobated by the honorable gentleman (Mr. EPES) from Virginia. He said he should not undertake to enter into a discussion of our foreign relations, nor say much upon our restrictive system; that his friend from New York (Mr. EMOTT) had already done that fully and ably.

He said he was at present inclined to support the amendment proposed by the honorable gentleman, (Mr. RHEA, of Tennessee,) and if the words should be stricken out as proposed by that gentleman, (as one good turn deserved another,) he hoped he would be disposed to support a proposition, which he (Mr. S.) would then submit to the Committee. If the Committee should agree to strike out, Mr. S. would then propose to insert in lieu thereof, after the words "be it enacted" the following words, (which he read to the Committee,) viz: "That an act entitled an act concerning the commercial intercourse between the United States and Great Britain and France, and their dependencies, and for other purposes, passed May 1, 1810, be and the same is hereby repealed."

Mr. S. said he was inclined to favor the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee on another ground. He was not willing to imply by any vote of his a recognition of the efficacy of the non-intercourse law, so called, which could not, in his opinion, upon any principle, have any operative force, until the 20th of May next. He flattered himself, if gentlemen would be so good as to attend to him, that he should be able to demonstrate to their satisfaction the truth of this position; and that the chairman of the Committee of Foreign Relations, exercising his usual candor, would himself be satisfied. The law, passed March 1, 1809, contained a number of sections which went to prevent importations from Great Britain and France, and their dependencies. This law (containing a clause limiting its duration) was to expire at the end of the next session of Congress. The then next session of Congress ended the last of June, 1809. The law of March, 1809, therefore, then expired. The law of May 1st, 1810, enacted that certain sections of that of March, 1809, should be revived upon certain contingencies. Those sections, thus revived, are the 3d, 4th, 5th, 6th, 7th, 8th, 9th, 10th, and 18th. Mr. S. then recurred to those sections, and read the third, which is as follows :

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That, from and after the 20th day of May next, the entrance of the harbors and waters of the United States, and the territories thereof, be, and the same is hereby interdicted to all ships and vessels sailing under the flag of Great Britain or France, or owned in whole or in part by any citizen or subject of either—vessels hired, chartered, or employed by the Government of either country, for the sole purpose of carrying letters or despatches, and also vessels forced in by distress, or by the dangers of the sea, only excepted. And if any ship or vessel sailing under the flag of Great Britain or France, or owned in whole or in part by any citizen or subject of either, and not excepted as aforesaid, shall, after the said 20th of May next, arrive either with or without a cargo, within the limits of the United States or of the territories thereof; such ship or vessel, together with the cargo, if any, which may be found on board, shall be forfeited, and may be seized and condemned in any court of the United States, or the territories thereof, having competent jurisdiction; and all and every act and acts heretofore passed, which shall be within the purview of this act, shall be and the same are hereby repealed."

Mr. S. said it was unnecessary to read the other sections to which he had referred, as the phraseology, as to the time when they were to take effect, was the same as in the section which he had read. He said it would not answer the purpose of gentlemen who held a different opinion from him, to argue in such a case as the present, from the intention of the Legislature. He said it was a principle, in construing penal statutes, to construe them strictly. But he said it was not necessary for him, in support of his position, to resort to this rule of construction. The words of these sections are explicit, and the meaning plain. They are revived in the law of May, 1810. They must be considered as revived in totidem verbis—as the whole of the sections are revived generally, it is not competent to say, that one part of the section is revived, and not the other part. If they had been transcribed verbatim, and incorporated in the law of May, 1810, there could have been no question; and there can be no difference as to this point between that case, and reviving them without excepting any part. Mr. S. therefore concluded, that as the expressions in the sections referred to were, that they were to take effect the 20th of May next; and the law reviving them passed the 1st of May, 1810; that they cannot have any efficacy until the 20th of May, 1811. And he said the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. EPPES,) in attending to this point, had implied his doubts upon it by saying, that as there might be doubts among lawyers, though among unlearned men there could be none, the Committee of Foreign Relations, in reporting the bill now under consideration, were disposed to give a liberal construction to the meaning of the Legislature. But, said Mr. S., this cannot help the matter. No new law, in the nature of an explanatory law, can give efficacy to the former one, if that law would otherwise have no force. If, then, he was correct in his ideas upon the subject, and he thought every lawyer in the House must be of his opinion, Mr. S. asked, what is the consequence? He said that, from the 2d of February, any seizures which have been or shall be made by your custom-house officers, cannot be considered as legal. Your Federal courts cannot condemn property so seized; and in case they are made, your State courts will sustain actions of trover and trespass in favor of the owners thereof against such officers.

Mr. S. said that although he did not vote for any of these laws, yet, having been one of the Legislature, he felt his share of mortification in consequence of the situation in which we were placed. That this blunder must not only expose us to the ridicule of our own citizens, but also of foreign nations. That the law having no force or efficacy, the President's proclamation was without authority. He really, therefore, thought the best way to get rid of the difficulty was to repeal the law; and he hoped gentlemen from all sides of the House would be willing to throw aside party spirit, and unite in endeavoring to do some wise thing, and thereby remove the imputation to which, by our blunder, we have subjected ourselves.

He thought we ought to begin anew, and remove the rubbish out of the way. We had been going headlong, and progressing in blunders for several years. We began at the session of Congress, 1805 and 1806, and owing to pride of opinion, or some other cause, our affairs have been growing worse and worse. He thought our prospect a gloomy one, and he feared our fate would be dreadful, indeed, unless we retraced our steps. He said there were no natural causes which necessarily produced our difficulties. They were owing to our own mismanagements; and if we would unite in changing our course, we might yet be prosperous.

Mr. WRIGHT.—Mr. Chairman: The gentleman from New York (Mr. EMOTT) labored yesterday for three hours on his proposed amendment to the bill under consideration, and exercised all his ingenuity to seduce us into a violation of the faith of the nation, pledged in the act entitled "An act concerning the commercial intercourse between the United States and Great Britain and France and their dependencies, and for other purposes." By this act the nation pledged itself to Great Britain and to France, "that if either of them should 'so revoke or modify their edicts that they should 'cease to violate the neutral commerce of the 'United States, that the President should, by 'proclamation, declare the same; and that, three 'months after the date of said proclamation, 'no goods, wares, or merchandise, the growth, 'produce, or manufacture of the other nation, 'her colonies or dependencies, should be imported 'into the United States." The Government, strictly preserving her neutral character, at the same moment presented to both nations the same proposition, and by the solemnity of that act, in the face of the world, pledged the faith of the nation to the faithful performance of the condition above stated, on their part to be performed, in the event of either Great Britain or France so revoking or modifying their edicts that they should cease to violate the neutral commerce of the United States.

France, on the 5th of August, 1810, did so revoke her edicts that they should cease to violate the neutral commerce of the United States after the second day of November; and, although the fact has been established by the letter of the Duke of Cadore, of the 5th of August, to General Armstrong, our Minister at Paris, and by him communicated to the President of the United States; and, although the President did, by his proclamation, bearing date the second of November, in obedience to the said act of Congress, declare "that the edicts of France violating the neutral commerce of the United States had been so revoked or modified that, from and after the second day of November, they would cease to violate the neutral commerce of the United States;" whereby, after the expiration of three months from the date of said proclamation, by virtue of the act aforesaid, "no goods, wares, or merchandise, the growth, produce, or manufacture of Great Britain, her colonies or dependencies, should be imported into the United States, unless she, before the expiration of that time, revoked her edicts." Yet, sir, this gentleman, to the bill on the table contemplating a faithful execution of the non-intercourse law against Great Britain, has proposed an amendment that "no vessel or merchandise shall be liable to seizure or forfeiture, on account of any infraction, or presumed infraction, of the provisions of the act to which this act is a supplement;" thereby substantially to repeal the non-intercourse act, although France has revoked her decrees, and Britain has refused to revoke her Orders in Council, and by the last information from our Minister in London, every spark of hope of their being revoked had been extinguished.

That gentleman, a representative of the American people, has proposed this direct breach of public faith, and as a pretext to the unprincipled act, has had the temerity to declare "that the President had no authority to issue his proclamation; that the assurances of France to our Government were deceptive; that the Berlin and Milan decrees were not revoked; and that the non-intercourse act is not in force;" and thus has arraigned the President for issuing his proclamation.

By the Constitution, the Departments of the Government are distinctly marked, and the President authorized, as the legitimate organ, to discharge every function of the Executive. Besides, the non-intercourse act has expressly authorized and directed him, by proclamation, to declare the fact of the revocation or modification of the edicts which the belligerents were by that act invited to revoke.

As well might that gentleman question the legitimacy of a treaty after it had been ratified and declared by proclamation, or an act of Congress after it had passed the usual forms and been duly published. Sir, this act of the President, as to every fact stated, implies absolute verity, and, like any other record, can be tried only by itself.

Had the gentleman contented himself with the discharge of his Legislative duties, and indulged the President in the exercise of his Executive functions, we should have been relieved from a long speech, calculated only to inculpate the President and expose the gentleman's devotion to Great Britain. How, I ask, could the President act a different part, from the evidence in the case? The Duke of Cadore, the French Minister of Foreign Relations at Paris, in writing informed General Armstrong, the American Minister at that Court, on the fifth of August, "that he was authorized to declare to him, that the decrees of Berlin and Milan are revoked, and that after the first of November, they will cease to have effect; it being understood that, in consequence of this declaration, the English shall revoke their Orders in Council, and renounce the new principles of blockade which they have wished to establish, or, that the United States, conformably to the act you have just communicated, shall cause their rights to be respected by the English." General Armstrong immediately communicated it to the President, who, being thus in possession of the information, was not only authorized, but bound to issue his proclamation.

I would ask, if this diplomatic evidence, the established mode of communication between nations, is not to be received and respected, if national confidence is not destroyed, and an end put to all diplomatic intercourse? Was not the President, in good faith, bound to believe the fact, and, believing it, bound to act as he did?

Sir, if Great Britain had made the like communication through Lord Wellesley to Mr. Pinkney, and he to the President, who had, thereupon, issued his proclamation, what would have been the conduct and language of this gentleman and those who think with him in political opinion? They would, I have no doubt, been prepared to eulogize the President, and publicly approve the act. In this assertion I am not left to conjecture, but will prove it by the most unequivocal evidence, if the gentlemen are consistent with themselves. You will recollect that, by the act of the first of March, eighteen hundred and nine, interdicting the commercial intercourse between the United States and Great Britain and France, and their colonies and dependencies, after a certain period, unless they should so revoke or modify their edicts that they should cease to violate the neutral commerce of the United States, the President in the case of either Power, so revoking or modifying their edicts, was authorized by proclamation to declare the same, whereby, the interdictions were, as to the Power so revoking, to be suspended, and in force only against the other; and I hope you never will forget the deep game that was played by Great Britain on that occasion, and the diplomatic trick that was practised on our Administration by Mr. Erskine's memorable treaty. The President then placed full faith in the act of the British Plenipotentiary, and, on the signing of that treaty which revoked the Orders in Council, immediately issued his proclamation, and thereby dissolved the commercial injunction, whereby Great Britain was supplied with the necessaries of her existence. Then the President acted promptly, as in the case of France; then he acted on the information of the British Minister, as he did in the case of France, on the information of the French Minister. Then the treaty revoking the Orders in Council was rejected by the British Government; but now, in the case of France, the revocation of her decrees is confirmed and carried into full effect. But the proclamation in the case of France is denounced by the gentleman from New York as neither formal, substantial, or by authority, although by comparing it with the proclamation in the case of Great Britain, which I hold in my hand, it will be found formally and substantially a copy of it, varied only as to the Government to whose proceedings it relates. When I assure you that the President's proclamation in the case of Great Britain met with the approbation of the gentleman from New York and his political friends, you will feel surprised at their partiality; but, when you examine the resolution of the House of Representatives approving the conduct of the President in that case, you will feel no doubt of the fact.

Sir, this gentleman has told us, that the non-intercourse act is not in force, and that the American people will not submit to its execution, notwithstanding the revocation of the French decrees, the continuation of the British Orders in Council, and the President's proclamation.—Whence does this gentleman derive the power of declaring an act of Congress not in force, declared by the President's proclamation to be in force? Or in what section of the Union does the gentleman presume to say the American people will not submit to the law? That that gentleman's speech was intended to sow sedition among the people, and to encourage insubordination to this law, is too obvious.

Sir, the decrees of France, now they are revoked, seem to be more obnoxious to that gentleman than the British Orders in Council, now in full force. He denounces the Emperor for the Rambouillet decree, issued the twenty-third of March, eighteen hundred and ten; which subjected the ships of America to condemnation entering the ports of France, which the Emperor declares was an act of retaliation; because Congress had by their act of March, eighteen hundred and nine, subjected the vessels of France to condemnation entering the ports of the United States, yet that gentleman, when speaking of the British blockading order of eighteen hundred and six, issued without even a pretext, which by proclamation without investment subjected our ships to condemnation entering the ports of France, says, "with respect to their Orders in Council I have nothing to say, as to their justice, or their policy." He is prepared to condemn France for her act of retaliation, but he is not prepared even to speak of Great Britain's new paper blockading system, much less to declare it unjust or impolitic; although Sir William Scott, in 1 Robinson's Rep. page 96, expressly declares, "that no vessel was liable to condemnation for entering a port alleged to be blockaded, unless it was invested by such a naval force as to make the entry therein hazardous."

Sir, I am no apologist for France—nor do I know how any American, particularly a member of Congress, can be the apologist for either, after France and England have both expressly admitted, that their Orders in Council and decrees were direct violations of the law of nations, and adopted from necessity, as a measure of retaliation against each other, and have each charged the other with the first aggressions on our neutral rights. On examining that subject, I find that England, by her Orders in Council of May, eighteen hundred and six, by proclamation had placed France in a state of blockade; that France in eighteen hundred and seven had placed the British isles in a like manner in a state of blockade; that England, by her Orders in Council of the eleventh of November, eighteen hundred and seven, laid a toll on neutral vessels, and made them pass through her ports; France by her decree of the seventeenth of December, eighteen hundred and seven, declared the vessels submitting to that order denationalized, and lawful prize; so that by their new principle of blockade, and their unprincipled retaliations, the commerce of the United States was cut up by the roots. The American Government, anxious to preserve the remnant of the property of the American merchants, that had escaped the rapacity of the tyrant of the ocean, on the twenty-second of December, eighteen hundred and seven, passes the embargo law, which the seditious clamors of certain arch traitors in the Eastern States, the violation of the law by treason and cupidity, induced Congress on the first of March, eighteen hundred and nine, to repeal, and to pass the present non-intercourse law, continued, under which France has revoked her decrees of Berlin and Milan, and now expects us to fulfil the conditions, which we voluntarily imposed on ourselves, in the event of either revoking their decrees.

The gentleman from New York insinuates that the British Order in Council of May eighteen hundred and six was not contemplated by our law. I would ask the gentleman whether that order did not violate the neutral commerce of the United States? And whether the act of Congress which declares, that, on either France or England so revoking or modifying their edicts violating the neutral commerce of the United States, that order is not as completely embraced, in letter and in spirit as any other Order in Council? Why then except it?

He also insists that the Emperor of France, when he revoked his decrees, where he says the United States shall cause their rights to be respected, intended more than the enforcing the non-intercourse law. How that gentleman collected his intention, but from the letter of the Duke of Cadore, I know not; and I am sure he could not from that letter, which says "I am authorized to declare to you, sir, that the decrees of Berlin and Milan are revoked, and that, after the first of November, they will cease to have effect; it being understood, that in consequence of this declaration the English shall revoke their Orders in Council, and renounce the new principles of blockade which they have wished to establish; or that the United States, conformably to the act you have just communicated, shall cause your rights to be respected." Can language be more plain, that the revocation was to take effect on either of these alternatives? Or can there be a doubt that the Emperor wished it on the latter, as it might lead to a collision between the United States and Great Britain, if she did not revoke her Orders in Council? However, in order to prove that the Berlin and Milan decrees are yet in force against the United States, he read a paragraph from the Aurora, in which the Duke of Cadore, in a report to the Emperor of the third of December, says, "The orders of the British Council overturned the commerce of the world; the decrees of Berlin and Milan repelled those monstrous novelties. Sire, as long as England shall persist in her Orders in Council, your Majesty will persist in your decrees. Your Majesty will oppose to the blockade of the coasts and continental blockade, and to the pillage of the seas, the confiscation of English merchandise." Did he thus expect to impose upon us? Has not this report immediate relation to England, and English merchandises? Did any man in his senses ever suppose that the revocation or modification of the decrees as to the United States should extend to all other neutral Powers? Or can the confiscation of English merchandises be conceived to affect the United States, when he has expressly stipulated, "not to import any goods, wares, or merchandises, the growth, produce, or manufacture of Great Britain." The act of Congress is perfect evidence, that the revocation or modification of the edicts, so that they should cease to violate the neutral commerce of the United States, was all that was required, and that the United States should not import goods, wares, or merchandises, the growth, produce, or manufacture of the Power refusing to revoke her edicts. If the gentleman had read all that the Aurora said, he would have seen it declared, "that the Berlin and Milan decrees were revoked as to the United States. That, to the British paper blockade France had opposed not only her continental blockade, but her blockade by fire, by burning British goods and by branding the violator of her customs in the forehead with the letters V. D."

He now expresses a perfect confidence that the Berlin and Milan decrees are not revoked, from a hasty letter of our Chargé des Affairs, of the 11th of December to the Secretary of State, in which he says, "that about the 5th of December the New Orleans Packet was seized at Bordeaux, under the Milan and Berlin decrees; and that on the 10th day of December he had written a letter to the Duke of Cadore, remonstrating against it, in which he says, "I am sure this act will not be approved by His Majesty, but that prompt measures will be taken to correct it." If the act had been in violation of our rights by an officer of the Government, it ought not to be ascribed to the Government, until the case had been correctly stated and redress denied; but we fortunately have a full statement of the case from Mr. Myers, our Consul at Bordeaux, of the 6th of December. "The brig New Orleans Packet, of New York, with a cargo of provisions, and three hundred bags of cocoa on board, bound to the Mediterranean for a market, went to Gibraltar, where, after lying some time, she came to this port where she has been sequestered." He also states, that "the schooner Friendship, of and from Baltimore, with a cargo of coffee and campeachy, is arrived five days ago in this river." He, on the 14th of December, says, "the brig Orleans Packet, mentioned in my former letter, has since been seized by the collector, and her cargo has been put in the Imperial custom-house." The schooner Friendship has been sequestered; but the Consul does not utter a complaint against France. No! he knew that by our agreement with France we had no right to import any goods, wares, or merchandises, the growth, produce, or manufacture of Great Britain or her dependencies; that one of them had just come from Gibraltar, and that they were both laden with British colonial produce, prohibited by the act of Congress of the 1st of May, and also liable to be burnt. Thus, Mr. Chairman, we find from a full examination of the case in the Aurora, and from a full statement of the case of the New Orleans Packet, there is no evidence that the decrees of Berlin and Milan are not revoked; which the gentleman seems so desirous to establish against the President's proclamation. And why this solicitude? I can find no other reason for it, but that it may impeach the British Cabinet—for, sir, we know, that Mr. Canning assured Mr. Pinkney that the British Orders in Council should be revoked, on the revocation of the decrees of France which had produced them; that Mr. Erskine gave the same assurances, and in the solemn form of a treaty, and that these assurances had lately been repeated by Lord Wellesley; yet, after the decrees of France are revoked, in the face of all these assurances, the Orders in Council are continued; and Mr. Pinkney tells us there is no expectation that they will be revoked; and he advises the United States to take high ground. Sir, there is no reliance on their promises; they have uniformly declared, that the French decrees were the cause of their Orders in Council, which should be withdrawn on the revocation of the decrees of France; and yet they are continued in full operation against us. On the other hand, Champagny, in a letter of the 22d of August, 1809, tells General Armstrong: "That the arbitrary acts of Great Britain had forced France into measures of reprisal. Let England revoke her orders of blockade of May 1806, against France, France will revoke her Berlin decree of 1807, against England."

'Let England revoke her order of November 1807, and the Milan decree of December 1807 will fall of itself.' These assurances made by England and by France induced the United States to pass the act, under the faith of which the decrees of France have been revoked. Yet, although Mr. Erskine's treaty, which he insisted to the last was made agreeably to the letter and spirit of his instructions, revoking the Orders in Council, has been rejected by the British Government; a treaty which every well informed American believes was made for the temporary purpose of removing the commercial restrictions, without any intention to ratify the same; and although France has revoked her decrees, violating the neutral commerce of the United States, whereby we are bound to carry into effect the non-intercourse act against England, we find honorable gentlemen on this floor exercising all their talents to prove the law not in force, or to effect a repeal of it, or to excite an opposition in the people to its execution, and ready to subscribe to the British pretext, that the decrees of France had been the cause of the Orders in Council, although it involved the absurdity of the effect preceding the cause.

Sir, while Great Britain finds such able advocates on this floor, she will find no necessity to redress our wrongs, but will wait the issue of our proceedings in Congress, to see if our remedial laws are not repealed, or our citizens excited to oppose their execution. But we ought not to be surprised at this, when we take a retrospective view of their conduct, their united and uniform opposition to the Administration for many years. They have reprobated every measure—Mr. Erskine's British treaty only excepted—and, as soon as that was rejected by the British Government, as being made contrary to instructions, our Administration was charged with making it, knowing that Mr. Erskine had no authority, and with seducing him to make it contrary to instructions. Afterwards, when Mr. F. J. Jackson, of Copenhagen memory, was sent over as a Minister, while his hands were yet stained with the innocent blood of the inhabitants of Copenhagen, and insulted the Administration with the charge of making the treaty with Mr. Erskine, knowing that he had no authority to make it, and after the peremptory asseveration "that Government had no such knowledge, that with such knowledge no such arrangement would have been made," and "that no such insinuation could be admitted," he replied, "that he made no insinuation, without being able to substantiate a fact, and in that I must continue," thereby persevering in the charge of falsehood in the Administration, for which he was dismissed. Again, our Government was expressly charged, with knowing that Mr. Erskine had no authority, and with dismissing Mr. Jackson without any just cause; that his charge was true, and that in this the Government acted under the influence of France. In order to make such an impression on the public mind, Mr. Jackson is treated with uncommon attention. When he arrives at Baltimore he is surrounded by tories, royalists, Burrrites, and British agents, and treated with great politeness—when he arrives in Philadelphia, he is overwhelmed by the civilities of refugees, tories, Burrrites, and United States' Bank directors—when he arrives at New York, he is received with open arms by a set of beings of the same description, who invite him to a public dinner, and to test their attachment to the British Government treat him to "God save the King"—when he reaches Boston, there is great parade indeed; he is welcomed to the city by tories, traitors, disorganizers, and embargo-breakers, and Fanueil Hall, once the Council Chamber of the patriots of the Revolution, is prostituted to the disgraceful purpose of a public dinner to this disgraced Minister, and there we see a distinguished Senator of the United States testing his loyalty by the toast of "Britain's fast anchored isle, the world's last hope." After this hasty review of the past, we ought not to be surprised at any measures that may be taken against the Administration, when Great Britain is in the question.

It is not long, sir, since the late Administration was charged on this floor with being moved by an invisible hand; I wish I could pay the honorable gentleman from New York even that compliment, for really, Mr. Chairman, had I by accident been placed in this Hall, without knowing where I was, and heard the speech of the gentleman from New York, I should have supposed myself in some great council, and that that gentleman was a British advocate zealously discharging the functions of his vocation. Sir, he has told us that our restrictive system and the embargo were bad policy, that as to England they had no effect. What, I would ask, would be evidence to him of an effect? Were the immense riots of the English manufacturers thereby turned out of employment nothing? Was the King's descending from the throne to issue a proclamation making Halifax a free port, and inviting the Americans treasonably to trade to it, even without ship's papers, nothing? Was it nothing to commit misprision of treason by seducing our citizens to the treasonably feeding our enemies, thereby giving them aid and comfort? Was the rescuing a British murderer, sentenced to the gibbet at Detroit for killing an American citizen in the execution of the embargo law, nothing; when in good faith he was bound to have caused that murderer and those traitors to have been delivered up to the United States, that they might have been brought to condign punishment?

Can there after this be a doubt of the powerful effects of the restrictive system? Or does any man doubt that the embargo law, had it been continued for twelve months more, and the American people had been faithful to themselves in the execution of it, that the desired effect would not have been produced? I presume not. Can the gentleman from New York expect us to adopt his amendment, after the nation has pledged itself by their voluntary tender of terms, which have been accepted, and that acceptance declared by proclamation? I am sure this House will disdain so perfidious a policy and reject his proposition violative of national faith and national honor.

Mr. RHEA supported the motion to strike out the whole of the bill, on the ground that to pass such a bill would be a breach of our faith with France.

Mr. BIBE moved that the Committee rise to allow further time for reflection on the subject.

Mr. GARDENIER opposed the motion on account of the critical state of the mercantile world, which required an immediate decision.

Mr. BACON said he should vote for the motion, because he found it was impossible to get at the question. The bill had been before the House several days, and, instead of receiving a decision on its merits, had been met by motions not intended for the relief of our merchants, but the embarrassment of their proceedings.

Mr. QUINCY said that a subject of this kind ought to be fully discussed; and no objection could arise to the loss of time thus employed.

Several gentlemen wished to speak to the merits of the bill; but the Chairman confined the debate to the question of the Committee's rising.

The Committee rose, ayes 62, and were refused leave to sit again, ayes 35.

Mr. EPPES moved to take up the bill in the House; but a motion to adjourn prevailed, 59 to 51.

MONDAY, February 11.

Mr. STURGES presented sundry petitions of the inhabitants of the city of New York, to the same effect with the petition of the Synod of Pittsburgh, presented the fourth ultimo, which were referred to the Committee of the Whole on the bill to amend an act, entitled "An act regulating the Post Office Establishment."

On motion of Mr. SEYBERT, a committee was appointed to inquire into the expediency of making a further appropriation for the support of a Library; and that the committee have leave to report by bill, or otherwise. Messrs. SEYBERT, GOODWYN, and ELY, were appointed the said committee.

A motion was made, by Mr. POINDEXTER, that the House do come to the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing, by law, for the final adjustment of claims to lands, and for the disposal of the lands of the United States, lying north of the Iberville and the Lakes Maurepas and Pontchartrain, west of the river Perdido, and south of the Mississippi Territory; and that the said committee have leave to report by bill, or otherwise.

And, on the question that the House do agree to the said resolution, it was determined in the negative.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Governor of Ohio, communicating information of the ratification, by the Legislature of that State, of the amendment proposed by Congress at their last session, to the Constitution of the United States, respecting titles of nobility; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The bill from the Senate, entitled "An act making a further distribution of such laws of the United States as respect the public lands," was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole to whom is committed the bill of this House for the disposal of certain copies of a collection of the laws, treaties, and other documents relative to the public lands.

Mr. BASSETT reported resolutions recommending the printing, for the use of the members, the collection of Parliamentary precedents made by Mr. LAMBERT, and allowing him compensation therefor.—Referred to a Committee of the Whole.

The following engrossed bills were read a third time, and passed:

The bill authorizing the election of sheriffs in the Indiana Territory; the bill authorizing the discharge of Nathaniel F. Fosdick from imprisonment; the bill in addition to the act, entitled "An act supplementary to the act concerning Consuls and Vice-Consuls, and for the further protection of American seamen."

BANKS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The bill to incorporate the subscribers to the Farmers' Bank of Alexandria, was read the third time.

Mr. SMILIE asked for the yeas and nays on the passage; which were, for the bill, 70; against it, 36, as follows:

YEAS—Lemuel J. Alston, Willis Alston, jun., William T. Barry, Burwell Bassett, Abijah Bigelow, James Breckenridge, William Butler, Martin Chittenden, Matthew Clay, Richard Cutts, John Davenport, jun., John Dawson, William Ely, James Emott, John W. TUESDAY, February 12.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate insist on their amendment disagreed to by this House to the bill, entitled "An act to enable the people of the Territory of Orleans to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of such State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, and for other purposes." They have passed the bill from this House, providing for the removal of the land office established at Nashville, in the State of Tennessee, and Canton, in the State of Ohio, and to authorize the Register and Receiver of Public Moneys to superintend the public sales of land in the district east of Pearl river, with amendments. They have also passed a bill, entitled "An act in addition to an act, entitled 'An act to amend the Judicial System of the United States.'" To which amendments and bill they desire the concurrence of this House.

FEBRUARY, 1811.

The Supreme Court.

H. OF R.

A motion was made by Mr. LOVE, that the House do now proceed to consider a resolution submitted by him on the 19th ultimo; and the question being taken thereon, it was determined in the negative.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill for the relief of Peter Audrain. The Committee rose and reported the bill, which was ordered to a third reading.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill relative to the distribution of the laws, treaties, &c. The bill was reported with amendments, and ordered to a third reading.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill for establishing naval hospitals.

On the motion of Mr. BASSETT, the bill was amended in the first section, so as to appropriate $50,000 out of the Navy Fund alone, to the purposes of the bill. The bill was reported as amended, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

CORPS OF ENGINEERS.

The bill from the Senate, making further provision for the Corps of Engineers, was read.

[This bill goes to increase the corps, and leaves it discretionary with the President where to locate the academy.]

Mr. FISK moved a rejection of the bill. This motion was opposed by Mr. DESHA. At the suggestion of Mr. PITKIN, Mr. FISK gave way to a motion to refer the subject to a select committee. Mr. LOVE moved a reference to a Committee of the Whole. Mr. PORTER mentioned the committee on that part of the President's Message relative to the Military Academy. On these motions a debate arose. The bill was again read. Mr. LOVE's motion was lost—51 to 82—and the bill referred to the committee mentioned by Mr. PORTER.

THE SUPREME COURT.

The bill from the Senate, proposing to authorize the three Judges of the Supreme Court now present to hold a court, &c., was read.

Mr. RHEA, of Tennessee, said, the bill contained a principle which he never would agree to sanction. It will be found, if the law establishing the judicial courts be adverted to, that then, when there were only six justices or judges, four of them were necessary to constitute a quorum. This was a majority, indeed. This bill goes to authorize three Judges to hold the Supreme Court—a number less than a majority, inasmuch as there are now seven circuits in the United States, and of course there are or ought to be seven Judges. The bill contemplates an innovation which infringes the fundamental principle of majorities—a principle which never ought to be subverted, in relation to a Legislative or Judicial body. My objection to the bill is on principle—considerations foreign to that, affect me not. I therefore move that the bill be indefinitely postponed.

On this motion a discussion took place. Messrs. RHEA, QUINCY, SOUTHARD, BURWELL, GHOLSON, TROUP, and MONTGOMERY, were in favor of the postponement; and Messrs. GOLD, PITKIN, LOVE, BACON, WRIGHT, LIVERMORE, and PICKMAN, opposed it.

In support of the motion for indefinite postponement, it was urged that it was introducing a new and important principle, changing the highest tribunal of the United States; that it was a law to be passed on the spur of the occasion, (for, unless passed this day, it could have no effect,) which was always an objectionable mode of proceeding; that it would furnish an excuse to the Judges for not attending; that it was establishing a precedent which might be productive of serious evils; for they need never hereafter expect to see a full bench, if Congress, who were in session when the court ought to meet, could be prevailed upon to pass a bill to excuse their attendance; and that the bill would operate unjustly on the citizens of the District, who had never appealed from a bench of three Judges in the District to a bench of three Judges of the Supreme Court. Messrs. MONTGOMERY and TROUP expressed a want of confidence in the court. The latter said, that five of the members of the court had, as far as they could, given away eighty millions of the public property, (in the Yazoo case,) and he would not confide such powers to a smaller number of judges.

Against the motion for indefinite postponement, it was said that three of the Judges had been here several days, and no others were expected; that they might proceed to decide on cases arising within the District of Columbia, which were important and pressing, and from a postponement of a decision on which great injury would arise; that there were also some very important cases which would suffer from delay, and which the parties would consent to have determined by these three Judges; that no injury could arise from such cases in which the parties had the option of deferring a decision till another year; that the Judges who were present were gentlemen of the highest character, in whom unlimited confidence might be placed, &c.

The question on indefinite postponement was taken, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 89, nays 23, as follows:

WEDNESDAY, February 13.

Mr. Root, from the committee on that part of the President's Message respecting the militia reported "A bill more effectually to provide for arming and disciplining the militia of the United States."

The bill for the relief of Peter Audrain, the bill for establishing navy hospitals, and the bill, for disposing of certain copies of the laws, treaties, &c., relative to the public lands, were severally read a third time, and passed.

The bill from the Senate for the relief of Ebenezer Rollins, was twice read, and referred to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures.

The bill for the removal of the land offices from Nashville, Tennessee, and Canton, Ohio, and authorizing the Register and Receiver of Public Moneys to attend the sale of lands in the district east of Pearl river, was returned from the Senate, with amendments, which were in part agreed to.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill for establishing trading-houses with the Indian tribes; which was reported with amendments, and ordered to a third reading.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill directing the Secretary of State to cause to be made a general index to the laws of the United States, and to be printed and distributed. The bill authorizes 10,000 copies. The bill was reported, and ordered to a third reading.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill authorizing the sale and grant of a certain tract of public land to the Delaware and Chesapeake Canal Company.

Mr. FINDLEY spoke in favor of the bill, and Mr. MITCHELL against it; when the Committee rose and reported progress.

TERRITORY OF ORLEANS.

On motion of Mr. MACON, the House considered the amendment of the Senate to the bill enabling the people of Orleans to form a constitution and State government, &c., which had been objected to by this House, and to which the Senate adhered. The amendment—the insertion of the word "white"—confined the suffrage in the election of the convention to free "white" persons.

Mr. BASSETT moved that the House should recede from their determination to reject the amendment. Messrs. POINDEXTER, GHOLSON, MACON, SHEFFEY, and EPPES, were in favor of receding, and Messrs. SMILIE, DAWSON, FISK, and PICKMAN, opposed it.

The question was, on motion of Mr. PICKMAN, taken by yeas and nays—for receding 69, against it 45, as follows:

YAYS—Joseph Allen, Lemuel J. Alston, Willis Alston, jr., William Anderson, Burwell Bassett, William W. Sturges, Samuel Taggart, John Thompson, Uri Tracy, Laban Wheaton, and Robert Whitehill.

The bill from the Senate, entitled "An act making a further distribution of such laws of the United States as respect the public lands," was read the third time, as amended, and passed.

THURSDAY, February 14.

The bill more effectually to provide for arming and disciplining the militia of the United States, was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Saturday next.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the committee appointed on that part of the President's Message, at the commencement of the session, which relates to that part of West Florida acquired by the treaty of Louisiana, presented a bill for the establishment, government, and protection, of the Mobile Territory; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

Mr. ROOT, from the Committee of Claims, presented a bill for the relief of Lieutenant Simon Knight; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

On motion of Mr. GHOLSON,

Resolved, That the Committee on the Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making provision, by law, to enable the officers and soldiers of the Virginia line, (in the Revolutionary war,) on State establishment, their heirs, or assigns, to locate the warrants which they may hold for lands granted for military services, on lands within the limits of the territory reserved by the Commonwealth of Virginia for her Continental and State troops, according to the true intent and meaning of the fifth condition in the proposition of cession from Virginia to the United States, which fifth condition was acceded to by the United States; and that the said committee have leave to report by bill, or otherwise.

On motion of Mr. SEYBERT,

Ordered, That the memorial of the Philadelphia Chamber of Commerce, presented on the fourth of January, 1803, be referred to the Committee of the whole House on the bill to secure to vessels of the United States an equal advantage in exporting articles the growth or produce of the United States to foreign ports, and for other purposes.

Mr. SEYBERT, from the committee appointed on the eleventh instant, presented a bill making a further appropriation for the support of a library; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

Mr. EPPES, from the Committee of Ways and means, presented a bill providing for the more effectual accountability of persons intrusted with the expenditure of public moneys; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Saturday next.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting sundry documents relative to the execution of the act passed at the last session, "making an appropriation for the purpose of trying the practical use of the torpedo, or submarine explosion;" which were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The House resumed the consideration of the unfinished business of yesterday, and the question depending at the time of adjournment, to wit: "Shall the Committee of the whole House have leave to sit again on the bill from the Senate, entitled 'An act authorizing the sale and grant of a certain quantity of public land to the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal Company,'" was again stated, and the question being taken, was determined in the negative.

An engrossed bill authorizing the Secretary of State to cause a general index of the laws of the United States to be made, printed, and distributed, was read the third time, and passed.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill, entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of Government, during the year one thousand eight hundred and eleven," with amendments. They have also passed a bill, entitled "An act to establish the districts of Mumphreymagog, of Oswegatchie, and of the White Mountains;" to which amendments and bill they desire the concurrence of this House.

A motion was made by Mr. EPPES, that the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act authorizing the sale and grant of a certain quantity of public land to the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal Company," be recommitted to a Committee of the Whole House; and the question being taken, it was resolved in the affirmative.

Another motion was then made by Mr. EPPES, that the said bill be the order of the day for Saturday next; and the question being taken thereon, it was determined in the negative.

A motion was made by Mr. VAN DYKE, that it be the order for this day; and the question being taken, it was resolved in the affirmative.

The House then again went into a Committee of the Whole on the bill authorizing the sale and grant of a certain tract or parcel of public land to the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal Company.

Mr. EPPES moved to strike out the whole, and insert a clause providing for dividing between the several States, according to their population, a certain quantity of public lands, for the purposes of internal improvement.

Messrs. WRIGHT, KEY, ROSS, and VAN DYKE, opposed the striking out, and Messrs. EPPES, BOYD, McKIM, HOLLAND, and SOUTHARD, supported it.

The Committee rose, reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again.

FRIDAY, February 15.

Mr. NEWTON, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, presented a bill to annex a part of the State of New Jersey to the collection district of New York; to remove the office of collector of Niagara to Lewistown; to establish a new district, to be called the district of St. Lawrence; to make Cape St. Vincents, in the district of Sackett's Harbor, a port of delivery; and, out of the districts of Miami and Mississippi, to make two new districts, to be called the districts of Sandusky and Teche, and for other purposes; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

On motion of Mr. LIVERMORE, the memorial of sundry citizens of Newburyport, in Massachusetts, presented the twenty-eighth of January, was referred to the Committee of the whole House on the bill to secure to American vessels an equal advantage in exporting articles, the growth of the United States, to foreign ports.

Mr. MORROW, from the Committee on the Public Lands, made a report, in part, on the report of the Land Commissioners for the district of Kaskaskia, referred to them on the second ultimo; which was read, and referred to the Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

Mr. P. B. PORTER, from the Committee to whom was referred the bill from the Senate, making further provision for the Corps of Engineers, reported it with amendments. Among others, the power of locating an academy is proposed to be taken from the President of the United States, and the academy fixed at Staten Island; the appropriation for buildings is raised from twenty-five to forty thousand dollars.

The amendments were read and referred to the Committee of the Whole.

REVISION OF PATENT LAWS.

Mr. BACON presented a petition of the Massachusetts Association for the encouragement of useful inventions, signed by Benjamin Dearborn, their President, praying a revision and amendment of the laws of the United States now in operation respecting patents for discoveries and inventions.—Referred to the Committee of the Whole on the bill for the encouragement of learning and the promotion of useful arts.

The memorial is as follows:

That, from long experience, they have found that the present patent laws are inadequate to the object proposed by them; that the penalties therein are not sufficient to protect the meritorious inventor from the avarice and rapacity of unprincipled men, who, in defiance of justice, openly invade the patents of their fellow-citizens with a confidence of impunity, from the impossibility of proving, by legal evidence, what damage the injured party has sustained.

That this law, intended to promote and protect improvements in the arts, is illusive; that, under its supposed protection, men of genius have been induced to devote the best portion of their lives and fortunes in making improvements in various machines, by which some branches of manufacture have even rivalled all other nations; and that, to his great vexation and disappointment, the ingenious artisan discovers that his is the only property in the United States which is not protected by the laws.

That there are persons associated and combined for the purpose of clandestinely procuring machines in magnitude, models, drawings, and specifications, of the most useful American inventions, and transmitting them to Europe, and there obtaining patents for the same, without the concurrence, or even the knowledge of the American patentee. The easy access to the patent department facilitates their views in this nefarious traffic.

That many valuable American discoveries have thus been pirated, sent to Europe, and there patented and published as European inventions, to the manifest injury of the true inventor, and derogatory to the honor and interest of the United States.

That property, to an immense amount, is already vested in patented machinery, and employed in various manufactures; but the unprotected state of the rights of patentees, and proprietors, will naturally and necessarily deter men of genius and property from further perseverance in improvements unless they are permitted to enjoy the fruits of their labors.

In stating the preceding facts, your memorialists have adverted to but two of the many inconveniences arising from the want of due provisions in the present laws; and they do most earnestly entreat that such remedies may be adopted as shall appear consistent with the true policy of a nation whose Government is actuated by just principles of honor, interest, and dignity. With these views, they beg leave to suggest the following observations as the basis of amendments to the present laws, calculated to remove some of the difficulties which experience has evinced as obstructing the beneficial design of the patent laws, viz:

1st. That any person who shall violate a patent by making, using, vending, or unlawfully having and keeping in his possession the thing or machine, or any part thereof so patented, shall, as well as his aiders and abettors, forfeit each and every one of them all such things, machine, or parts thereof, and three times the actual damage sustained by the injured party, which triple damage shall in no case be less than three times the value or price of the thing, machine, or part thereof, at which the injured party has sold, or offered for sale, or has licensed the same, or offered to license the same for use; to be recovered by action of the case in the circuit court in the district where the offence is committed.

2d. That, during the patent term, all persons, except the patentee or his assigns, be prohibited, under the same penalties and forfeitures as aforesaid, from exporting out of the country any machine, or thing, or parts thereof, or model or models thereof, or of any parts thereof, or of any drawings thereof, or of any part thereof which have been patented, without permission first had and obtained in writing from the patentee or his assigns, in case such assigns shall have obtained in such assignment the right of exporting the same out of the country.

3d. That no copies of specifications, drawings, or other papers, filed as evidences of an invention, or copies of models, or any part thereof deposited in the Patent Office, be allowed to be taken from said office, during the term of the patent, except by the patentee, his heirs or assigns, unless such copies be material to an issue in a court of law; and in such case the party, other than the patentee or his assigns, applying for the same, shall make oath before the judge of the said court, that such copies are material to such issue, and that he requires them for that purpose only; and the said judge shall record such oath, and certify the same in the application for such copies; and that all models, specimens, drawings, specifications, and other papers filed in said office, as evidence of an invention or improvement of any machine or thing patented, be kept from the view and inspection of the public until the patent or patents granted therefor shall have expired.

4th. That, on application being made for a patent, a critical examination shall be made to ascertain whether any patent has been previously granted for any machine or thing which would interfere with the machine or thing, for which a patent is prayed for, and whether the interference is material, and whether the application of parts, principles, and powers, are alike in a patentable point of view, in order that a patent may not be granted for a machine or thing already patented, or which essentially or materially interferes with it.

5th. That, on application being made for information whether a patent has been granted for the machine, thing, or improvement, which the applicant describes in his application as being his invention, and which he intends to have patented, provided it does not interfere with any machine or thing already patented, a critical examination shall be had, and a true answer given to such applicant, and for which he shall pay the sum of (say five dollars.) And the description, specification, and drawings filed by the applicant for such information, shall be signed and sealed by him in the presence of two subscribing witnesses; and he shall also make oath to the same in the same manner as is provided in the case of applying for a patent.

6th. That the person applying for information as aforesaid, or any other person, who shall produce a specification and drawings of his invention and improvement, duly witnessed and certified, as is provided in case of application for a patent, and signifying his desire of obtaining a patent therefor, and that further time is necessary to enable him to perfect his said invention or improvement; such specifications and drawings, with written references thereto, may be filed in the Patent Office, as evidences that such person is the first inventor or discoverer thereof, in case, on such critical examination as aforesaid, that should be found to be the fact; and the same shall operate as a caveat against the other applicants for that machine, thing, or improvement, as the case may be, for one year from the time of filing the same; and a certificate to that effect shall be granted accordingly, and for which he shall pay the sum of (say ten dollars.) And when the person filing such caveat shall make application for his patent, he shall furnish a new specification and drawing, comprising all the improvements made in his said invention or discovery.

7th. That the most improved European or other treatises and publications on the improvement in the arts, sciences, and manufactures, shall, from time to time, as they are published, be procured, and kept in the patent department, in order that ready information may be had whether the thing, machine, improvement, or discovery, for which a patent may be applied for, has been previously known and published in this or any other country.

8th. That any patentee, or his assigns, or any person or persons being legally interested therein, knowing, or having good reason to suspect, any person or persons to be secretly violating their patent, by making, using, or having unlawfully in their possession the thing, machine, or any parts thereof so patented, may, on oath, made before the judge of the district court in the district where such offence is committed, and filing a statement thereof, obtain a writ of injunction commanding such suspected person or persons, their aiders and abettors, to desist from such violation; which writ of injunction shall be served on such suspected person or persons, their aiders and abettors, to appear before said judge at the time and place appointed; and in case of their default or non-appearance, the said judge shall forthwith order a capias against them, to be served and returned at such time and place as he shall direct; and if, in either case, on examination, the judge shall find that the complaint is well founded, he shall make the writ of injunction absolute, and order such violators to pay the costs, and give bond in an adequate sum, with sufficient securities to the party injured, to be forfeited, and the penalties therein recovered in a court of law, in case such injunction shall not be obeyed by the parties jointly and severally on whom such injunction is laid; but if such complaint should prove not well founded, the judge may order the complainants to pay the costs, unless it should appear that there was reasonable ground therefor; and, in such case, shall decide as to justice rightly appertains.

9th. That, if the thing or machine patented shall not be put into operation, or publicly offered for sale within five years from the date of the patent, the said patent shall, on the expiration of said five years, in such case be, ipso facto, null and void, and the thing thus patented become the property of the public.

10th. That the specific application of the specific parts, principles, and machine powers to the specific purpose fully explained, be in law considered as constituting the invention only; and that mere principles, mechanic powers, circumstances or effects in themselves, cannot be the subject of a patent.

11th. That patents for any useful inventions or discoveries may be renewed, for another term of fourteen years, on application being made for that purpose, containing all the improvements made by the patentee, his heirs and assigns, properly described; which application shall be made to the Secretary of State in the same manner as an original application for a patent, mutatis mutandis. And of the great utility of such invention, and of the intention of renewing the patent therefor, the patentee, his heirs or assigns, as the case may be, shall give notice to the Secretary of State — months before the expiration of the first patent, and to his approbation; and, on obtaining such second patent, the patentee shall give the public notice thereof in some public newspaper or newspapers.

12th. That the patentee may assign parts of his patent, and thereby granting the exclusive right of said patent for any particular district of country.

13th. That, for repealing any patent or patents surreptitiously obtained, or upon false suggestion, the process to be brought within three years, and the hearing had before the judges of the circuit court in the district where the patentee or his assigns reside, and not before the district court.

14th. That when an original inventor, his heirs or assigns, shall make any modification or improvement in the thing or machine patented during the first patent term, he or they, as the case may be, may file a specification and drawings thereof, showing the application of such improvement or modification on the original invention; which specification shall be executed, witnessed, sworn to, and certified in the same manner as in an original application for a patent; and, on his obtaining a certificate therefor from the Secretary of State, setting forth that such improvement or modification as specified, shall thereafter be considered as patented, and belonging to and forming a part of, the said original patent, so far as it respects the improvement or modification, to the person legally obtaining such certificate, and having a legal interest at the time in the original invention; and for every such certificate, the party obtaining the same, shall pay the sum of (say fifteen dollars,) and as, &c.

THE MILITIA.

Mr. COCHRAN submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of providing, by law, for detaching by quotas militia, to be armed by the United States, to be held in readiness for service for a limited time, and that the committee have leave to report by bill or otherwise.

H. OF R.

Claim of General St. Clair.

FEBRUARY, 1811.

Mr. PITKIN wished to learn the motive of introducing this resolution.

Mr. COCHRAN said it was grounded on the recommendation of the President of the United States at the last session, and a reference to it in his Message of this year. He thought, also, that it was not proper to wait for the approach of war before we attempt to prepare for it.

Messrs. PITKIN, QUINCY, POTTER, and EPPES, were opposed to the resolution; and Messrs. COCHRAN, ROOT, BASSETT, and BACON, in favor of it.

Against the resolution, it was said that the adoption of such an one in the present circumstances of the country would excite uneasiness in the nation; that, taken in connexion with the sitting with closed doors, it would excite alarm and an apprehension of some latent evil; that the gradual arming the nation was already provided for by law—and it had already been ascertained by experience that no mode of arming the whole body of the militia of the United States could ever receive the concurrence of a majority of the members of the House.

In the support of it, its friends observed that it was a mere resolution of inquiry, from which no ill effects could result; that it fixed no details, leaving them altogether to the consideration of a committee, who would report a bill to the House if they thought proper; that the present deficiency of arms called loudly for such a measure, so necessary to the general defence.

Mr. BACON wished it adopted, on account of recent reports from the Floridas, of the standard of opposition having advanced against the American forces; and

On motion of Mr. POTTER, it was ordered to lie on the table.

GENERAL ST. CLAIR'S CLAIM.

On motion of Mr. QUINCY, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill for the relief of Arthur St. Clair.

Messrs. QUINCY, CLAY, FINDLEY, MOSELEY, WRIGHT, and LYON, were in favor of the bill, and Messrs. STANFORD, ROOT, W. ALSTON, and MONTGOMERY, were against it.

The Committee rose and reported the bill.

Mr. ROOT moved to strike out the whole section of which the bill was composed. For striking out 37, against it 51, as follows:

W. Eppes, William Findley, Thomas R. Gold, Edwin Gray, William Hale, Daniel Heister, Ebenezer Huntington, Robert Jenkins, Philip B. Key, Herman Knickerbacker, Joseph Lewis, jr., Robert Le Roy Livingston, John Love, Matthew Lyon, Vincent Matthews, William McKinley, Pleasant M. Miller, William Milnor, Thomas Moore, Jeremiah Morrow, Jonathan O. Moseley, Thomas Newbold, Thomas Newton, John Nicholson, Benjamin Pickman, jr., Elisha R. Potter, Josiah Quincy, Dennis Smelt, George Smith, Samuel Smith, James Stephenson, Lewis B. Sturges, Samuel Taggart, Nicholas Van Dyke, Killian K. Van Rensselaer, Laban Wheaton, Ezekiel Whitman, Richard Winn, Robert Witherspoon, and Robert Wright.

The bill was then ordered to a third reading.

On motion of Mr. NEWTON, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill for issuing debentures in certain cases. For want of a quorum, the Committee rose, and the House adjourned.

SATURDAY, February 16.

The bill for the relief of Arthur St. Clair was read a third time.

Mr. ROOT moved to recommit the bill to a Committee of the Whole, in order to strike out the words of the bill and insert a section directing an inquiry into, and settlement of any unliquidated accounts of General St. Clair. Messrs. WRIGHT, CLAY, and GHOLSON, opposed the motion, and Messrs. ROOT, HOLLAND, and ALSTON, advocated the motion.

The motion was carried—43 to 42.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, Mr. BASSETT in the Chair, on the amendments of the Senate to the bill making appropriations for the support of Government for the year 1811; which were concurred in by the Committee and the House.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill, entitled 'An act to enable the Georgetown Potomac Bridge Company to levy money for the object of its incorporation; to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

Ordered, That the amendments made by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of Government, during the year 1811," be committed to a Committee of the whole House this day.

The bill from the Senate, entitled "An act to establish the districts of Mumphyre magog, Oswegatchie, and of the White Mountains," was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

The bill from the Senate, entitled "An act to enable the Georgetown Potomac Bridge Company to levy money for the object of its incorporation," was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

A Message was received from the President of the United States, transmitting the treaty concluded on the tenth of November, on the part of the United States, with the Great and Little Osage tribes of Indians, with a view to such legal provisions as may be deemed proper for fulfilling its stipulations.—The Message was read, and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

On motion of Mr. LEWIS, the Committee of the whole House were discharged from the consideration of the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act to enable the Georgetown Potomac Bridge Company to levy money for the object of its incorporation."

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the report of a select committee of the eleventh instant, on a letter from William Lambert, respecting precedents of order; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported their agreement to the resolutions therein contained, amended to read as follows:

Resolved, That there be printed, for the use of Congress, five hundred copies of William Lambert's collection of precedents of order, contained in two numbers, under the heads of—1. Proceedings on questions of order and appeal; 2. Disagreeing votes of the two Houses on bills, &c. Omitting all editorial remarks and strictures, and adding the cases of order occurring this session. The printing to be paid out of the contingent fund of this House.

Resolved, That the work, when finished, be deposited in the Library, and that each member of Congress, whilst it is in session, be entitled to a copy, giving a receipt, and returning the book at the end of the session.

Resolved, That William Lambert, for making this collection, paging the references, superintending the printing, and preparing the index, ought to be paid five hundred dollars out of the contingent fund; and that the Clerk be authorized to pay him in advance for such portion of the work as is completed.

The House proceeded to consider the resolutions, and the same being again read, were concurred in by the House.

REPEAL OF DRAWBACK.

Mr. GARLAND submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That it is expedient to repeal the several laws allowing drawback on goods, wares, and merchandise, of the growth, produce, or manufacture of foreign nations.

A motion was made by Mr. GARLAND, to refer it to a Committee of the Whole.

Messrs. QUINCY, WRIGHT, MITCHILL, and NEWTON, were opposed to reference and to the resolution. Messrs. GARLAND and SMILIE spoke in favor of it.

It was contended by its opponents that the adoption of this resolution, and a subsequent destruction of the drawback system, would operate greatly to the injury of the agricultural as well as commercial interests of the country.

By the advocates of the resolution, it was said, that this system of drawbacks was a tax upon the nation, merely to favor extraneous commerce; that it was not calculated in any wise to benefit the agricultural interests of our country; that instead of adding anything to the support of the expenses connected with foreign commerce, it scarcely paid the expenses of the custom-houses.

The question to refer the motion was carried—ayes 64.

A motion was made by Mr. WRIGHT, to make it the order of the day for the third of March—lost, ayes 51, noes 53.

A motion was made by Mr. GARDENIER, to make it the order of the day for the 25th of February, and the ayes and noes called.

Mr. MACON thought, when a majority of the House had evinced a determination to consider a subject, that these motions for evading the question were improper; and Mr. CHEVES, Mr. WRIGHT, and Mr. HOLLAND, spoke in favor of Mr. GARDENIER's motion.

Mr. HUNTINGTON moved the second of March as the day for which the subject should be made the order.

Mr. QUINCY, Mr. CHEVES, and Mr. GARDENIER, supported the motion. Mr. BURWELL was in favor of an earlier day.

The question of postponement to the second of March, was decided by yeas and nays, as follows:

Mr. MILLER said, that in submitting the following resolution, it was far from his intention to express a want of confidence in the Administration. He said that the arrival of the French Minister in this country was so recent, that it would perhaps hardly be decorous in the President to ask him for information respecting the Berlin and Milan decrees. He therefore would submit a resolution, which went to ask information from the President, and would afford him an excuse for demanding this information from the French Minister. He had another view in submitting this resolution. Should no satisfactory information be received, he then intended to move the repeal of the non-intercourse laws. He then submitted the following resolution, which was agreed to:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to lay before this House any information, (not heretofore communicated, and that, in his opinion, is proper to be disclosed,) which he may have, touching the legal repeal, or modification, as well as the practical operation, of the orders and decrees affecting our neutral commerce, since the first day of November, 1810.

Mr. MILLER and Mr. SAWYER were appointed a committee to present the foregoing resolution to the President.

Mr. P. B. PORTER presented a memorial of William Morrison, John Edgar, and Robert Morrison, of Kaskaskia, in the Illinois Territory, by John Rice Jones, their attorney in fact, complaining of the "illegal and oppressive" decisions of the Land Commissioners for the District of Kaskaskia, and praying that the said commissioners may be removed from office, and that others may be appointed to supply their places, with power to revise the decisions of the commissioners aforesaid.—Referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. NEWTON, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, made a favorable report on the petition of John Macnamara, referred the sixth instant; which was read, and concurred in by the House: when, Mr. NEWTON, from the same committee, presented a bill for the relief of John Macnamara; which was read twice, and ordered to be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

The House proceeded to consider the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act to enable the Georgetown Potomac Bridge Company to levy money for the object of its incorporation:" Whereupon, the bill was read the third time, and passed.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill for issuing debentures in certain cases. This bill was reported, unamended, and passed to a third reading.

The House went into a Committee of the Whole on the bill for erecting a light-house on Boone Island, placing buoys near Cape Fear river, North Carolina, and at Edgartown, Massachusetts, and erecting a column on Cape Elizabeth, Massachusetts. This bill was reported with amendments, which were concurred in, and the bill ordered to a third reading.

NATIONAL UNIVERSITY.

Mr. MITCHELL, from the committee appointed on that part of the President's Message, at the commencement of the session, which relates to the establishment of a seminary of learning by the National Legislature, made a report; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The report is as follows:

In obedience to the order of the House, the committee has duly considered the important matter referred.

A university, or institution for the communication of knowledge in the various departments of literature and science, presents to the mind, at one view, subjects of the most pleasing contemplation.

To a free people it would seem that a seminary, in which the culture of the heart and of the understanding should be the chief objects, would be one of the best guards of their privileges, and a leading object of their care.

Under this conviction, the patriotic spirit of Washington led him more than once to recommend, in his speeches to Congress, an attention to such an undertaking. He even bequeathed a legacy to the national university, which he persuaded himself would, at some day, be brought into being. Two other Presidents have subsequently presented the subject to the Legislature as worthy of especial consideration.

Authorities so respectable, in favor of a project so desirable, carry with them great weight. A central school at the seat of the General Government, darting the rays of intellectual light, or rolling the flood of useful information throughout the land, could not fail to make a strong impression. A noble and enlarged institution may be conceived to impart to its pupils the most excellent instruction, and, by properly qualifying persons to be teachers and professors, to introduce a uniform system of education among the citizens.

On weighing these and other advantages, it was necessary to consider whether Congress possessed the power to found and endow a national university.

It is argued, from the total silence of the Constitution, that such a power has not been granted to Congress, inasmuch as the only means by which it is therein contemplated to promote the progress of science and the useful arts, is, by securing to authors and inventors the exclusive right to their respective writings and discoveries for limited times. The Constitution, therefore, does not warrant the creation of such a corporation by any express provision.

But it immediately occurred that, under the right to legislate exclusively over the district wherein the United States have fixed their seat of Government, Congress may erect a university at any place within the ten miles square ceded by Maryland and Virginia. This cannot be doubted.

Here, however, other considerations arise. Although there is no Constitutional impediment to the incorporation of trustees for such a purpose, at the City of Washington, serious doubts are entertained as to the right to appropriate the public property for its support. The endowment of a university is not ranked among the objects for which drafts ought to be made upon the Treasury. The money of the nation seems to be reserved for other uses.

FEBRUARY, 1811.

Claim of Lieutenant Knight—Call for Letters.

H. OF R.

The incorporation of a university, without funds, appears a fruitless and inefficient exercise of the legislative power. There is, indeed, some personal estate on hand, which would vest in such a body on the moment of its creation; and more may reasonably be expected from legacies and other donations. But these sources of revenue are too scanty and precarious to be relied upon in the present case. It is better not to legislate at all, than to pass a statute destitute of the means of execution.

The matter then stands thus: The erection of a university, upon the enlarged and magnificent plan which would become the nation, is not within the powers confided by the Constitution to Congress; and the erection of a small and ordinary college, with a pompous and imposing title, would not become its dignity. If, nevertheless, at any time legislative aid should be asked to incorporate a district university, for the local benefit of the inhabitants of Columbia, and of funds of their own raising, there can be no doubt that it would be considered with kindness, as in other cases; but it must be remembered that this is a function totally distinct from the endowment of a national university, out of the treasure of the United States, destined, in its legitimate application, to other and very different purposes.

The message before the committee proposes, however, "the institution of a seminary of learning by the National Legislature, within the limits of their exclusive jurisdiction, the expense of which may be defrayed or reimbursed out of the vacant grounds which have accrued to the nation within these limits." On inquiring into the value of these public lots, they fall so far short of the sum requisite for the object, that, if there was no Constitutional impediment, they could not be relied upon, on account of the smallness and unproductiveness of the capital they embrace.

With these views of the subject, the Committee does not find itself authorized to recommend the adoption of any measures relative to that part of the Message referred.

CLAIM OF LIEUTENANT KNIGHT.

The House went into a Committee of the Whole on the bill for the relief of Lieutenant Simeon Knight. This bill authorizes the allowance to Lieutenant Knight of the sum of one thousand four hundred and fifty dollars and forty cents, which were paid by him (as paymaster) to General Wilkinson as an allowance for extra rations, while commander of a separate post. This act had not been passed by the accounting officers at the Treasury Department, although the money was paid under the sanction of the Attorney General's opinion and the late Secretary of War.

Mr. POINDEXTER moved an amendment to prevent this law being introduced as an authority for the commanders in chief to claim extra rations in future.

Messrs. GOLDSBOROUGH, STANLEY, PEARSON, and MACON, were opposed to the principle of the bill and the amendment, though in favor of the equity of the petitioner's claim.

Messrs. POINDEXTER, ROOT, BACON, WRIGHT, and HOLLAND, spoke in favor of the bill.

The question on Mr. POINDEXTER's amendment was lost—yeas 25.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH moved an amendment so as to make the word "erroneously" follow the appropriation, applying that term to the payment of the money by Lieutenant Knight to General Wilkinson.

Messrs. MCKIM, BACON, ROOT, and WRIGHT, opposed this amendment; and Messrs. GOLDSBOROUGH and STANLEY advocated it. The motion was negatived.

Mr. STANLEY then moved to amend the bill so as to direct the Comptroller to commence a suit against General Wilkinson for the amount of money received by him from Lieutenant Knight.

Messrs. ROOT and WRIGHT opposed the motion; and Messrs. STANLEY and LYON were in favor of it.—Negatived, yeas 27, nays 58.

The Committee rose and reported the bill without amendment; which report was concurred in, and the bill ordered to a third reading.

TUESDAY, February 19.

A motion was made by Mr. LOVE that the House do come to the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire whether any, and, if any, what, parts of the act of Congress, passed the twenty-fifth of February, 1791, entitled "An act to incorporate the subscribers to the Bank of the United States," will continue to be in force after the third day of March next, in case the charter of that bank company is not renewed; and, in that event, what remedy it may be necessary to provide for the creditors of the said bank; and that the committee have leave to report by bill, or otherwise.

And the question being taken that the House do now proceed to the consideration thereof, it was determined in the negative—yeas 30, nays 41.

A Message was received from the President of the United States, transmitting a return of the militia of the United States, as received by the Department of War from the several States and Territories.—Ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. NEWTON, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, reported unfavorably on the petition of William Patterson and sons, merchants of Baltimore. They pray to be allowed to re-enter the custom-house duties on a large quantity of coffee and sugar imported in 1807, previous to the existence of the embargo.

Mr. MCKIM moved that the resolution of the committee be negatived.

On this subject a discussion arose, in which Messrs. MCKIM, WRIGHT, BURWELL, and VAN DYKE, advocated the rejection of the report, and Messrs. NEWTON and QUINCY opposed it.

The report was concurred in.

A Message was received from the President of the United States in conformity to the resolution of yesterday; it was accompanied by sundry documents, of which three thousand copies were ordered to be printed.

CALL FOR LETTERS.

Mr. PITKIN observed, that several translations had been presented to the public eye of the French letters from the Duc de Massa and the Duc de Gaete, concerning the Berlin and Milan decrees, varying in several important passages. He was desirous of seeing the originals, that, among such different interpretations, the House might decide for itself; and therefore moved that the House do come to the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be laid before this House, copies, in French, of the letters of the Duke de Cadore to General Armstrong, of the 5th of August, of the 7th and 12th of September, Anno Domini, 1810, also, like copies of the letters of the Grand Judge to the President of the Council of Prizes, and of the Minister of Finance to the Director General of the customs, both dated December twenty-fifth, 1810, concerning the Berlin and Milan decrees.

This resolution was opposed by Messrs. RHEA of Tennessee, SMITH, and MILLER, and advocated by Messrs. PITKIN, LYON, and GOLDSBOROUGH.

The question was decided by yeas and nays—for the call 44, against it 67, as follows:

YEAS—Abijah Bigelow, Daniel Blaisdell, James Breckenridge, John C. Chamberlain, William Chamberlin, Epaphroditus Champion, Martin Chittenden, John Davenport, jr., William Ely, James Emott, Chas. Goldsborough, Thomas R. Gold, William Halo, Nathaniel A. Haven, Jonathan H. WEDNESDAY, February 20.

On motion of Mr. BACON,

Resolved, That the several witnesses summoned by the committee appointed to inquire into the conduct of Brigadier General James Wilkinson, and by the committee appointed to inquire into the cause or causes of the great mortality in that detachment of the Army ordered for the defence of New Orleans, shall be allowed for every day's attendance on said committees the sum of three dollars, and also at the rate of twelve and a half cents for every mile they shall necessarily travel in coming to the City of Washington, and in returning to their usual place of residence; and that the messengers employed to summon any of the said witnesses, or to execute warrants from said committees, be allowed and paid the same rate of mileage, and three dollars for each day's necessary detention out of the City of Washington, in addition to the time when they were engaged in performing the aforesaid travel; and the sums so allowed shall be paid by the Clerk out of the contingent fund of this House, on orders or certificates drawn in favor of such messengers or witnesses, by the chairmen of the respective committees aforesaid: Provided, That no witness who was in the City of Washington at the time of being summoned, shall be entitled to receive any allowance for mileage.

Mr. DAWSON, from the committee appointed on that part of the President's Message, at the commencement of the session, which relates to the fortifications and land forces of the United States, reported, in part, a bill authorizing the President of the United States to accept the service of a number of volunteer companies, not exceeding fifty thousand men; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Saturday next.

The bill to erect a light-house on Boone Island, Maine, placing buoys near Cape Fear, North Carolina, and near Edgartown, Massachusetts erecting a beacon on New Inlet, North Carolina, and erecting a column of stone on Cape Elizabeth, Massachusetts, was read a third time and passed.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act making further provision for the disposal of the sections of land heretofore reserved for the future disposition of Congress;" to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

CLAIM OF LIEUT. KNIGHT.

The House proceeded to consider the bill for the relief of Lieutenant Simeon Knight; when a motion was made by Mr. PITKIN, and seconded, to amend the same, by adding to the end thereof the following:

"Provided, however, That nothing in this act contained is intended, or shall be construed, to admit or sanction the right or claim of the said Brigadier General James Wilkinson, to an allowance for extra rations, in any case whatever, or in any way to exempt him from being accountable to the United States for the said sum of one thousand four hundred and fifty-four dollars and forty cents, paid to him by the said Simeon Knight, as aforesaid."

A debate took place on this motion. The motion was opposed by Messrs. ROOT, WRIGHT, RHEA of Tennessee, and NEWTON, and supported by Messrs. PITKIN, PICKMAN, TALLMADGE, LYON, POINDEXTER, MILNOR, and STANLEY. As on a

DEBENTURES.

The bill for issuing debentures in certain cases was read a third time.

Mr. HOLLAND moved an indefinite postponement of the bill.

Mr. BACON was in part opposed to the bill, and said he should therefore move a recommitment of the bill if the motion of Mr. HOLLAND did not succeed. Mr. RHEA, of Tennessee was opposed to the bill. Messrs. MUMFORD and NEWTON spoke in favor of it.

From want of a quorum (many of the members attending the interesting debate progressing in the Senate) the House adjourned, 38 to 28.

THURSDAY, February 21.

The bill from the Senate, entitled "An act making further provisions for the disposal of the sections of land heretofore reserved for the future disposition of Congress," was read twice, and committed to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. LYON presented a petition of sundry inhabitants of the Illinois Territory, praying that the pre-emption right to certain lands may be granted to them, together with an in and an out lot of the town of Shawney, in said Territory.—Referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. EPPES, from the Committee of Ways and Means, presented a bill making appropriations for carrying into effect a treaty between the United States and the Great and Little Osage nations of Indians, concluded at Fort Clark, on the tenth day of November; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Saturday next.

Mr. EPPES, from the same committee, also presented a bill repealing the tenth section of the "Act to incorporate the subscribers to the Bank of the United States;" which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Saturday next.

Mr. EPPES, from the same committee, also presented a bill allowing additional compensation to the Postmaster General; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Saturday next.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a report of the Secretary of the Treasury, in pursuance of the resolutions of this House, of the twenty-fourth and twenty-seventh of December last, concerning certain bills of exchange drawn on Degen, Purviance, and Company, Navy Agents at Leghorn; which was read, and, together with a report on the same, made at the present session of Congress, by the Secretary of the Navy, referred to a select committee.

Mr. SWOOPE, Mr. MCKIM, Mr. TURNER, Mr. CHITTENDEN, and Mr. SMILIE, were appointed the said committee.

RETURNED BILL.

A Message was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. Edward Coles, his Secretary, who, by command of the President, returned to the House the bill passed by the two Houses, entitled "An act incorporating the Protestant Episcopal Church in the town of Alexandria, in the District of Columbia," and presented to the President for his approbation and signature, on Thursday the fourteenth instant, to which bill the President having made objections, the same were also delivered in, by the said Secretary, who then withdrew.

The objections were read, and ordered to be entered at large on the Journal, as follows:

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

Having examined and considered the bill, entitled "An act incorporating the Protestant Episcopal Church in the town of Alexandria, in the District of Columbia," I now return the bill to the House of Representatives, in which it originated, with the following objections:

Because the bill exceeds the rightful authority to which Governments are limited, by the essential distinction between civil and religious functions, and violates, in particular, the article of the Constitution of the United States, which declares, that "Congress shall make no law respecting a religious establishment." The bill enacts into, and establishes by law, sundry rules and proceedings relative purely to the organization and polity of the church incorporated, and comprehending even the election and removal of the Minister of the same; so that no change could be made therein by the particular society, or by the general church of which it is a member, and whose authority it recognises. This particular church, therefore, would so far be a religious establishment by law; a legal force and sanction being given to certain articles in its constitution and administration. Nor can it be considered, that the articles thus established are to be taken as the descriptive criteria only of the corporate identity of the society, inasmuch as this identity must depend on other characteristics; as the regulations established are generally unessential, and alterable according to the principles and canons, by which churches of that denomination govern themselves; and as the injunctions and prohibitions contained in the regulations, would be enforced by the penal consequences applicable to a violation of them according to the local law:

Because the bill vests in the said incorporated church an authority to provide for the support of the poor, and the education of poor children of the same; an authority which being altogether superfluous, if the provision is to be the result of pious charity, would be a precedent for giving to religious societies, as such, a legal agency in carrying into effect a public and civil duty.

JAMES MADISON.

FEBRUARY 21, 1811.

Mr. BASSETT suggested the reference of the Message to a select committee.

The SPEAKER conceived that the article on the Constitution on this subject required that the House should proceed to a reconsideration of the bill.

On motion of Mr. PITKIN, the House proceeded to reconsider the bill.

The Message was again read, as also was the following clause of the Constitution:

"Every bill which shall have passed the House of Representatives and the Senate, shall, before it becomes a law, be presented to the President of the United States; if he approve, he shall sign it; but if not, he shall return it, with his objections, to that House in which it shall have originated, who shall enter the objections at large on their Journal, and proceed to reconsider it. If, after such reconsideration, two-thirds of that House shall agree to pass the bill, it shall be sent, together with the objections, to the other House, by which it shall likewise be reconsidered, and, if approved by two-thirds of that House, it shall become a law."

Mr. RANDOLPH asked whether a motion for indefinite postponement would, in the opinion of the Speaker, lie in this case?

The SPEAKER believed not.

The following article of the Constitution was then read by request:

"Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances."

Mr. BASSETT said, though the Constitution had prescribed a reconsideration of the bill when returned, the mode of reconsideration was not prescribed; and it might as well be by reference to a select committee as in any other mode. The bill might, perhaps, be amended. Of their power to amend it in its present stage, however, he was not certain.

Mr. SMILIE conceived the Constitution temporarily to require an immediate decision.

Mr. PITKIN said, that this question was new to him. He had no idea that the Constitution precluded Congress from passing laws to incorporate religious societies for the purpose of enabling them to hold property, &c. He had always held the Constitution to intend to prevent the establishment of a National Church, such as the Church of England—a refusal to subscribe to the tenets of which was to exclude a citizen from office, &c. Desiring time for reflection, he therefore wished the bill to lie on the table for further consideration.

Mr. PICKMAN said, it appeared to him that the bill was not an important one, a refusal to pass which would be productive of any serious injury; and yet, that a full discussion of the principles it involved would occupy the whole of the remainder of the session. If two-thirds of the House were to refuse to proceed to a reconsideration, the bill would be ipso facto at an end; and this he thought would be the best course, &c., considering all the circumstances.

Mr. WHEATON said he differed widely from his colleague (Mr. PICKMAN) as to the importance of the bill now under consideration. He did not imagine that they were to assume the objections of the President to be valid, and of course to dismiss the bill. They had a duty to perform as well as the President. He had performed his duty in the case presented for consideration. And would gentlemen assume it as a correct position because the bill was objected to by the President that the House ought not to act understandingly? This was not a correct principle. In his view the objections made by the President to this bill were altogether futile. Mr. W. said he did not consider this bill any infringement of the Constitution. If it was, both branches of the Legislature, since the commencement of the Government, had been guilty of such infringement. It could not be said, indeed, that they had been guilty of doing much about religion; but they had at every session appointed Chaplains, to be of different denominations, to interchange weekly between the two Houses. Now, if a bill for regulating the funds of a religious society could be an infringement of the Constitution, the two Houses had so far infringed it by electing, paying or contracting with their Chaplains; for so far it established two different denominations of religion. Mr. W. deemed this question of very great consequence. Were the people of this District never to have any religion? Was it to be entirely excluded from these ten miles square?

FEBRUARY, 1811.

Culture of Hemp.

H. OF R.

He should be afraid to come if that were to be the case. The want of time was no sufficient reason against giving this subject a mature consideration. What was done ought to be well done. For these reasons he was in favor of the bill lying on the table.

Mr. MACON quoted a precedent of the proceedings in a case similar to this in General WASHINGTON'S Administration; in which the House, after a consideration of the Message, had come to the following resolution:

"Resolved, That to-morrow be assigned for the reconsideration of said bill, according to the Constitution of the United States."

He moved that the same resolution be now adopted.

Messrs. LYON and BOYD were in favor of an immediate decision.

Mr. SOUTHARD wished a postponement to give him time to examine the bill. He was convinced that a bill might be passed for regulating the temporal concerns of a religious society, which would not violate the Constitution; but did not say, till he could examine whether this was such a bill or not.

Mr. QUINCY quoted cases of laws which had passed the signature of the late President, which, in every material respect, appeared to him to contain the same provisions as this bill.

The motion of Mr. MACON was adopted without a division.

CULTURE OF HEMP.

Mr. NEWTON laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Navy to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, on the propriety of encouraging the culture of hemp, by protecting impost duties, or by prohibiting its importation from foreign countries; which was referred to a Committee of the Whole.

The letter is as follows:

NAVY DEPARTMENT, Jan. 21, 1811.

SIR: I have had the honor of receiving your letter of the 17th instant.

As to the expediency of encouraging the culture of hemp, by protecting impost duties, or by prohibiting the importation of that article into the United States and its Territories, it is not, I presume, expected of me, to make any observations—as these are subjects appertaining peculiarly to the Treasury Department; and no doubt the Secretary of the Treasury can afford all the information necessary to enable you to form a satisfactory opinion upon them.

Without venturing an opinion upon the expediency of either of these provisions, I will submit for your consideration the following observations relative to the culture and dressing of hemp, &c.

In the essays first made by our countrymen in the culture of hemp, and in dressing it for market, the disadvantages of inexperience were sensibly felt.—Many errors, added to the dissuaves of previous habit, discouraged its culture. Doubts, too, whether the climate or soil of our country was adapted to the raising of hemp, were entertained. But very few, indeed, indulged the expectation that we should ever be able to make hemp equal to that of Russia. Hence, for many years, the culture of this important article progressed slowly; our countrymen, however, stimulated by their characteristic enterprise, and by hopes of ultimate success, persevered in repeated experiments, and have at length acquired that practical information which has corrected many of their first errors, and now enables them to raise hemp in such quantity, and of such quality, as to compensate them amply for their trouble. Still, however, they have not yet acquired that extensive information upon the subject which would assure to them all the advantages arising from the culture of this valuable article.

In preparing the hemp for breaking, the pernicious practice of what is commonly called "dew rotting," still prevails to a great extent—a practice tedious in its process, partial and unequal in its effects upon the fibre, and destructive of considerable quantities of hemp by the unavoidable exposure of it to the winds, which blow it about and entangle it. Hemp thus prepared is, in some places, strong, in others, weak, and has moreover a dark color—all which materially affect its value.

In hemp there is a viscous, gummy substance, by which the fibres of the bark are bound together and to the body of the plant, and all that is necessary to prepare it for breaking is to dissolve this substance. The experience of other nations has long since decided that this dissolution can best be effected by immersing or steeping the plant in pure, clear, running water, which, in a much shorter period of time than any other system heretofore practised, produces this dissolution over all parts of the plant equally; makes it equally strong in all places, renders it more flexible, gives it a lively bright color, and, what is an object of vast importance, especially as respects durability under water, it will receive and retain a greater portion of tar than when prepared by "dew rotting." It may be here further remarked, that the more clear and pure the stream of water, the brighter will be the color of the hemp.

"Dew rotting" requires many weeks of constant attention; but practical men affirm, that, in a pure warm stream of water, the process of dissolution will frequently be completed in five or six days.

In Russia three weeks are allowed for steeping where the water is not very cold; but if cold, as in rivers and springs, five, and sometimes six weeks are found to be necessary. To ascertain whether the hemp be sufficiently steeped, a head is taken out of the pound, dried, and beat, and if the husk comes off, the hemp is considered as having been sufficiently steeped. It is, then, taken out of the pound and suspended upon sticks placed horizontally for the purpose of drying; after remaining in the open air in this situation about a fortnight, it is removed and put into a kiln, where it is suffered to remain twenty-four hours. It is then ready for breaking, which operation is performed by means of a hand mill; after this is done, the husk is beaten off by striking the heads obliquely with iron and wooden instruments of the shape of a large two-edged knife; finally, it is drawn through a wooden comb, with one row of wide wooden teeth, for the purpose of unravelling and cleaning it.

As to the climate and soil best adapted to the culture of hemp, it may be observed that it is raised both in the frigid and torrid zone, and that any soil, if not wet, may be made to yield hemp, although the richer the soil the better, and a flat country is, for this purpose, to be preferred. On the waters of the Ohio, Mississippi, Susquehanna, Potomac, James river, and other parts of the United States, there is an abundance of land peculiarly adapted to the culture of hemp.

As to the certainty and profit of a crop of hemp, it is believed that no crop is more certain when sown in ground adapted to it, and to the grower it yields a profit superior to most articles, and exceeded but by few; an acre of ground well ploughed, harrowed, and manured, will yield a thousand pounds of clean hemp, worth, when properly cured and dressed, from $100 to $160—sometimes $200. The labor and necessary buildings required, in the sowing, preserving and preparing for market a crop of hemp, are inconsiderable when compared with some other articles, and especially tobacco, while the profit is greater and the injury done to the soil much less.

From a disposition to encourage the culture of hemp, cordage made of American hemp has been brought into use in our Navy. For standing and running rigging, and indeed for most other purposes, excepting cables, it is found to answer very well, even when made of "dew-rotted" hemp. Of the "water-rotted" hemp, we have not yet been able to procure a sufficient quantity to justify our excluding the use of Russia hemp, especially for cables. American "water-rotted" hemp is no doubt equal in all respects to the best Russia hemp; indeed, I rather incline to think it superior. Upon this point, however, the samples herewith sent will enable you to form an opinion.

No. 1 is a sample of American "water-rotted" hemp grown on Blannerhassett's island.

No. 2 is a sample of Russia hemp, delivered to me by a ropemaker as the best kind of Russia. In this, however, I incline to think there must be some mistake, though it is certainly good hemp.

No. 3 is a sample of American "dew-rotted" hemp, grown in Botetourt county, Virginia.

Upon examining these samples, you will, I believe, find the opinion which I have ventured to express with respect to the mode of dressing hemp confirmed in a great measure. The great difference between "water-rotted" and "dew-rotted" hemp, will be obvious to you from such examination.

American "dew-rotted" hemp, being of a dark color, frequently neither broke nor scutched as it ought to be, and brought to market without being properly emaled, does not, in such cases, command a good price in our markets. These are the causes, and this the effect. The growers of hemp ought not, however, to be discouraged by this circumstance. They should remember that, in removing the cause, the effect will cease; and they may be assured that, if their hemp is properly prepared, it will always command a price equal to the hemp of Russia, probably superior. For my own part, as Secretary of the Navy, I can only say, that in such case I should feel it to be my duty to give a decided preference to hemp of our own growth.

The quantity of hemp raised in our country increases every year, and no doubt exists, that in a very short period of time, enough will be raised to supply every public and private demand for all the purposes to which it is applicable.

The desiderata to be obtained appear to me to be, to persuade our countrymen to relinquish the prevailing pernicious practice of "dew rotting," and to adopt that practice which the experience of other nations has approved, namely, the steeping in water: this done, they will soon find their advantage in the change, and thus a new and powerful impulse will be given to the culture of this valuable article.

Should you think it expedient to offer any inducements to produce this change in the manner of dressing our hemp, whence would flow such happy effects, permit me to observe, that the only one which, at this time, occurs to me as coming within the range of my official duties to execute, would be an annual appropriation by Congress of a sum of money enabling me to contract for a supply of American hemp and canvass for the use of our Navy. Should this plan be approved, the appropriations should be made in time to admit of contracts being formed prior to the commencement of the season for cropping; and the first appropriation should be made distinct from other appropriations, or it might be added to the estimates for the current year in the first instance. This would involve an appropriation in the first year exceeding the amount required in that year for the expenses of the Navy, but it would be a provision for the ensuing year, and the amount might be deducted from the estimates of the ensuing year. The propriety of this provision will readily occur to you, when I state the fact, that it would not be possible, at this time, to contract for these articles, deliverable in time to be used within the year; they could not be delivered till after the crops of this year shall have been gathered and prepared for market. In the contracts which might thus be made, it would become my duty, in execution of the object of Congress, to stipulate that the hemp should be steeped in water instead of being exposed to dews; and, upon good security being given, a portion, not exceeding one-fourth or one-third of the amount of each contract, might be advanced. These contracts being judiciously distributed in different parts of the country, and, what would be just, a higher price being given than "dew-rotted" hemp would command, it would not be unreasonable to expect that a spirit of emulation—always useful to public improvements—would be excited, and powerfully assist in exploding present errors and in producing the change in the dressing of hemp; which, in my opinion, would essentially promote individual and national prosperity.

Some few of our countrymen do, at this time, I am told, entertain apprehensions that our markets will be overstocked with American hemp, and that the price will be greatly diminished. This admitted, they have it in their power to prevent the importation of all foreign hemp, by making theirs, in all respects, equal to foreign hemp. This, indeed, in a national view, would be an important point gained. But when it is considered to what a variety of purposes hemp is applicable; that we are at this time greatly dependent upon foreign countries for hemp, for canvass, and linens of various kinds made of hemp; that there exists a spirit of patriotism and of persevering industry ready to be exerted, when fit opportunities shall present, to shake off this dependence; that if more hemp should be raised than will be required for cordage, factories of canvass and linens will necessarily be established. Such apprehensions lose their force, and yield to reflections and anticipations of the most agreeable nature.

A comprehensive view of this subject leads us to cherish the expectation that the United States will, at no very distant period, become exporters of hemp, as they now are of every other description of naval stores and of cotton; and that the individuals who raise it will, like those who raise other naval stores and cotton, experience all the beneficial effects resulting therefrom.

These observations are submitted to you, sir, with all the diffidence which the novelty of the subject nat-usually excites, and with the hope that they may be useful in aiding your deliberations upon the highly interesting question now under your consideration.

I have the honor to be, &c.

PAUL HAMILTON.

Hon. THOMAS NEWTON, &c.

Mr. LYON, after some preliminary remarks, submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That additional or original duties ought to be laid on the importation of card wire, hemp, lead, and cotton, and upon all manufactures of which those articles constitute the chief materials.

Mr. EPPES suggested a reference of the resolution to the Committee of the Whole, to whom was referred a bill on the subject of additional duties.

Mr. NEWTON stated that a resolution on the subject of hemp having been referred to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, they had applied to the Secretary of the Navy on the subject, from whom a report had been received of considerable interest, which ought to be referred to the same committee.

Mr. LYON's resolution was referred as moved.

COMMERCIAL INTERCOURSE.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill supplementary to the act concerning commercial intercourse, &c.

[This act, it will be recollected, contains but one section, exempting from seizure vessels with their cargoes which had left the ports of Great Britain previous to the second of February.]

Mr. EPPES moved to amend the bill by adding to it the following sections:

"SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That in case Great Britain shall so revoke or modify her edicts; as that they shall cease to violate the neutral commerce of the United States, the President of the United States shall declare the fact by proclamation; and such proclamation shall be admitted as evidence; and no other evidence shall be admitted of such revocation or modification in any suit for prosecution which may be instituted under the fourth section of the act to which this act is a supplement. And the restrictions imposed, or which may be imposed, by virtue of the said act, shall, from the date of such proclamation, cease and be discontinued.

"SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That until the proclamation aforesaid shall have been issued, the several provisions of the third, fourth, fifth, sixth, seventh, eighth, ninth, tenth, and eighteenth sections of the act, entitled 'An act to interdict the commercial intercourse between the United States and Great Britain and France and their dependencies, and for other purposes,' shall have full force, and be immediately carried into effect against Britain, her colonies, dependencies, &c. Provided however, That any vessel or merchandise which may in pursuance thereof be seized, prior to the fact being ascertained, whether Great Britain shall, on or before the second day of February, one thousand eight hundred and eleven, have revoked or modified her edicts in the manner abovementioned, shall nevertheless be restored on application of the parties, on their giving bond with approved sureties to the United States, in sum equal to the value thereof, to abide the decision of the proper court of the United States thereon; and any such bond shall be considered as satisfied if Great Britain shall, on or before the second day of February, one thousand eight hundred and eleven, have revoked or modified her edicts in the manner abovementioned."

Mr. E. said it would be seen that, in the present state of our laws, there was no provision that the non-intercourse with Great Britain should cease, if, after the third day of March, she also should so revoke or modify her edicts as that they should cease to violate our lawful commerce. One of the objects of his amendment was to provide for that contingency. Another provision of the amendment went to remove doubts which might exist in the minds of some as to the operation of the law of May last, and which might give rise to vexatious suits. The committee had thought it proper that in this case the Legislature should step forward and decide; that it was not consistent with the responsibility they owed to the community to turn over to the judicial tribunals the decision of the question whether the non-intercourse was in force or not. These sections, Mr. E. remarked, together with the provisions now before the House, were calculated to preserve precisely the present attitude of the United States, and to wait for events to authorize a change of it. If any such course should be taken as was proposed by a repeal of the law of May last, in what situation, he asked, should we stand both as respects Great Britain and France? You have by law proposed to both certain conditions; and, before the arrival of the period allowed to Great Britain for the repeal of her orders, you would sweep from your statute book all the provisions relating to the subject. What would be the operation of such a step as to the other nation? At a time when there is no doubt that her decrees will be revoked, and that at present they cease to have their operation, you revoke the law on the faith of which the revocation is made! The proposed measure will preserve our present attitude; and as it is freed from the provisions (objectionable to some) for enforcing more rigidly the non-intercourse, and is yet such a course as will comport with the honor and dignity of the nation, I hope there will be no objection to it. Having been always myself in favor of the principle of the bill, I am prepared to vote for it and for the additional sections. I consider it important that the decision should be at once made, as vessels are daily arriving. The collectors are at present liable to suits to an immense sum; and it is proper that the responsibility should in such a case rest on the principal rather than the agents. I therefore hope the bill will be passed to a third reading this day.

Mr. LYON said he was one of those who thought that the national faith had not been constitutionally pledged; that they were never authorized, as a component part of the Legislature, to give such a power to another branch of the Legislature or to the Executive. What had been received from France to make this law a contract? A declaration that her decrees were revoked, and should not operate after the first of November. Was this true? He presumed it was not. The accounts from Europe amounted to this: that our vessels are to remain sequestered until the second day of February, and then to receive their final doom. Are we, said he, to be charged with a breach of good faith for the refusal on their part to fulfil their declaration or promise? What could be expected to be the ultimate fate of these vessels? That they would be sold, and the proceeds deposited in the Imperial treasury, &c.

Mr. BISS said it was certainly far from his intention to throw any embarrassment in the way of the Committee of Foreign Relations, but he was unwilling to act on this matter without due deliberation, and therefore moved that the bill and amendments should lie on the table. The subject was not so urgent that one day would be a matter of any great consequence.

Mr. EPPES said he had no objection to the motion.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH made a motion to refer it to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. MUMFORD stated that it was his intention, when the bill should come under consideration, to move the following amendment to it:

Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to affect the cargoes of ships or vessels wholly owned by a citizen or citizens of the United States, which had cleared out for the Cape of Good Hope, or for any other port beyond the same, prior to the 10th of November, one thousand eight hundred and ten.

He said he had inserted the 10th of November to allow time for the arrival of the proclamation at the different ports.

The motion for the bill to lie on the table was negatived—53 to 42.

It was referred to a Committee of the Whole—52 to 51—and made the order of the day for tomorrow.

JOHN MACNAMARA.

The bill for the relief of John Macnamara was read a third time. [The bill goes to relieve this person from a penalty for bringing to the United States exiles from Cuba and their slaves.]

Mr. RANDOLPH opposed the bill on the ground of the danger of giving any the least license to the introduction of slaves into this country, or of the maroons, brigands, or cut-throats from St. Domingo, or elsewhere. He alluded to the late warning the House had received in the occurrences in the neighborhood of New Orleans, which, he said, ought to call on all orders of men in the State to discountenance any relaxation of our laws on this subject.

Mr. CHEVES entertained the same general sentiments as Mr. RANDOLPH, but this was a peculiar case of hardship, where a captain, ignorant of our laws, had, from the mere impulse of humanity, without any other compensation than the gratification of that sentiment, brought a number of these people from Nassau.

Mr. RHEA opposed the passage of the bill on the same grounds as Mr. RANDOLPH.

Mr. NEWTON stated the circumstances of this case: that a law was already in existence which would have afforded relief, had the importation been direct from Cuba; but the slaves having been circuitously brought from Cuba, via Nassau, this case was taken out of the scope of the law.

Mr. CHEVES moved to recommit the bill, with a view to insert a provision requiring the re-exportation from the United States of the slaves thus introduced.

After debate, the motion was agreed to, and the bill recommitted.

FRIDAY, February 22.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a resolution of the Legislature of the State of Kentucky, declaring the assent of that State to the amendment proposed by Congress at their last session to the Constitution of the United States, respecting titles of nobility.

Mr. VAN HORN, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, presented a bill authorizing the President and Managers of the Potomac Bridge Company, to draw a lottery or lotteries within the District of Columbia; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole tomorrow.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill, entitled "An act in addition to the act, entitled 'An act supplementary to the act concerning Consuls and Vice-Consuls, and for the further protection of American seamen,' with amendments; and a bill, entitled 'An act in addition to the act to regulate the laying out and making a road from Cumberland, in the State of Maryland, to the State of Ohio;'" as also a bill, entitled "An act to extend the right of suffrage in the Indiana Territory, and for other purposes;" to which amendments and bills they desire the concurrence of this House.

CLAIM OF LIEUTENANT KNIGHT.

The bill for the relief of Simeon Knight was read a third time. [The bill authorizes the repayment to Mr. Knight of a sum of money paid by him to General Wilkinson, under the orders of the War Department, for extra rations, &c., allowance of which he is refused by the Accountant of the War Department. The bill also contains a provision that this bill shall not be held to sanction any such payment as legal.]

Mr. WRIGHT moved that it should lie on the table. His object was to move a resolution requiring the President to lay before the House a statement of the pay of the respective Brigadier Generals. Motion lost—46 to 41.

Mr. W. then opposed the bill on account of the proviso which it contained. He went into a lengthy detail to show that, whilst General Wilkinson, the oldest brigadier, received, under the law of 1806, but two thousand seven hundred dollars at most; the two inferior or younger brigadiers, under the law of 1808, received four thousand three hundred and thirty-two dollars each, &c.

Mr. ROOR also opposed the bill at length on the same grounds. He had rather sacrifice the individual, just as his claim might be, than sacrifice great principles. He could not consent, he said, to take shelter behind this young man, Mr. Knight, to assassinate the reputation of the late President and Secretary of War, under whose sanction the payment of General Wilkinson had been made.

MESSRS. LOVE and POINDEXTER spoke against the bill, and Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH in favor of it.

Mr. SOUTHAARD moved its indefinite postponement.—For indefinite postponement 63, against it 53, as follows:

COMMERCIAL INTERCOURSE.

On motion of Mr. EPPES, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill supplementary to the act concerning commercial intercourse, &c.

Mr. RHEA, of Tennessee, moved to amend the amendment, offered yesterday by Mr. Eppes, so as to provide that if, before the second of February last, Great Britain shall have so revoked or modified her edicts, &c., then, and in that case only, should the President issue his proclamation suspending the non-intercourse, &c. He said he wished to avoid any difficulty in the construction of the law. He was opposed to any modification of the agreement with France, and desirous to carry it into full effect. Had Great Britain done the same, he would have shown the same disposition as to her.

Mr. EPPES said he considered it no part of the compact or agreement with France, that if Great Britain should not revoke her orders before the second of February, we were to remain in a state of non-intercourse with her forever. If she should revoke her orders, as was possible, it must be the wish of every man that, the moment the fact was known, the non-intercourse should be withdrawn. The Legislature might not at the time be in session, and the bill would vest the power in the President during the recess to declare the fact on which their revocation depended.

MESSRS. WRIGHT and RHEA of Tennessee, supported the motion; and Mr. EPPES replied.

The Committee, without taking a question, reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again.

The House proceeded to reconsider the bill, passed by the two Houses, entitled "An act incorporating the Protestant Episcopal Church in the town of Alexandria, in the District of Columbia," which was returned by the President yesterday, with objections; when an adjournment being called for, was carried.

SATURDAY, February 23.

The House proceeded to consider the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act in addition to the act, entitled 'An act supplementary to the act concerning Consuls and Vice-Consuls, and for the further protection of American seamen,'" and the same being read, were concurred in by the House.

The bill from the Senate, entitled "An act in addition to the 'Act to regulate the laying out and making a road from Cumberland, in the State of Maryland, to the State of Ohio,'" was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

¶ The bill from the Senate, entitled "An act to extend the right of suffrage in the Indiana Territory, and for other purposes;" was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole to whom was referred the report of a select committee on a resolution of the Legislative Council and House of Representatives of the Indiana Territory.

On motion of Mr. McKEE, the select committee appointed the twenty-third ultimo, on the memorial of William Lambert, were discharged; and the memorial was referred to the Secretary of State, to consider and report thereon to this House.

Mr. WEAKLEY presented a petition of sundry inhabitants of West Tennessee, praying the adoption of such measures by the General Government as will secure to them the free and unmolested navigation of the Mobile and Tombigbee rivers, of which they are now deprived by the

RETURNED BILL.

The House resumed the reconsideration of the bill passed by the two Houses, entitled "An act incorporating the Protestant Episcopal Church, in the town of Alexandria, in the District of Columbia," which was presented for approbation on Thursday, the 14th instant, and returned by the President on the 21st instant, with objections.

The said bill was read at the Clerk's table, and is as follows:

An act for incorporating the Protestant Episcopal Church in the town of Alexandria, in the District of Columbia.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, That the Minister and Vestry of the Protestant Episcopal Church of the town of Alexandria, in the District of Columbia, which was, on the first day of January, one thousand eight hundred and nine, associated as a religious society, be, and their successors are hereby, declared and made a body corporate and politic, by the name, style, and title, of the Minister and Vestry of the Protestant Episcopal Church of the town of Alexandria; and by the name, style, and title, aforesaid, they, and their successors, shall forever lawfully have, hold, use, and enjoy, all and every tract and tracts of land, already belonging to the said Church, which is now, or which may hereafter be, acquired by donation or purchase; the Church already built, with the burying ground belonging to the same, with their hereditaments and appurtenances; and all books and other property heretofore, and that may hereafter be, appropriated to the use of the said Church, to the sole and proper use and benefit of the said Church, agreeable to the true intent and meaning for which any of the said property was or may be purchased or given; and by the name, style, and title, aforesaid, they shall be capable in law to hold, maintain, and recover, all their estates, rights, and property, belonging thereto, and to sue and be sued, plead and be impleaded, answer and be answered, defend and be defended, in all suits, controversies, causes, actions, matters, and things, whether they be actions of debt, assumpsit, ejectment, trespass, or bill in chancery, in any court or courts of law or equity, and before any judge or justices whatsoever, and shall have one common seal and perpetual succession; and the service of process upon the churchwardens shall be a sufficient service upon the body corporate.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That, in all proceedings of the aforesaid minister and vestry, all matters shall be decided by a majority of the votes; and the said minister shall in no case have a negative on the proceedings of the said corporation, except when his vote shall be with, or make a majority of the votes, present, at any meeting of the said corporation.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the said minister and vestry, by the name and style aforesaid, shall have good right, full power, and lawful authority to have, take, receive, acquire, purchase, hold, use, and enjoy, all lands, tenements, hereditaments, and all goods and chattels; and to demise, alien, improve, and lease, not only the lands which they now have, but which they may hereafter acquire; and to use and improve such goods and chattels, to the use and benefit of the said church, so that the annual increase thereof shall not exceed six thousand dollars, any law, usage, or custom, to the contrary notwithstanding. And it shall and may be lawful for the said minister and vestry of the said church, to sell any of the said property, real or personal, which at this time lawfully belongs to the said church, or the interest which the said church may have in any property, real or personal, or which may hereafter belong to it, for the purpose of applying the proceeds thereof to the purpose of erecting a new church, or repairing the present one, for the use of the said congregation or building, or repairing dwelling or other houses, for the use of their minister, or school houses, within the said town of Alexandria, or in any other way or manner as they shall, from time to time, think necessary for the benefit of the said church: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed so as to affect the rights or claim of any person or persons, county or parish, in or to any property now in possession of the said church, or claimed by it.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That the minister, or in case of his absence, or of a vacancy, the churchwardens, shall call a meeting of the vestry as often as it shall be deemed necessary; seven of whom shall be a sufficient number to constitute a meeting for the dispatch of business, and shall have power (except for the election of a minister, or of demising, alienating, or leasing of land, in which cases, a concurrence of a majority of the whole number elected shall be necessary,) to make such rules and orders, for the managing all the temporal affairs of the said church, as they, or a majority of them so met, shall agree upon, and shall think most conducive to the interest and property of the said church; and shall have the disposition and ordering of all payments of the moneys belonging to the said church, and also of the appointment of a clerk, treasurer, collector, and sexton, whenever they judge it necessary, and the said clerk, treasurer, collector, and sexton, at their pleasure to remove, and appoint others in their stead; all which orders, rules, and appointments, together with the accounts of the said church, the said vestry shall cause to be fairly entered and preserved in well bound books, to be provided for that purpose; and shall deliver the said books, with the papers and documents belonging to the said church, over to their successors in office.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That, whenever a minister and vestrymen are wanting, to form a body corporate and politic, agreeable to the direction of this act, it shall be lawful for any two reputable members of the church to call together, at the said church, by notice duly published in one of the newspapers published in the town of Alexandria, the members of the said church, and there elect, by a majority of votes, twelve able and discreet men, members of the said church, who shall be a vestry to all intents and purposes, and who, with their minister, or during a vacancy without a minister, shall be a body corporate and politic, by the same name, and shall enjoy all the rights, powers, privileges, and immunities, which are given by this act to the said church.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That, at all elections of a vestry for the said church, no person shall be allowed to vote who is not a member of, and who has not actually contributed to the support of the said church, for twelve months next preceding the said election. There shall be elections of vestrymen every third year, forever, the next election to be held on Easter Monday next, and all succeeding elections on the same day, in every third year thereafter, which elections shall be held and conducted in the following manner: The members of the said church shall assemble at the said church, or if there should be no church-house, at such other place as the vestry, for the time being, shall appoint by due notice, on Easter Monday in every third year, and then and there elect twelve able and discreet men, members of the said church, as vestrymen, who shall continue in office for three years, and until their successors be elected, in the manner aforesaid; two of the vestrymen so chosen, shall, annually, by a majority of the vestry, be appointed churchwardens, who, or either of them, and their successors, shall preside at all elections of a vestry, shall take care that such elections are conducted in a fair and orderly manner, and shall be judges of the qualifications of the electors.

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That, whenever a vacancy or vacancies in the vestry shall happen, either by death, resignation, quitting the church, or removal, the remaining vestrymen, or a quorum of them, shall choose such person or persons as they may think fit and proper, to supply the office of such vestryman or vestrymen, who, in complying with the rules and forms of the said church, shall continue in office until the next general election, except he or they remove, resign, or quit the church as aforesaid.

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That it shall and may be lawful for the said vestry to make such provision for the support of the poor of the said church, as shall by them be thought proper; and to provide also, in such manner as to them shall appear proper, for the education of the poor children of the said church.

Sec. 9. And be it further enacted, That the vestry of the said church, two-thirds concurring, shall have full power and authority to remove from the said church any minister guilty of unworthy behaviour, or of neglecting the duties of his office; and, upon such removal, the said vestry shall have authority to elect a successor.

Sec. 10. And be it further enacted, That it shall and may be lawful for the said minister and vestry to make such rules and regulations, for the good management of the temporal affairs of the said church, as may be deemed by them most expedient, and for the government of the said vestry, and the same to abrogate or alter as often as they shall see fit: Provided always, That such rules and regulations are not inconsistent with, and against any provision of this act, the laws of Congress, and the Constitution of the United States, or any rule or canon of the Protestant Episcopal Church of the State of Virginia.

Sec. 11. And be it further enacted, That this act shall commence, and be in force, from and after the passing thereof.

JOSEPH B. VARNUM,

Speaker of the House of Representatives.

GEORGE CLINTON,

Vice President of the United States,

The President's objections were also again read; and, after debate, the question "That the House, on reconsideration, do agree to pass the bill," was taken in the mode prescribed by the Constitution of the United States, and determined in the negative—yeas 29, nays 74, as follows:

And so the said bill was rejected, two thirds of the House not agreeing to pass the same.

COMMERCIAL INTERCOURSE.

The House resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill supplementary to the act concerning commercial intercourse.

Mr. RHEA's motion, made yesterday, was negatived, two only voting in favor of it.

Mr. RHEA moved to strike out the first section of the amendment proposed by Mr. EPPES, authorizing the President to issue his proclamation suspending the non-intercourse whenever Great Britain shall revoke her Orders in Council. He said the principle would extend to a hundred years as well as to a single day after the second of February. The motion was lost—ayes 9.

Mr. LIVERMORE objected to the principle of making the President's proclamation the proof of the occurrence of a fact. The principle, he said, was not to be found in any former law, and was contrary to reason as well as precedent.

Mr. EPPES and Mr. ROSS opposed, and Mr. LIVERMORE and Mr. MILNOR supported the motion, which was negatived—yeas 54, nays 36.

Mr. WRIGHT said he was about to make a proposition, which, he hoped, would meet the approbation of every member of the House. It was, to amend the section so as to read: "In case Great Britain shall make such arrangement with the United States relative to the surrender of impressed American seamen as shall be satisfactory to the President of the United States; and shall so revoke, &c.; the President," &c.

Mr. W. supported his motion by urging a variety of considerations arising from the detention of our seamen in British jails, as he termed the ships of war. He estimated the number now in this situation at ten thousand. He alluded to the late impressment of a nephew of a Senator of the United States, (Mr. REED.) He said they paid no distinction to persons, and would as soon impress a member of this House as any one else.

Mr. RHEA supported the motion. Our Minister had told us a very firm tone ought now to be assumed with that Government, of which, as it now stood, this bill would be rather retreating than otherwise. If the amendment were adopted, he said, it would at least serve to keep alive the remembrance of those who appeared nearly to have been forgotten.

Mr. LYON made some observations on the subject of the inclusion of the blockade of May, 1806, in the edicts demanded of Great Britain to be revoked. That, he said, was not authorized by law; and this was to be another impediment thrown in the way of any settlement.

Mr. SMITH opposed the annexation of such a proposition as this to the present bill.

Mr. WRIGHT supported his motion at considerable length. He said our seamen had been piratically taken, and if we could catch their captors in this country, they ought to be hung. He said if the House refused to take any measures for the relief of those seamen, he should move to bring in a bill to ransom them, as we had done from the Algerines. This was a good time, too, he said, for everybody knew where there were $7,200,000 of money (stock held by British subjects in the Bank of the United States) which might be well appropriated to the purpose. Unless our seamen were to be released, it was high time there should be a revolution in the country.

Mr. WRIGHT's motion was negatived, sixteen voting in the affirmative.

The first section, proposed as an amendment by Mr. EPPES, was then agreed to.

The second section being under consideration, which goes to declare the non-importation to be in force against Great Britain, &c.

Mr. MILNOR said: Mr. Chairman, when I take a view of the course which has been pursued in relation to this subject, during the present session, I confess I feel greatly surprised that we should be called upon to adopt the present measure. It will be recollected, sir, that, at a very early period, the honorable chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, reported a bill supplemental to the act of the 1st of May last. Although the gentleman did make one or two feeble attempts to call it up for consideration, yet it was manifest that there was a general indisposition to act upon it at that time. This, in the opinion of myself and many others, arose from a doubt in the good faith of the Emperor of the French. It was true that he had, through the Duke of Cadore, declared that the Berlin and Milan decrees were revoked on the 5th of August, and that they should cease to have effect after the first of November; and it was also true that the President of the United States had, by his proclamation of the 2d of November, declared, not simply that this promise had been given, but that the decrees were revoked, and had ceased to operate. Notwithstanding this declaration of the President, the previous conduct of the French Emperor inspired an almost universal doubt of his good faith, and the curious character of the declaration made by Cadore, was calculated to increase it. The decrees of Berlin and Milan were revoked; that is, dead on the 5th of August, and ceased to have effect; that is, to live on the first of November; thus this creature had the wonderful faculty of being dead and alive at the same time; of ceasing to have effect, and acting with full vigor at the same instant. While all was doubt and hesitation, despatches were received from Mr. Russell, our Chargé d'Affaires at Paris, which made it apparent that the decrees which were to cease to have effect on the first of November, were, in the month of December, still in existence, and in full and practical operation. It is now evident that the President was duped by the French Emperor, and led to issue a proclamation on the faith of his promise, declaring a fact which did not exist. So convinced were the House that this was the true state of the case, that the honorable chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations himself moved to recommit the bill he had previously introduced, and it was done. What, then, I would ask, sir, has since occurred to alter the face of affairs, to induce this new attempt to fasten on the restrictive system against our intercourse with Great Britain? Is there anything in the last communication from the President, calculated to produce such an effect? On the contrary, it furnishes the most conclusive evidence of the treachery of Bonaparte, and ought to serve as a beacon to warn us against trusting him further. It is true that there is a letter from Mr. Pinkney to Lord Wellesley, dated December 10th, in which the former labors to prove, that Cadore's note to Armstrong is an absolute repeal of the French decrees, without any conditions precedent, and that therefore the British Government ought to be satisfied of its validity, and take immediate measures for revoking their orders and blockades, agreeably to their promise. But, it unfortunately happened that, on the same day on which our Minister at London was performing his duty, in transmitting his able but theoretical argument to the British Ministry, our Minister at Paris was also performing his duty in remonstrating against the practical operation of those very decrees, which were to have ceased to have effect on the first of November. [Here Mr. M. read the letter of Mr. Russell to the Duke of Cadore, dated December 10th, remonstrating against the seizure of the brig New Orleans Packet, it being the only case, as declared by Mr. Russell, to which the decrees could be applied subsequent to the first of November.]

I recollect, sir, when Mr. Russell's correspondence was communicated to this House, an apology was set up for the French Emperor. It was alleged that the President's proclamation had not arrived in France at the time of the seizure of the New Orleans Packet, and that Bonaparte, having received no evidence of the intention of the American Government to fulfil their engagement, had used the precautionary measure of seizing the vessel, until he should receive some evidence of our good faith; and we were exultingly told that the President's proclamation would put all to rights, by satisfying his doubting Majesty of our sincerity, and would induce him to release all property seized subsequent to the first of November, and once more to put an end to those nine-lived decrees. How has this prediction been verified? The President's proclamation was communicated to the French Government on the 12th of December; two days after Mr. Russell's remonstrance; and yet, for anything we know, that remonstrance remains unanswered, and the New Orleans Packet remains under seizure to this very day. It is true that, after waiting thirteen days, His Majesty condescended to direct the partial suspension of the decrees, thereby giving the most positive proof not only of their existence, but of their active operation. On the 25th of December, the Dukes of Massa and of Gaete, by the direction of their master, severally wrote a letter to the officers connected with their respective departments, directing them to suspend the operation of those very decrees, so far as respected the condemnation of vessels and cargoes, seized after the first of November; not only those then in custody, but such as should thereafter be seized. I will read a part of those letters for the purpose of refreshing the memories of gentlemen on the subject. The Duke of Massa writes to the President of the Council of Prizes, as follows: "In consequence of this engagement entered into by the Government of the United States, to cause their rights to be respected, His Majesty orders that all the causes that may be pending in the Council of Prizes, of captures of American vessels, made after the first of November, and those that may in future be brought before it, shall not be judged according to the principles of the decrees of Berlin and Milan, but that they shall remain suspended; the vessels captured or seized to remain only in a state of sequestration, and the rights of the proprietors being reserved for them until the 2d February next, the period at which, the United States having fulfilled the engagement to cause their rights to be respected, the said captures shall be declared null by the Council—and the American vessels restored, together with their cargoes, to the proprietors." The letter of the Duke of Gaete is of a similar import. I will read a single paragraph, which is as follows: "His Majesty having seen in these two pieces" (the President's proclamation and Gallatin's circular to the collectors) "the enunciation of the measures which the Americans purpose taking on the second of February next, to cause their rights to be respected, has ordered me to inform you that the Berlin and Milan decrees must not be applied to any American vessels that have entered our ports since the first of November, or may enter in future; and that those which have been sequestered, as being in contravention of these decrees, must be the object of a special report."

FEBRUARY, 1811.

Here, sir, we find these two officers, by direction of their master, explicitly recognising the existence of the Berlin and Milan decrees, and suspending their operation not as to sequestration, but only as to condemnation. Not only those which had arrived after the first of November, but those which should thereafter arrive, were to be held in a state of sequestration, and to be subject to a special report. With this plain statement before their eyes, will gentlemen assert, can they possibly believe, that the decrees were revoked and ceased to have effect on the first of November? They surely cannot. If, then, the declaration of the fifth of August is proved to be false, and the assurance that the decrees should cease to have effect after the first of November was mere delusion, what becomes of the act of the first of May, and of the President's proclamation? Sir, they are mere dead letters, having no binding force or operation. The practical operation of the act of the first of May was to depend upon the performance of certain conditions on the part of one or the other of the belligerents, and the President's proclamation was intended as a mere notification of such performance. Admitting, then, that a faithful performance of the pledge of the fifth of August, on the part of France, would have had a binding force on us to carry our part of the agreement into effect, can any man, under the existing circumstances, believe we are so bound? Can a violation of a solemn pledge confer an obligation which was only intended to be created on the complete fulfilment of that pledge? Surely not. Sir, the law of the first of May, professed, on the face of it, to be impartial towards the two nations who have violated our rights. It promised that, if either would so revoke or modify her edicts as that they should cease to violate the neutral commerce of the United States, in that case certain restrictive measures should be revived against the other. Have either complied? France did, indeed, make a declaration that her edicts were revoked, and should cease to have effect on a certain day. That day has long since passed, and, for anything we know, those edicts are in full operation. Nay, we have positive proof of their active existence, nearly two months after they were to have ceased; for, on the 25th of December, their operation as to the condemnation of American property was suspended, while their power to sequester was absolutely recognised and continued. With such glaring, such positive proof before our eyes, of the perfidy of France, we are about to act as though we believed she had performed her promise with the utmost good faith. Nay, more, sir; if she had, indeed, complied with her engagement, she could require nothing more of us than the act of the 1st of May last; that was the full amount of our engagement, the utmost limit of our bond. Upon, and in consequence of that, was the Emperor's promise founded. Yet, we are not satisfied with that; persisting, in the face of the most positive and conclusive testimony to the contrary, to affect to believe that he has performed his promise, we are going beyond our contract; and, lest some doubts should arise of the Emperor's want of faith, lest our courts should decide, as they must decide, that the decrees being still in force, the act of the first of May is a mere dead letter, we are about to volunteer our services; and, by the section of the bill now under consideration, to revive those sections of the old non-intercourse law which were intended in a certain event to have been revived by the act of the first of May; to revive them against Great Britain, and that without exacting any conditions on the part of France. And must this sacrifice be made in order to bolster up the President's proclamation so prematurely issued? Must the best interests of the nation be put to hazard to save him the mortification of acknowledging his error and retracing his steps? Here, I fear, lies the true motive for our present procedure.

This restrictive system is now to be revived against England, the French decrees being in full force and operation against us at the same time. Is this an honest neutrality? Is it equal and exact justice to those two nations? Is it not rewarding the perfidy of the one at the expense of the other, and at the expense of ourselves? Let us be cautious how we proceed in this course. If France chose, in consequence of our non-intercourse law of 1809, which was equal in its operation as to both nations, to take it so much in dudgeon as to confiscate the whole of the American property within her power, even that which had sought the rights of hospitality in her ports, how much more may Great Britain feel herself justified in retaliating on this most partial and unjust measure which we are about to adopt against her, by confiscating the millions of our property now within her power. And if we have been silent under the former, and have apparently acquiesced in it, what shall we, what can we, say, in case the latter event should take place? But, sir, the apologists of France tell us that His Majesty, the Emperor, has pledged his royal word that the decrees shall cease to operate as it respects us; and that, though he has thought proper to postpone the measure from the first of November to the second of February, he has only done so in order to ascertain whether we mean to go on to fulfil our engagements with good faith; that he is only holding our property seized since the first of November as security for our performance; and that, when he finds we are determined to resist the illegal orders and blockades of Great Britain, he will give up the property of our citizens. How insulting, this, to American feelings, to be told that a total violation of faith on the part of this man is excusable, because he chooses to suspect our faith. But, sir, do these people really believe the property of our citizens will be given up after the second of February, and in consequence of the measure we are now about to adopt? When did that voracious monster ever disgorge the plunder he had once received into his insatiable maw? Of the millions upon millions of which he has, at different times, and under various pretexts, plundered our unsuspecting citizens, where is the instance of a single dollar returning to its rightful owner? No, sir, let it once get within his iron grasp, and it is lost forever. The present measure is evidently intended as a propitiatory sacrifice to conciliate Napoleon—to induce him to become our friend, and to cease to rob and plunder our defenceless citizens. Is it calculated to produce this effect? Short-sighted, as we confessedly are, sir, I should suppose we can scarcely be such silly politicians as to expect such an effect from such a measure. A brief view of the course which has been pursued, and is pursuing, by the Emperor of France, must produce a conviction in every unprejudiced mind, that he is not to be diverted from his purpose by a toy like this. Sir, it must be evident to every mind that his ambition soars to universal conquest. To this point all his measures tend—every other consideration is made to yield. For the accomplishment of this object, almost every nation on the continent of Europe has been insulted, plundered, and subdued. To this end the external commerce of the Continent has been annihilated, the agricultural and manufacturing interests have been depressed, and millions of his own subjects, and those of nations under his influence, impoverished and ruined. But there is one impediment to his gigantic project. Britain, proud, haughty Britain, stands in the way, and puts a stop to his career. Isolated, as she happily is, and the proud mistress of the ocean, she presents an impenetrable barrier to his ambitious views. But Britain must be humbled, she must be subdued. Her power on the ocean must be destroyed; and, to effect this, she must be attacked through her commerce and manufactures. For this purpose, what he is pleased to call his great continental system has been devised and rigorously enforced. Finding that all his restrictions and confiscations, aided by all his civil and military power, could not prevent the introduction of British merchandise upon the Continent, he has resorted to a plan which promises to be more effectual. Regardless of the rights and interests of his subjects, he does not inquire whose the property may be; if it is of British origin it is committed to the flames. Such is his plan; such are the efforts and sacrifices he is making to insure its accomplishment. And yet, Mr. Chairman, it would seem as if we had the consummate folly to believe that we can appease this merciless tyrant by so weak, so silly, so futile a measure as this one now under consideration. We seem to have the madness to believe that this man, after the immense sacrifices he has made for the attainment of his object, would yield that object in our favor, and in order to be upon friendly terms with us would forego all other considerations. And from what premises is such a conclusion drawn? Is it from his past treatment of us? Let us, Mr. Chairman, take a brief review of his past conduct towards us, in order to see what we may expect in future. It is some years since he ordered our ships and cargoes to be burned upon the ocean, and many were burnt. He has, at various times, and under different pretexts, seized and confiscated the property of our citizens on the ocean, and in his ports, and in the ports of his vassals. No longer ago than last Spring, he told us that we were without just political views, without honor, without energy; and that, after refusing to fight for honor, we might find it necessary to fight for interest. This insulting declaration, which was dated on the 14th of February, was followed on the 23d of March by the Rambouillet decree, which confiscated all American vessels and cargoes which had arrived from the 20th of May, 1809, or should thereafter arrive in any port of France, her allies, or those occupied by her arms. Thus was from twenty to thirty millions of the property of our unsuspecting and confiding citizens, who had sought the rights of hospitality in his ports, sacrificed without a pretext, or with a pretext, which added to the injury. Finding, after this gross violation of every principle which ought to govern honest and honorable nations, that our merchants, taught by sad experience that there was no safety within the range of his power, would venture there no more, he found it necessary to throw out another lure to entice the unwary within his reach. His tone is now suddenly changed. Instead of the haughty and insulting tyrant, he assumes the shape of a fond and doating lover. "His Majesty loves the Americans. Their prosperity and their commerce are within the scope of his policy. He is pleased in aggrandizing the United States." Yes, truly, His Majesty loves the Americans! If not for our persons, yet for our property, he has given the most ample and convincing proofs of his love. These sugared words, displaying so much of the milk of human kindness, seem to have perfectly reconciled us to his loving Majesty, and to have quite obliterated the remembrance of his harsh and unkind language so lately used towards us. And not only so, but it seems to have fully compensated us for all his robberies; and we forbear to touch that string, lest he might be somewhat ruffled, and once more induced to vent his anger on us. But lest his bare professions of love should not have the desired effect of inducing the Americans once more to place their property within his power, he directed his Minister to declare that the Berlin and Milan decrees were revoked, and should cease to have effect after the first of November. Our Administration, confiding in his assurances, in the face of all his previous conduct, published the proclamation of the second of November, and thereby assisted in deceiving our too credulous citizens. But few, however, ventured to place trust in him; and those who did have met with a fate which every man of reflection ought to have anticipated. If, sir, such has been the course of that man's conduct towards us, (and that it has, I appeal to all the documents which have been laid before us,) I would ask why are we called upon to pass the section now under consideration? To me, it is matter of mystery and astonishment.

We have heretofore affected to hold out a rigid neutrality towards both nations. The law of the 1st May last had that appearance. It held out a promise to each, that if she would cease to injure us, and the other should persevere, we would put certain sections of the old non-intercourse law into operation against her. Neither have ceased to violate our neutral commerce, and yet we are about to act as if France had indeed done all that we could ask of her. Not satisfied with doing all we promised, we are going on to volunteer our services in the cause of France. But, sir, if it were true that France had acted in good faith towards us, and if we were in consequence bound to take restrictive measures against Great Britain, yet would not the present measure be wise, politic, or just. Sir, what is it? While it professes to be a measure solely directed against Great Britain, its operation is to rob our own citizens of perhaps thirty millions of their property; for, in all probability, more than that amount will be liable to forfeiture if this bill should be carried rigidly into effect. Can it be possible, then, that from any implied obligation, this Committee can conceive themselves bound to plunder and to ruin their own citizens? I trust not, sir. After the view I have taken of the objects of Bonaparte, and which I solemnly believe to be correct, can we for a moment believe that our present measures can satisfy him? I cannot persuade myself that any honorable member of this Committee can be so weak as to believe it. Why, then, shall we not stop? Confiding in his promise of the 5th of August, (a promise intended only to deceive,) the proclamation has been issued, declaring the French decrees are revoked. The Emperor, believing he has got us in his toils, has the effrontery to say that they are not repealed, but that he will suspend them until he sees whether we will perform our promise of resisting Britain, and will hold our property as a security until the 2d of February. On that day, or at some future time, we shall be told that non-importation is too weak and impotent a measure of resistance, and that open and avowed hostility must be resorted to. When we shall have complied with that, we shall again be told, that warfare against England, to be effectual, must be directed against her manufactures; and that experience has convinced him that this can only be effectually done by burning them; and we shall then have advanced too far to recede. Thus, sir, we shall chain ourselves to the car of Napoleon, and become his abject vassals; and when we have lost our independence and our honor, instead of restoring his plunder to its rightful owners, we shall then be told, that, as we are engaged in a common cause, he can as well use the means which are in his hands as we could do, and we shall doubtless be called upon for new contributions.

Mr. Chairman, I would fain persuade myself that the Committee might be induced to pause and to reflect, before they proceed in this ruinous and destructive measure. Already have we done much to distress and injure our merchants and our country—if not altogether by commission, in part by omission. You have refused to renew the charter of the Bank of the United States—a measure called for by the best interests of our country. In this refusal, you have done much to destroy our commercial prosperity. If you pass the present measure, I fear you lay the axe to its root, and insure its total destruction. But, what is infinitely worse, you give a pledge for your perseverance in the views and policy of the great enemy of the liberties of mankind. Not satisfied with the rapid progress he is making in the conquest of the civilized world, we are officiously tendering our humble services to him in the goodly work, and exhibiting the amazing spectacle of a free and independent nation sickening in the enjoyment of her prosperity and happiness, and making them a voluntary offering at the shrine of Despotism.

The amendment proposed by Mr. MUMFORD to Mr. EPPES's amendment was agreed to, sixty-three rising in the affirmative.

Mr. PITKIN said there was another class of our citizens who would be materially affected by the law of May last going into operation, besides those whom this law proposed to relieve. He meant those who traded to the West Indies. He took a view of the details of this trade, stated its profitable nature, and explained its operations, concluding with moving an amendment going to exempt from the operation of the law such vessels as had left ports of the West Indies before information had arrived there of the refusal of Great Britain to revoke her Orders in Council.

Mr. HAVEN supported the motion. He took a view of the course of our affairs since the first of May last. The vessels which had sailed from the United States to the West Indies, and not yet returned, had violated no law of the United States, had committed no offence. If the British Orders had been revoked, then their purpose had been meritorious, and the proceeds of their enterprise would have tended to replenish the Treasury; but, if not, because they had relied too much on the disposition of Great Britain to relax her orders, their voyage became unlawful, and they were subjected to the severest penalties. The high crime of violating the law was thus made to depend upon a contingency over which they had no control. Under these circumstances, Mr. H. thought that justice required the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. EPPES agreed with the two gentlemen who had preceded him, as to the relative value of the West India trade, but could not agree that the traders to that quarter should stand on the same footing, as to notice, as those to the East Indies. If the second of February was the time fixed for the operation of the law as to European ports, it could not be considered as injustice to apply the same period to West Indian ports. This proposition, however, went to extend the period of notice for the West Indian ports beyond the second of February, the time allowed for European ports, and would be an essential violation of the compact with France.

Mr. PITKIN replied at length. If this proposed amendment would be a breach of the compact with France, if such a compact exists, the bill reported by the Committee was equally so. The one departure from the precise terms of it was as much a breach of the compact as the other.

Mr. PITKIN's amendment was negatived—yeas 42, nays 59.

Mr. TALLMADGE moved to amend the section by striking out the numbers designating the sections of the non-intercourse law, for the purpose of inserting the sections themselves, in the same words in which they stand in the former law.

Mr. EPPES opposed the motion on the ground of the loss of time which it would occasion, and the necessity there was for an early passage of the law.

Mr. TALLMADGE replied that every law which was passed should be made clear and intelligible, whatever time it would take to make it so. His motion was lost—yeas 42, nays 53.

Mr. VAN HORN moved to substitute the words "cleared out for the word "departed" from the ports of Great Britain before the second of February. Motion lost—yeas 46, nays 47.

Mr. RHEA of Tennessee moved to strike out all the section after the enacting clause, conceiving the whole bill and amendments to involve a breach of our compact with France. Motion lost—yeas 32.

Mr. R. then moved to amend the amendment proposed by striking out, from the clause exempting certain vessels from seizure, the words "departing from any British port prior to the second of February," with a view to insert the words, "from any port of the United States prior to the tenth day of November last." The motion was lost without a division.

Mr. MILNOR moved an amendment, going to give the Secretary of the Treasury a power to remit the penalties which may be incurred in certain cases under this law." The motion was lost—yeas 32.

Mr. BIGELOW said he could not doubt the disposition of gentlemen to relieve American property as far as they could from penalties, &c., and, therefore, moved to amend the section by inserting, after the exemption of vessels leaving Great Britain prior to the second of February, the words, "or from an American port, prior to the tenth day of November, 1810." Motion lost—yeas 32.

In the intervals between these motions, repeated motions were made for the Committee to rise, but without effect.

The Committee at length arose, about half-past five, reported the bill, and the House adjourned.

Mr. FINDLEY presented a petition of the stockholders of the Bank of the United States, signed by D. WHITEHILL, Mr. DESHA, and Mr. RINGGOLD, were appointed to the committee.

Mr. MORROW, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act making further provisions for the disposal of the sections of land heretofore reserved for the future disposition of Congress, and for other purposes," reported the same, with amendments, which were read, and, together with the bill, committed to a Committee of the Whole on Wednesday next.

Mr. MORROW, from the same committee, presented a bill for the revision of former confirmations, and for confirming certain claims to land in the district of Kaskaskia; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole to whom is committed the report of the same committee, of the fifteenth instant, on a report of the land commissioners for the district of Kaskaskia.

Mr. P. B. PORTER presented a petition of sundry inhabitants of the western parts of the State of Ohio, praying that a road may be laid out and opened, from a point at or near the head of Mad river, in Champaign county, to the head of the navigation of Sandusky river.—Referred to the Committee of the Whole on the bill to authorize the laying out of a public road from the line established by the treaty of Greenville to the North Bend, in the State of Ohio.

Mr. BASSETT, from the committee appointed, on the eighteenth ultimo, to inquire into the expediture of moneys appropriated for the Navy Department since the year 1803, and into the management of the several Navy Yards, laid before the House sundry documents.

On motion of Mr. BASSETT, the committee last mentioned were discharged from the farther consideration of the subject referred to them.

Mr. PICKMAN presented a petition of sundry manufacturers of Morocco leather, in the town of Lynn, praying that additional duties may be imposed upon the importation from foreign countries of Morocco leather.

Mr. CHEVES presented a petition of Stephen Lacoste, as agent of Joseph Avila, a Spanish subject, the owner of the schooner Juana, and as agent for a number of French passengers, owners of the cargo of the said schooner, stating that the said passengers were compelled by the Spaniards to leave the Island of St. Domingo, and that upon their arrival with their negro slaves in Charleston, the said vessel and cargo were seized for a violation of an act prohibiting the importation of slaves into the United States and their Territories, and praying relief.—Referred to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures.

Mr. CHEVES, from the committee to whom was referred, on the twenty-first instant, the engrossed bill for the relief of John Macnamara, reported an amendment thereto; which was read, amended, and concurred in by the House.

Ordered, That the bill be re-engrossed, as amended, and read a third time to-day.

Mr. CHEVES laid before the House two letters from Thomas Parker, District Attorney for the district of South Carolina, upon the subject of the inefficacy of certain provisions in the act of the second of March, 1807, prohibiting the importation of slaves into the United States and their Territories, and suggesting such amendments as in his opinion will remedy the defect; which were referred to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, accompanied with the annual statement of the emoluments of the officers of the customs, for the year one thousand eight hundred and two.

COMMERCIAL INTERCOURSE.

The House resumed the consideration of the unfinished business of Saturday last, to wit: the bill supplementary to the act, entitled "An act concerning the commercial intercourse between the United States and Great Britain and France, and their dependencies, and for other purposes," and the amendments reported thereto by the Committee of the whole House.

The said amendments were read at the Clerk's table, and are as follows:

"Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That in case Great Britain shall so revoke or modify her edicts, as that they shall cease to violate the neutral commerce of the United States, the President of the United States shall declare the fact by proclamation; and such proclamation shall be admitted as evidence, and no other evidence shall be admitted of such revocation or modification in any suit or prosecution which may be instituted under the fourth section of the act to which this act is a supplement. And the restrictions imposed, or which may be imposed by virtue of the said act, shall, from the date of such proclamation, cease and be discontinued.

"Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That until the proclamation aforesaid shall have been issued, the several provisions of the third, fourth, fifth, sixth, seventh, eighth, ninth, tenth, and eighteenth sections of the act, entitled 'An act to interdict the commercial intercourse between the United States and Great Britain and France, and their dependencies, and for other purposes,' shall have full force, and be immediately carried into effect against Great Britain, her colonies, and dependencies: Provided, however, That any vessel or merchandise which may in pursuance thereof be seized, prior to the fact being ascertained, whether Great Britain shall, on or before the second day of February, 1811, have revoked or modified her edicts in the manner abovementioned, shall nevertheless be restored on application of the parties, on their giving bond with approved sureties to the United States, in a sum equal to the value thereof; and any such bond shall be considered as satisfied if Great Britain shall, on or before the second day of February, 1811, have revoked or modified her edicts in the manner abovementioned.

"Provided, also, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to affect the cargoes of ships or vessels, wholly owned by a citizen or citizens of the United States, which had cleared out for the Cape of Good Hope, or for any port beyond the same, prior to the tenth day of November, 1810."

The first amendment made by the Committee being under consideration—

Mr. RHEA of Tennessee, opposed it, because it contained no limitation of time within which this power might be exercised by the President; because it was a delegation of too much power to the President; and because the provision it contained must remain in force forever, unless repealed by law; although Great Britain should not (as he thought it probable she would not) revoke her edicts.

Mr. QUINCY.—Mr. Speaker: The amendments, contained in the sections under consideration, contemplate the continuance and enforcement of the non-intercourse law. This proposition presents a great, an elevated, and essential topic of discussion, due to the occasion and claimed by this people, which comprehends within the sphere and analogies of just argument the chief of those questions, the decision of which, at this day, involves the peace, the happiness, and honor of this nation. Whatever has a tendency to show, that, if the system of non-intercourse exist, it ought not to be continued; or, that if it do not exist it ought not to be revived; whatever has a tendency to prove, that we are under no obligation to persist in it, nor under any obligation to abandon it, is now within the fair range of debate.

After long delay, and much coy demeanor, the Administration of this country have condescended to develop their policy. Though they have not spoken to our mortal ears, with their fleshly tongues, yet they have whispered their purposes through the constituted organs of this House. And these are the features of the policy which they recommend. It is proposed to grant particular and individual relief from anticipated oppressions of the commercial restrictive system. It is proposed to perpetuate that system, indefinitely, and leave our citizens, still longer, subject to its embarrassments, its uncertainty and its terrors. The chairman of our Committee of Foreign Relations, (Mr. EPPES,) at the time he introduced these amendments to the House, exhibited the true character of this policy, when he told us, that it was "modelled upon the principle not to turn over to the Judiciary the decision of the existence of the non-intercourse law, but to make it the subject of Legislative declaration." In other words, it is found that the majority of this House have too much policy to deny and too much principle to assert, that the fact, on which, and on which alone, the President of the United States was authorized to issue his proclamation of the second of November last, has occurred. A scheme has, therefore, been devised, by which, without any embarrassment on this intricate point, the continuance and enforcement of non-intercourse may be insured, and toils, acceptable to France, woven by the hands of our own Administration, spread over almost the only remaining avenue of our commercial hope.

The proposition, contained in these amendments, has relation to the most momentous and most elevated of our Legislative obligations. We are not, now, about to discuss the policy by which a princely pirate may be persuaded to relinquish his plunder; nor yet the expectation entertained of relaxation, in her belligerent system, of a haughtiness and perhaps jealous rival; nor yet the faith which we owe to a treacherous tyrant; nor yet the fond, but frail hopes of favors from a British regency, melting into our arms, in the honeymoon of power. The obligations which claim our observance are of a nature much more tender and imperious; the obligations, which, as Representatives, we owe to our constituents; the allegiance by which we are bound to the American people; the obedience, which is due to that solemn faith, by which we are pledged to protect their peace, their prosperity, and their honor. All these high considerations are materially connected with this policy.

It is not my intention, Mr. Speaker, to dilate on the general nature and effects of this commercial restrictive system. It is no longer a matter of speculation. We have no need to resort for illustration of its nature to the twilight lustre of history, nor yet to the vibrating brightness of human intellect. We have experience of its effects. They are above, around, and beneath us. They paralyze the enterprise of your cities. They sicken the industry of your fields. They deprive the laborer and the mechanic of his employment. They subtract from the husbandman and planter the just reward for that product, which he has moistened with the sweat of his brow. They crush individuals, in the ruins of their most flattering hopes, and shake the deep rooted fabric of general prosperity.

It will, however, be necessary to say a word on the general nature of this system. Not so much for the purpose of elucidating, as to clear the way, and give distinctness to the course of my argument. It will also be useful to deprive the advocates of this system of those colors and popular lures, to which they resort, on a subject in no way connected with the objects with which they associate it.

My argument proceeds upon the assumption of the irrelevancy of four topics, usually adduced in support of the system contained in the law of May, 1810, and of March, 1809; commonly called the non-intercourse system. I take for granted, that it is not advantageous; in other words, that it is injurious; that it is not fiscal, in its nature; nor protective of manufactures; nor competent to coerce either belligerent. That it is injurious is certain, not only because it is deprecated by that part of the community, which it directly affects, but because no man advocates it as a permanent system, and every one declares his desire to be rid of it. Fiscal it cannot be, because it prohibits commerce, and consequently revenue; and by the high price and great demand for foreign articles, which it produces, encourages smuggling. Protective of manufactures it cannot be; because it is indiscriminate in its provisions and uncertain in its duration; and this uncertainty depends, not on our Legislative discretion, but on the caprice of foreign Powers; our enemies, or rivals. No commercial system, which is indiscriminate in its restrictions, can be generally protective to manufactures. It may give a forced vivacity to a few particular manufactures. But in all countries, some, and in this almost all manufactures depend, either for instruments, or subjects, on foreign supply. But, if this, were not the case, a system, whose continuance depended upon the will or the ever variant policy of foreign nations, can never offer such an inducement to the capitalist, as will encourage him to make extensive investments, in establishments resting on such precarious foundations. As to the incompetency of this system to coerce either belligerent, I take that for granted, because no man, as far as I recollect, ever pretended it; at least no man ever did show, by any analysis, or detailed examination of its relative effects on us, and either belligerent, that it would necessarily coerce either, out of that policy which it was proposed to counteract. Embargo had its friends. There were those who had a confidence in its success. But who was ever the friend of non-intercourse? Who ever pretended to believe in its efficacy? The embargo had a known origin, and the features of its character were distinct. But "where, and what was this execrable shape—if shape it may be called, which shape has none?" We all know that the non-intercourse was not the product of any prospective intelligence. It was the result of the casual concurrence of chaotic opinions. It was agreed upon, because the majority could agree upon nothing else. They, who introduced it, abjured it. They, who advocated it, did not wish, and scarcely knew its use. And now that it is said to be extended over us, no man, in this nation, who values his reputation, will take his bible oath that it is in effectual and legal operation. There is an old riddle on a coffin, which I presume, we all learnt when we were boys, that is as perfect a representation of the origin, progress, and present state of this thing, called non-intercourse, as is possible to be conceived.

"There was a man, bespoke a thing,

"Which when the maker home did bring,

"That same maker did refuse it,

"The man that spoke for it did not use it,

"And he who had it did not know

"Whether he had it;—yea, or no."

True it is, that if this non-intercourse shall ever be, in reality, extended over us, the similitude will fail, in a material point. The poor tenant of the coffin is ignorant of his state. But the poor people of the United States will be, literally, buried alive in non-intercourse; and realize the grave closing on themselves and their hopes with a full and cruel consciousness of all the horrors of their condition.

For these reasons, I put all such common-place topics out of the field of debate. This, then, is the state of my argument; that as this non-intercourse system is not fiscal, nor protective of manufactures, nor competent to coerce, and is injurious, it ought to be abandoned, unless we are bound to persist in it, by imperious obligations. My object will be to show that no such obligations exist; that the present is a favorable opportunity, not to be suffered to escape, totally to relinquish it; that it is time to manage our own commercial concerns, according to our own interest; and no longer put them into the keeping of those who hate or those who envy their prosperity; that we are the constituted shepherds, and ought no more to transfer our custody to the wolves.

It is agreed, on all sides, that it is desirable to abandon this commercial restrictive system. But the advocates of the measure, now proposed, say that we cannot abandon it, because our faith is plighted. Yes, sir, our faith is plighted; and that, too, to that scrupulous gentleman, Napoleon; a gentleman so distinguished for his own regard of faith; for his kindness and mercies towards us; for angelic whiteness of moral character; for overweening affection for the American people and their prosperity. Truly, sir, it is not to be questioned, but that our faith should be a perfect work towards this paragon of purity. On account of our faith, plighted to him, it is proposed to continue this non-intercourse.

But, Mr. Speaker, we may be allowed, I presume, to inquire whether any such faith be plighted. I trust, we are yet freemen. We are not yet so far sunk in servility, that we are forbidden to examine into the grounds of our national obligations. Under a belief that this is permitted, I shall enter upon the task, and inquire whence they arise and what is their nature.

Whence they arise is agreed. Our obligations result, if any exist, under the act of May the first, 1810, called "An act concerning the commercial intercourse between the United States and Great Britain and France and their dependencies, and for other purposes." It remains, therefore, to inquire into the character of this act, and the obligations arising under its provisions.

Before, however, I proceed, I would premise, that whether I shall obtain, I am doubtful, but I am sure that the nature of my argument deserves, the favor and prepossession for its success, of every member in the House. My object is to show, that the obligation which we owe to the people of the United States, is a free and unrestricted commerce. The object of those who advocate these measures is to show that the obligation we owe to Napoleon Bonaparte, is a commerce restricted and enslaved. Now, as much as our allegiance is due more to the people of the United States, than it is to Napoleon Bonaparte, just so much ought my argument to be received by the American Congress, with more favor and prepossession than the argument of those who advocate these measures. It is my intention to make my course of reasoning as precise and distinct as possible. Because I invite scrutiny. I contend for my country according to my conscientious conceptions of its best interests. If there be fallacy detect it. My invitation is given to generous disputants. As to your stump orators, who utter low invective and mistake it for wit, and gross personality, and pass it off for argument, I descend not to their level; nor recognise their power to injure; nor even to offend.

Whatever obligations are incumbent upon this nation, in consequence of the act of the first of

May, 1810, they result from the following section: "And be it further enacted, That in case either Great Britain or France shall, before the third day of March next, so revoke or modify her edicts as that they shall cease to violate the neutral commerce of the United States, which fact the President of the United States shall declare by proclamation, and if the other nation shall not within three months thereafter, so revoke or modify her edicts, in like manner, then the third, fourth, fifth, sixth, seventh, eighth, ninth, tenth, and eighteenth sections of the act, entitled 'An act to interdict the commercial intercourse between the United States and Great Britain and France, and their dependencies, and for other purposes,' shall, from and after the expiration of three months, from the date of the proclamation aforesaid, be revived and have full force and effect, so far as relates to the dominions, colonies, and dependencies of the nation thus refusing or neglecting to revoke or modify her edicts in manner aforesaid. And the restrictions imposed by this act shall, from the date of such proclamation, cease and be discontinued in relation to the nation revoking or modifying her decrees, in the manner aforesaid."

Divested of technical expression, this is the abstract form of this section. It provides that a new commercial condition shall result, on the occurrence of a specified fact; which fact the President shall declare. On this state of the subject I observe that nothing in the act, indicates whether the object of the United States, in providing for this eventual commercial condition, was its own benefit, convenience, or pleasure; or whether it was in the nature of a proffer to foreign nations. It will, however, be agreed on all sides, that the object was either the one or the other. If the object were our own benefit, convenience, or pleasure, it will not be pretended that we are under any obligation to continue the system. For that which was adopted, solely for either of these ends, may, whenever our views concerning them vary, be abandoned; it being the concern of no other. But it is said that the act was, in truth, a proffer to the two belligerents, of commerce to the obsequious nation, prohibition of commerce to the contumacious nation. If this were the case, I shall agree, for the sake of argument, that it ought to be fulfilled to the full extent of the terms. But inasmuch as there is, in the terms of the act, no indication of such a proffer, it follows that its nature must arise from the circumstances of the case; and that the whole of the obligation, whatever it is, grows out of an honorable understanding, and nothing else. As such, I admit, it should be honorably fulfilled. The nature of this proffer is that of a proposition upon terms. Now what I say, is, and it is the foundation of my argument, that whoever claims an honorable compliance with such a proposition, must be able to show, on his part, an honorable acceptance and fulfilment of the terms. The terms our act proposed were—an act to be done; an effect to be produced. The act to be done was, the revocation or modification of the edicts. The effect to be produced was that this revocation or modification should be such as that these edicts should "cease to violate our neutral commerce." Now the questions which result are, has the act been done? If done, has it been so done as to amount to an honorable fulfilment or acceptance of our terms? The examination of these two points will explain the real situation of these United States, and the actual state of their obligations.

In considering the question whether the fact of revocation, or modification, has occurred, it is unfortunate that it does involve, at least in popular estimation, the propriety of the proclamation, issued on the second of November last, by the President of the United States. I regret, as much as any one, that such is the state of things, that the question, whether a foreign despot has done a particular act, seems necessarily to be connected with the question, concerning the prudence and perspicacity with which our own Chief Magistrate has done another act. I say in popular estimation these subjects seem so connected. I do not think that in the estimation of wise and reflecting men, they are necessarily thus connected. For the fact might not have occurred precisely in the form contemplated by the act of May, 1810, and yet the President of the United States in issuing his proclamation might be either justifiable or excusable. It might be justifiable. A power intrusted to a politician to be used on the occurrence of a particular event, for the purpose of obtaining a particular end, he may sometimes be justifiable in using, in a case which may not be precisely that originally contemplated. It may be effectually though not formally, the same. It may be equally efficient in attaining the end. In such a case a politician never will, and perhaps ought not to hesitate at taking the responsibility, which arises from doing the act in a case not coming within the verbal scope of his authority. Thus, in the present instance. The President of the United States might have deemed the terms, in the letter of the Duke of Cadore, such as gave a reasonable expectation of acceptance on the part of Great Britain. He has taken the responsibility. He has been deceived. Neither Great Britain accepts the terms, nor France performs her engagements. The proclamation might thus have been wise, though unfortunate in its result. And as to excuse, will it be said, that there is nothing of the sort in this case? Why, sir, our Administration saw the Great Napoleon, according to his own confession, over head and ears in love with the American people. At such a sight as this, was it to be expected of flesh and blood, that they should hesitate to plunge into a sea of bliss, and indulge in joy with such an amorous Cyprian?

But, whether the fact has occurred, on which alone this proclamation could have legally issued, is a material inquiry and cannot be evaded, let it reach where or whom it will. For with this is connected the essential condition of this country; on this depends the multiplied rights of our fellow-citizens, whose property has been or may be seized or confiscated under this law: and hence result our obligations, if any, as is pretended, exist. It is important here to observe, that, according to the terms of the act of May 1, 1810, the law of March 1, 1809, revives on the occurrence of the fact required, and not on the proclamation issued. If the fact had not occurred, the proclamation is a dead letter, and no subsequent performance of the required fact, by either belligerent, can retroact so as to give validity to the previous proclamation. The course required by the act of the 1st of May, 1810, unquestionably is, that the fact required to be done should be precedent, in point of time, to the right accruing to issue the proclamation; and of consequence that, by no construction, can any subsequent performance of the fact required operate backward to support a proclamation issued previous to the occurrence of that fact? Whenever this fact is, really done, a new proclamation is required to comply with the provisions of the act, and to give efficacy to them.

I am the more particular in referring to this necessary construction, resulting from the terms of the act of the first of May last, because it is very obvious that a different opinion did until very lately, and probably does now, prevail on this floor. We all recollect what a state of depression the conduct of Bonaparte in seizing our vessels, subsequent to the first of November, produced, as soon as it was known in this House, and what a sudden joy was lighted up in it, when the news of the arrival of a French Minister was communicated. Great hopes were entertained and expressed, that he would bring some formal revocation of his edicts, or disavowal of the seizures which might retroact and support the proclamation. It was confidently expected that some explanation, at least, of these outrages, would be contained in his portmanteau; that under his powder-puff, or in his snuff box, some dust would be found to throw into the eyes of the American people, which might so far blind the sense, as to induce them to acquiesce in the enforcement of the non-intercourse, without any very scrupulous scrutiny into the performance of the conditions by Bonaparte. But, alas! sir, the Minister is as parsimonious as his master is voracious. He has not condescended to extend one particle, not one pinch of comfort to the Administration. From anything in the Messages of our President, it would not be so much as known that such a blessed vision, as was this new Envoy, had saluted his eyes. His communications preserve an ominous silence on the topic. Administration, after all their hopes, have been compelled to resort to the old specific, and have caused to be tipped upon our tables a cart-load of sand, grit, and sawdust, from our metaphysical mechanic, who seesaws at St. James', as they pull the wire here in Washington. Yes, sir, a letter written on the tenth day of December last, by our Minister in London, is seriously introduced to prove, by abstract reasoning, that the Berlin and Milan decrees had ceased to exist on the first of the preceding November, of whose existence, as late as the 25th of last December, we have, as far as the nature of things permit, ocular, auricular, and tangible demonstration. And the people of this country are invited to believe the logic of Mr. Pinkney in the face of the fact of a continued seizure of all the vessels which came within the grasp of the French custom-house, from the first of November, down to the date of our last accounts; and, in defiance of the declaration of our Chargé d'Affaires, made on the 10th of December, that "it will not be pretended that the decrees have in fact been revoked," and in utter discredit of the allegation of the Duke of Massa, made on the 25th of the same month, which, in effect, declares the Berlin and Milan decrees exist, by declaring "that they shall remain suspended." After such evidence as this, the question whether a revocation or modification of the edicts of France has so occurred "as that they cease to violate the neutral commerce of the United States," does no longer depend upon the subtleties of syllogistic skill, nor is to be disproved by any power of logical illusion. It is an affair of sense and feeling. And our citizens, whose property has been, since the first of November, uniformly seized, and of which they are avowedly to be deprived three months, and which is then only to be returned to them on the condition of good behaviour, may as soon be made to believe, by the teaching of philosophy, that their rights are not violated, as a wretch, writhing under the lash of the executioner, might be made by a course of reasoning to believe, that the natural state of his flesh was not violated, and that his shoulders, out of which blood was flowing at every stroke, were in the quiet enjoyment of cuticular ease.

Whether the revocation expressed in the letter of the Duke of Cadore, was absolute or conditional, or whether the conditions were precedent or subsequent, in the present state of our evidence, it seems scarcely important to inquire. Yet the construction of that celebrated passage, in his letter of the 5th of August, has been, as I have ever seen, given so much in the manner of lawyers, and so little in that of statesmen, that it deserves a short elucidation; how much the words "it being understood that," in their particular position are worth; and whether they have the effect of a condition precedent, or of a condition subsequent. A statesman will look at the terms contained in that letter in a different aspect, not for the purpose of ascertaining how much a court of law might be able to make of them, as to discern in what position of language the writer intended to intrench himself, and to penetrate his real policy, notwithstanding the veil in which he chose to envelope it. He will consider the letter in connexion with the general course of French policy, and the particular circumstances which produced it. By these lights, it is scarcely possible to mistake the character and true construction of these expressions. Upon recurring to the Berlin and Milan decrees, it will be found that they contain a solemn pledge, that "they shall continue to be rigorously in force, as long as that (the English) Government does not return to the principle of the law of nations." Their determination to support this pledge, the French Government has uniformly and undeviatingly declared. They have told us constantly that they required a previous revocation on the part of Great Britain, as the condition of their rescinding those edicts. The question who should first revoke their edicts had come to be, notoriously, a sort of point of honor between the two belligerents. Perfectly acquainted with this state of things, we have been perpetually negotiating between the one and the other, and contending with each that it was his duty previously to revoke. At length the French Government, either tired with our solicitations, or more probably, seeing their own advantage in our anxiety to get rid of these decrees, which yet, as an essential part of its continental system of total commercial exclusion it never intended to abandon, devised this scheme of policy, which has been the source of so much contest, and has puzzled all the metaphysicians in England and the United States. Cadore is directed to say to Mr. Armstrong: "In this new state of things I am authorized to declare to you, sir, that the decrees of Berlin and Milan are revoked, and that after the first of November they will cease to have effect; it being understood that, in consequence of this declaration, the English shall revoke their Orders in Council, and renounce the new principles of blockade which they have wished to establish; or that the United States, conformably to the act you have just communicated, shall cause their rights to be respected by the English." In this curious gallimaufry of time present and time future, of doing and refraining to do, of declaration and understanding, of English duties and American duties, it is easy to trace the design, and see its adaptation to the past and present policy of the French Emperor. The time present was used, because the act of the United States required that previously to the proclamation the edicts "shall be" revoked. And this is the mighty mystery of time present being used, in expressing an act intended to be done in time future. For if, as the order of time, and the state of intention indicated, time future had been used, and the letter of Cadore had said the decrees shall be revoked on the first of November next, then the proclamation could not be issued, because the President would be obliged to wait to have evidence that the act had been effectually done. Now as the French Emperor never intended that it should be effectuated, and yet meant to have all the advantage of an effectual deed without performing it, this notable scheme was invented. And, by French finesse, and American acquiescence, a thing is considered as effectually done, if the declaration that it is done be made in language of time present, notwithstanding the time of performance is in the same breath declared to be in time future. Having thus secured the concurrence of the American administration, the next part of the scheme was so to arrange the expression that either the British Government should not accede, or if it did accede, that it should secure to France the point of honor—a previous revocation by the British; and if they did not accede, that there should be a color for seizures and sequestrations, and thus still further to bind the Americans over to their good behaviour. All this is attained by this well-devised expression "it being understood that, in consequence of this declaration, the English shall revoke."

Now, Great Britain either would accede to the terms, or she would not. If she did, and did it as the terms required, in consequence of this declaration, then it must be done previous to the first of November, and then the point of honor was saved to France; so that thus France, by a revocation verbally present, effectually future, would attain an effectual previous revocation from the English. But if, as France expected, Great Britain would not trust in such paper security, and therefore not revoke, previously to the first of November, then an apology might be found for France, to justify her in refusing to effectuate that present, future, and absolute, conditional revocation. And if ever the Duke of Cadore shall condescend, which it is probable he never will, to reason with our Government on the subject, he may tell them that they knew that the French Emperor had issued those decrees, upon the pledge that they were to continue until the British abandoned their maritime principles; that he told us, over, and over, and over again, that previous revocation by the British was absolutely required; that for the purpose of putting to trial the sincerity of the British, he had indeed declared that the French decrees "are revoked," on the first day of November ensuing; but then it was on the expressed condition that in consequence of that declaration, not of the revocation, but of that declaration, the British were to revoke, and, if they did not, the "understanding" was not realized; and his rights of enforcing his system remained to him. And I confess I do not well see, what answer can be made to such an argument. Let us examine the case in common life. You, Mr. Speaker, have two separate tracts of land, each lying behind the farms of A and B, so that you cannot get to one of the tracts, without going over the farm of A, nor to the other tract, without going over the farm of B. For some cause or other, both A and B have a mutual interest that you should enjoy the right of passage to your tract, over the farm of each respectively. A and B get into quarrels and wish to involve you in the dispute. You keep aloof, but are perpetually negotiating with each for your old right of passage-way, and telling each that it is owing to him that the other prohibits your enjoyment of it. At last A says "Come. We will put this B to trial. I, on this fifth day of August, declare my prohibitions of passage-way are revoked, and, after the first day of November, my prohibitions shall cease to have effect; but, it is understood, that B, in consequence of this declaration, shall also revoke his prohibition of passage-way." If B refuses, does A, under the circumstances of such a declaration, violate any obligation, should he refuse to permit the passage? Might not A urge with great color and force of argument, that this arrangement was the effect of your solicitation and assurance, that B would be tempted by such a proffer, and that the revocation of B was required, by the terms, to be the consequence of A's declaration, for the very purpose of indicating that it must be anterior to the fact of A's effectual revocation? But let this be as it will; suppose that you, on the first of November, in consequence of A's assurances, had sent your servants and teams to bring home your products, and A should seize your oxen, and teams and products; and drive your servants, after having stripped them, from his farm, and should tell you, that he should keep this, and all other property of yours, on which he can lay his hands, for three months, and then he should restore it to you, or not, as he saw fit, according to his opinion of your good behaviour. I ask, if, in any sense, you could truly say that on the first day of November the prohibitions or edicts of A were so revoked, that they ceased to violate your liberty of passage? Sir, when viewed in relation to common life, the idea is so absurd, that it would be absolutely abusive to ask the question. I refer the decision of so simple a case to the sound sense of the American people, and not to that of "scurvy politicians, who seem to see the things they do not." In a condensed form my argument is this. From a revocation merely verbal, no obligations result. By the terms of our act the revocation must be effectual, "so as the edict shall cease to violate our rights." Now the simple question is, whether an uniform seizure, since the first of November, under those edicts (for none other are pretended) of all their property, and holding it for three months, to see how they will behave, be or not a violation of the rights of the American people? In relation to the revival by a formal declaration of the non intercourse system, as is proposed in one of these sections, I offer this argument: Either the fact, on which the President's proclamation could alone have been issued, has occurred or it has not. If it has occurred, then the law of March 1809, is revived, and this provision, by a declarative law, is unnecessary. If it have not occurred, then there is no obligation to revive it, for alone on the occurrence of the specified fact does our obligation depend. In such case the revival by declaration is a mere gratuity to Napoleon. This is in fact the true character of the law. As to the provisions for relief of our merchants against anticipated seizure, I hold them scarcely deserving consideration. Heaven be praised we have independent tribunals and intelligent juries. Our judges are not corrupt and our yeomanry will not be swayed in their decisions, by the hope of Presidential favors, nor be guided by party influence. The harpies of your custom-house dare as soon eat off their own claws, as thrust them, in the present state of the law of March, 1809, into the fatness of their fellow-citizens. The timorous and light-shunning herd of spies and informers have too much instinct, to pounce on such a prey.

FEBRUARY, 1811.

But, in order to cause any obligation to result under the law of May 1, 1810, it is necessary, not only that the fact required be done, and the effect required produced; but also the terms of that act must be accepted. The proffer we made, if such be the character of that act, was only to revive the non-intercourse law against the contumacious belligerent, after three months had expired, from the date of the proclamation. Now it is remarkable, that, so far from accepting the terms of the proposition, contained in our act, as the extent of our obligations, Bonaparte expressly tells us, that they mean something else; and something, too, that no man in this House will dare to aver they really intend. It is also remarkable that the terms of this celebrated letter from the Duke of Cadore, of the fifth of August, which have been represented as a relaxation, in the rigor of the French Emperor's policy, are, in fact, something worse than the original terms of the Milan decree, and that, instead of having obtained a boon from a friend, in this boasted letter, our Administration have only caught a gripe from a Tartar. By the terms of the Milan decree, it was to "cease with respect to all nations who compelled the English to respect their flag." By the terms of the letter of Cadore, it was to cease on condition that the United States "cause their rights to be respected." Now as much as an obligation, of an indefinite extent, is worse than a definite obligation, just so much worse are the terms of the letter of Cadore, than the original terms of the Milan decree. Mr. Speaker, let us not be deceived concerning the policy of the French Emperor. It is stern, unrelenting, and unrelaxing. So far from any deviation from his original system being indicated in this letter of the Duke of Cadore, a strict adherence to it is formally and carefully expressed. Ever since the commencement of "his continental system," as it is called, the policy of Napoleon has uniformly been to oblige the United States to effectual co-operation in that system. As early as the 7th of October, 1807, his Minister, Champagny, wrote to General Armstrong, that the interests of all maritime Powers were common, to unite in support of their rights against England. After this followed the embargo which co-operated effectually at the very critical moment, in his great plan of continental commercial restriction. On the 24th of the ensuing November, he resorts to the same language—"in violating the rights of 'all nations England has united them all by a 'common interest, and it is for them to have recourse to force against her." He then proceeds to invite the United States to take "with the whole 'Continent the part of guaranteeing itself from 'her injustice, and in forcing her to a peace."

On the 15th of January, 1808, he is somewhat more pointed and positive, as to our efficient concurrence in his plan of policy. For his Minister, Champagny, then tells us, that "His Majesty has no doubt of a declaration of war against England by the United States," and he then proceeds to take the trouble of declaring war out of our hands, and volunteers his services, gratuitously, to declare it, in our name and behalf. "War exists

' then, in fact between England and the United States; and His Majesty considers it as declared from the day on which England published her decrees." And, in order to make assurance doubly sure, he sequesters our vessels in his ports, "until a decision may be had on the dispositions to be expressed by the United States," on his proposition of considering themselves "associated in the cause of all the Powers," against England. Now in all this there is no deception, and can be no mistake, as to the purpose of his policy. He tells us, as plain as language can speak, that "by causing our rights to be respected," he means war, on his side, against Great Britain. That "our interests are common"—that he considers us, already "associates in the war," and that he sequesters our property by way of security for our dispositions. This is his old policy. I pray some gentlemen on the other side of the House to point out, in what it differs from the new. The letter of Cadore on the fifth of August tells us, it is expected that we "cause our rights to be respected, in conformity to our act," and the same letter also tells us what he understands to be the meaning of our act. "In short, Congress engages to oppose itself to that one of the belligerent Powers which shall refuse to acknowledge the rights of neutrals." In other words, "by causing our rights to be respected," he means war on his side against Great Britain. In perfect conformity with this uniform, undeviating policy, his Minister, Turreau, tells our Government, in his letter of the 28th of November last, that "the modifications to be given to the present absolute exclusion of our products will not depend upon the chance of events, but will be the result of measures, firm and pursued with perseverance, which the two Governments will continue to adopt to withdraw from the monopoly and from the vexations of the common enemy a commerce loyal and necessary to France as well as the United States." And to the end, that no one feature of his policy should be changed, or even appear to be relaxed, his Excellency the Duke of Massa, and his Excellency the Duke of Gaete, in their respective letters of the 25th of December, declare, that the property taken, shall be "only sequestered until the United States have fulfilled their engagements to cause their rights to be respected." Now, Mr. Speaker, is there a man in this House bold enough to maintain, or with capacity enough to point out, any material variation, between the policy of France, to this country, subsequent to the Cadore letter, of the 5th of August, and its policy anterior to that period? The character of the policy is one and indivisible. Bonaparte had not yielded one inch to our Administration. Now, as he neither performed the act, required by the law of May, 1810; nor produced the effect; nor accepted the terms it proposed; whence arise our obligations? How is our faith plighted? In what way are we bound again to launch our country into this dark sea of restriction; surrounded on all sides with perils and penalties?

The true nature of this Cadore policy is alone to be discovered in the character of his master. Napoleon is an universal genius. "He can exchange shapes with Proteus to advantage." He hesitates at no means, and commands every skill. He toys with the weak—he tampers with the mean—he browbeats the haughty—with the cunning he is a serpent. For the courageous he has teeth and talons. For the cowering he has hoofs. He found our Administration a pen and ink gentry—parchment politicians; and he has laid, for these ephemeral essences, a paper fly trap, dipped in French honey. Hercules, finding that he could not reach our Administration with his club, and that they were out of their wits at the sight of his lion's skin, has condescended to meet them in petticoats, and conquer them, spinning at their own distaff.

As to those who, after the evidence now in our hands, deny that the decrees exist, I can no more reason with them than with those who should deny the sun to be in the firmament, at noon-day. The decrees revoked! The formal statute act of a despot revoked by the breath of his servile Minister; uttered on conditions not performed by Great Britain, and claiming terms not intended to be performed by us! The fatness of our commerce secure, when every wind of heaven is burdened with the sighs of our suffering seamen, and the coast of the whole Continent heaped with the plunder of our merchants! The den of the tiger safe! Yet the tracks of those who enter it are innumerable, and not a trace is to be seen of a returning footstep! The den of the tiger safe! While the cry of the mangled victims are heard through the adamant walls of his cave; cries, which despair and anguish utter, and which despotism itself cannot stifle!

No, Mr. Speaker. Let us speak the truth. The act now proposed is required by no obligation. It is wholly gratuitous. Call it then by its proper name. The first fruit of French alliance. A token of transatlantic submission. Anything except an act of an American Congress, the Representatives of freemen.

The present is the most favorable moment for the abandonment of these restrictions, unless a settled co-operation with the French continental system be determined. We have tendered the provisions of this act to both belligerents. Both have accepted—both, as principals, or by their agents, have deceived us.

We talk of the edicts of George the Third and Napoleon. Yet those of the President of the United States, under your law, are far more detestable to your merchants. Their edicts plundered the rich. His make those who are poor still poorer. Their decrees attack the extremities. His proclamation fixes upon the vitals, and checks the action of the seat of commercial life.

I know that great hopes are entertained of relief from the proposed law, by the prospect of a British regency. Between a mad monarch and a simpering successor, it is expected the whole system of that nation will be abandoned. Let gentlemen beware, and not calculate too certainly on the fulfilment, by men in power, of professions made out of it. The majority need not go out of our own country, nor beyond their own practice, to be convinced how easily, in such cases, proud promises may eventuate in meagre performance.

The whole bearing of my argument is to this point. It is time to take our own rights into our own keeping. It is time, if we will not protect, to refrain from hampering, by our own acts, the commerce of our country. Put your merchants no longer under the guardianship and caprice of foreign Powers. Punish not, at the instigation of foreigners, your own citizens, for following their righteous calling. We owe nothing to France. We owe nothing to Great Britain. We owe everything to the American people. Let us show ourselves really independent; and look to a grateful, a powerful, and then united people, for support, against every aggressor.

Mr. MUMFORD—The gentleman (Mr. QUINCY) from Massachusetts has given us a long talk, that amused the House very much with tropes and figures, and I hope has convinced himself that he is right. I am no advocate of either belligerent, I have not much confidence in the declarations of foreign Governments. I did, however, put some confidence in the Erskine arrangement, but I was deceived; it met my approbation, because I was among those who were determined to settle our disputes with Great Britain, in our own way, as an independent nation. And I will now ask the gentleman from Massachusetts whether, if the Chancellor of the Exchequer, or any other higher authority in Great Britain, should write a letter to Sir William Scott, and a circular letter to the Collector of Liverpool, informing them that the Orders in Council did not apply to American vessels from and after the 1st November, he would not deem those letters to be evidence of the fact? If so, why not give the same credence to the letters of the Duke of Massa and the Duc de Gaete? I wish to preserve the faith of the nation. We have been plundered by both belligerents, and have as little confidence in the one as in the other; but without some reliance on the word of constituted authorities there is an end to all negotiations. The gentleman says that we are about to shut up "the only avenue to our commercial hope." These are his own words. Let us now examine this avenue to our commercial hope. I will in the first place ask the indulgence of the House while I read and state some facts from a letter I have just received from Liverpool, dated January 8, of the present year, from one of the most respectable houses there, which states that the importation of cotton from the United States was 320,000 bales in 1810; that there was then 145,000 bales on hand; tobacco imported in same period, 14,700 hogsheads; and, notwithstanding the consumption, the quantity imported kept the market supplied constantly with about the same number of hogsheads, throughout the year 1810. Pot-ashes imported 28,946 barrels, on hand 13,000 barrels; rice 39,000 imported, and there remains on hand very large supplies. Those are the principal articles of the produce of our soil unsold on 8th of January, 1811, in the port of Liverpool alone, besides the quantities in the other ports of Great Britain; and the same letter observes: "This supply checks any attempt at speculation, and without an export vent 'is procured, the stock on hand must remain unsaleable; if the belligerents return to a sense of justice, the continental markets being in that case 're-opened, will require large supplies, and cause 'our market to rise.'" The prices of upland cotton are stated at 12d. sterling per lb; tobacco, very prime 4d. to 7d., middling quality, great quantity on hand, fit only for Continental market, at 1½ a 4d; pot-ashes 43 to £44 per ton—rice 19 to 23 per cwt." Sir, there is no American merchant who can pursue that commerce, attended with the enormous charges and duties imposed on those articles without inevitable ruin; and I call to the recollection of gentlemen the numerous failures in consequence of bills of exchange returned under protest, which had been predicated on shipments to British ports; and yet the gentleman from Massachusetts tells us this is "the only avenue to our commercial hope." Send your vessels to the Brazils, you meet them there intriguing against your commerce; to Buenos Ayres, you find them there; to Cayenne, there also; to Terra Firma, you there find them in conjunction with Miranda intriguing, and counteracting your commerce; to Barbadoes, Surinam, Demerara, Trinidad, Martinique, Guadaloupe, Jamaica, &c., and you are met with enormous port charges, and duties amounting to prohibition on the staple articles of the new England States; cod fish, beef, pork, butter, lard, cheese, hams, &c. It is true we are admitted every now and then, at the mere will and caprice of a governor, to import into those colonies flour at a duty of one dollar per barrel; rice and lumber in proportion; on condition that you shall not take away any article but rum and molasses, and this is the only avenue to our commercial hope. They are like the locusts of Egypt in relation to our commerce. What has become of your 1,350,000 tons of shipping, valued at fifty dollars per ton, amounting to $67,500,000, one third of which belongs to Massachusetts? Is the gentleman willing to surrender the carrying trade to Great Britain? Let him turn his attention to the ports of New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Norfolk, Charleston, and New Orleans, and he will find that British ships are now taking the bread out of the mouths of his own constituents. They are enabled to take freight on so much lower terms than American vessels can afford to do it, in consequence of the very great difference of duties in Great Britain, between importations in American or in a British ship, that we cannot compete with them, unless you will countervail them, and take a decisive stand in defence of your commerce to continental Europe, and carry your produce direct to the consumers, and be no longer subjected to be fleeced by the monopolizers and retailers of the old world. They are not content to have the whole products of your soil deposited on their island, on which they receive an enormous import, and raise an extra war tax, besides, but they will claim very soon the exclusive right to carry it when and where they please in their own ships. We are thus reduced to a worse situation than in a state of colonization; we have now all the disadvantages of being plundered by their navy, and none of the advantages of receiving its protection, although they have the impudence to charge us four per cent. convoy duty on their gewgaws and manufactures, which convoy they do not give us. Can this be a desirable state of things? And if persevered in, I am convinced the commerce of the United States will descend into the same tomb with the gentleman's story of the coffin.

There are three classes of your citizens to be provided for, as contemplated in the provisions of this bill—first, sequestrations in France, Spain, Italy, Holland, Denmark, Sweden, Prussia, and Russia. Second, those who have sailed to France under the faith of the Duke of Cadore's letter of the 5th of August. Third, importers of British manufactures. But it would seem, by the arguments I have heard advanced in this House, that there were only the latter class to be provided for, and, as I presume British precedent and authority will be admitted by the gentleman from Massachusetts to be good evidence, I will inform him and the House what were the concurrent testimony of the English merchants before the bar of the House of Commons on the subject of exports and imports of the United States. They stated on oath that the exports to the United States were about twelve millions sterling, and that the imports were about four millions on an average for the years 1802, 1803, 1804, when there were no decrees against American commerce, and consequently it took its own natural channel and supplied each market according to its natural consumption. The difference between export and import being about eight millions sterling against us. Those English merchants state that it was made up and received from our trade with continental Europe; this has not been disproved by the British Chancellor of the Exchequer, nor by his friend Stevens, of War in Disguise—it is a fact; they cannot deny it. And shall we be told about the profitable commerce with Great Britain? After a statement of these facts, shall we go on to gorge their warehouses with twelve millions sterling of produce, when their own internal consumption does not exceed four millions sterling? I hope not; and I do trust that the time is not far distant when we shall assert and defend our just rights.

Mr. TALLMADGE moved to strike out of the first section of the amendment, the words, applied to the proclamation of the President, "and no other evidence shall be admitted," &c.

With the consent of Mr. TALLMADGE—Mr. LIVERMORE enlarged the motion, so as to strike out the words "and such proclamation shall be admitted as evidence, and no other evidence shall be admitted of such revocation or modification," &c. of the Orders in Council.

Mr. LIVERMORE spoke in support of the motion.

He conceived the clause proposed to be stricken out as involving a most arbitrary feature.

Mr. ROSS said that the gentleman's reasoning went to prove that a court, instead of the Executive, should be vested with the power of deciding the fact.

Mr. WRIGHT spoke against the motion. The power proposed to be given to the President of the United States in this case was analogous to the proclamation of a treaty, which then became the law of the land, &c. It was the only evidence which could be admitted.

Mr. LYON and Mr. WHEATON also spoke in favor of the motion.

The question on Mr. LIVERMORE's motion was taken by yeas and nays. For the motion 50; against the motion 79, as follows:

Mr. RHEA of Tennessee, adverting to the present want of limit to the time when Great Britain might revoke her unlawful edicts, and declaring his opinion that the section as it now stood contravened the compact with France, moved to amend it, so as to read—"if Great Britain shall, on or before the 2d of February, 1811, have so revoked or modified, &c. then the President," &c. to issue his proclamation, &c.

Mr. R. spoke in support of his proposition, declaring that if the section was amended as he proposed, he should vote for it; otherwise not.

Mr. LYON called for a division of the question, so as to take it distinctly on striking out.

Mr. WRIGHT supported Mr. RHEA's motion at length, on the ground that, as it now stood, the bill contemplated a direct violation of the compact with France, by which we had engaged to prohibit importation after the expiration of three months from the date of the proclamation. The attempt of the Legislature to explain or declare the intent of a law he considered an usurpation of judicial powers.

The question on striking out the words proposed to be erased by Mr. RHEA's motion was decided by yeas and nays. For striking out 23; against it 92, as follows:

Mr. WRIGHT renewed the motion he had made in Committee of the Whole, to incorporate in the bill a provision for requiring, as a sine qua non to the revocation of the non-intercourse, an arrangement for the surrender of impressed American seamen.

He proposed to make some remarks on the subject; but a motion to adjourn prevailed—yeas 59 nays 50.

TUESDAY, February 26.

The following Message from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, received yesterday, was read, as follows:

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

I transmit to the House of Representatives reports from the Superintendent of the City, and the Surveyor of the Public Buildings, complying with their resolution of the fourteenth of January.

JAMES MADISON.

FEBRUARY 25, 1811.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act providing for the final adjustment of claims to lands, and for the sale of the public lands in the Territories of Orleans and Louisiana, and to repeal the act passed for the same purpose, and approved the sixteenth of February, 1810," and a bill, entitled "An act to authorize the payment of certain certificates, credits, and pensions, and for other purposes," to which bills they desire the concurrence of this House.

GENERAL WILKINSON.

Mr. BACON, from the committee appointed to inquire into the conduct of Brigadier General Jas. Wilkinson, reported an immense mass of documents collected on the subject, without any opinion expressed thereon by the committee.

A motion was made by Mr. BACON that the report and documents be transmitted to the President of the United States.

This motion was opposed, because that it was sending to the President a mass of paper of the contents of which they knew nothing; and that it would be shifting the burden from the shoulders of the House, who had voluntarily taken it up, on those of the President of the United States.

This reference was supported on the ground of a similar proceeding in relation to papers heretofore submitted to the House in respect to that subject, and of the abstract propriety of referring to the Executive, who alone had power to remove General Wilkinson, and who had been supposed to be precluded by the interposition of the House from acting on those documents which should go to establish the guilt or innocence of the accused.

Mr. EPPES moved to refer the papers to a Committee of the Whole. Having commenced this inquiry, for which he himself had voted, he was of opinion that the House should prosecute it to some result, and not shift the responsibility from themselves on others.

Mr. RANDOLPH seconded Mr. EPPES's motion; and, after debate,

Mr. EPPES's motion was negatived—yeas 43, nays 81, as follows:

YEAS—Willis Alston, jr., William T. Barry, Adam Boyd, William A. Burwell, Matthew Clay, John Clopton, William Crawford, Richard Cutts, John Dawson, Joseph Desha, John W. Eppes, Meshack Franklin, Barzillai Gannett, Gideon Gardner, Thomas Gholson,

Mr. BIBB moved to amend the motion, so as to include the report of the committee of the last session on this subject.

This motion was opposed, because the testimony taken last session was ex parte, General Wilkinson not having been heard in his defence; and supported on the ground of the allusion made to that report in the report of the present session.

The amendment was agreed to—yeas 88, nays 32, as follows:

FEBRUARY, 1811.

Commercial Intercourse.

H. OF R.

George M. Troup, Charles Turner, jr., and Robert Whitehill.

A committee was then appointed to wait on the President of the United States with those papers.

MORTALITY AT NEW ORLEANS.

Mr. NEWTON, from the committee appointed to inquire into the causes of the late mortality of the Army near New Orleans, made a report.

[The report includes many documents, and refers to the opinion expressed in the report of last year, as unchanged by anything which has since appeared.]

Mr. NEWTON said, as the House had just now sent a large parcel of documents to the President on a subject not unconnected with this, he moved that this report take the same course.

Mr. CRAWFORD (a member of the committee of investigation) opposed this reference, and went on to assign reasons why another course ought to be pursued.

Some conversation arose as to the proper mode of proceeding in this case; but, finally, a motion of Mr. EPPES to postpone the subject till to-morrow was carried.

COMMERCIAL INTERCOURSE.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill supplementary to the act concerning commercial intercourse, &c.

Mr. WRIGHT withdrew the motion he made before the House adjourned yesterday, and in the place of it moved to amend the bill so as to read to this effect:

"Provided Great Britain shall, on or before the 2d day of February, 1811, have so revoked or modified her edicts, &c., or shall before the 4th July, 1811, have made such arrangements with the United States relative to the surrender of impressed American seamen, as shall have been satisfactory to the President of the United States, and before that day shall have so revoked, &c., then the President to issue his proclamation," &c.

Mr. W. supported this motion by observations at some length on the propriety of interdicting intercourse with Great Britain on general considerations—on account of her conduct to the United States. In support of that opinion, he quoted the resolutions of Congress in 1793; and he spoke on the necessity of observing with good faith the terms of the contract with France, which he conceived the provisions of the bill as going directly to contravene. Mr. W. dwelt emphatically on the hardships endured by our citizens in servitude on board of British men of war, and lamented the apathy which appeared to prevail in relation to their sufferings. Was property more dear than life or liberty, that it should excite so much higher an interest, and occupy so much more of the time of the House? He then quoted the retaliatory law of 1798 in relation to the impressment, &c., of American seamen by French vessels; and he recommended, in strong terms, the adoption of similar measures at this day in relation to England. He, also, took a wide scope of remark on our foreign relations generally, and made some comments on Mr. QUINCY's speech of yesterday.

Mr. GARDENIER spoke at length against the bill, in principle and detail. He occupied the time of the House about three hours, during which time there was more than one interruption for the want of a quorum, and by motions to adjourn. He took the ground, in its widest latitude, of the want of faith towards us in France, and a different conduct on the part of Great Britain. He intimated that the bill was in fact, if not in intention, a compliance with the wishes of Bonaparte; but, although so far conformable to his policy, was yet not such a measure as would satisfy his insatiable ambition, on which he particularly dwelt, or retrieve from his grasp the vast amount of property under sequestration in the ports of France and her dependencies, &c. He deprecated the prostration of Great Britain, as removing the obstacles to universal conquest; and, even if this measure could be coercive, which he utterly denied, he was opposed to it.

Mr. HOLLAND replied to Mr. GARDENIER, and supported Mr. WRIGHT's amendment. He was of opinion that the bill, as it at present stood, would be a departure from our contract with France, and was not taking that high stand, in relation to Great Britain, which circumstances called for.

When Mr. HOLLAND concluded, another motion was made, by Mr. RANDOLPH, to adjourn, and negatived—yeas 31, nays 72.

Mr. KNICKERBACKER spoke at large on the subject of the bill. He appeared to be averse to the non-intercourse system throughout, and to deprecate all restriction on commerce. He appeared more particularly to dread its demoralizing influence, and its pernicious effects in disturbing the order and steady habits of society.

Mr. ROSS spoke also against the restrictive system generally, to which it was known he had in general been opposed; but when he heard the course which had been pursued by the gentlemen from New York and Massachusetts, (Messrs. GARDENIER and QUINCY,) designed to criminate the Administration, he felt bound to give his support to the bill, and to oppose the amendment which went to embarrass its progress. Mr. R. made a number of remarks in reply to Mr. GARDENIER's observations on the subject of French usurpation, &c., showing that it had no connexion with the subject under discussion.

Mr. RHEA followed in support of Mr. WRIGHT's proposed amendment, urging the necessity of taking a strong ground in relation to Great Britain, who had so unceasingly shown a disposition to do us injury. He expatiated on the necessity of performing with good faith our stipulations with France, and of seizing the moment which appeared favorable for obtaining the release of our citizens, &c. Not to adopt the amendment, now it was proposed, would be a surrender of our rights as to the seamen.

Mr. DAWSON entreated that gentlemen would permit the question to be taken, that the mercantile interest of the country might know what to expect. It could not be expected that all the speeches that could be made would now affect a single vote in the House.

Mr. LYON spoke against the amendment, as merely another impediment to a settlement of differences with Great Britain. The blockade of May, 1806, he again alluded to as having been drawn into question to increase the difficulties in the way of a settlement with Great Britain.

Mr. EPPES opposed the amendment, because the law of last session barely required of both nations a revocation of its edicts as the condition of a renewal of commercial intercourse; and one of them having revoked its edicts and received the benefit of the law, and it not being known whether the other had or had not revoked its edicts before the 2d February, he was opposed to annexing, as a condition for the renewal of intercourse with the latter, a demand unsimilar to any made of the other, and irrelevant to the question at issue. As well might the affair of the Chesapeake, &c., be attached to it, or satisfaction required of France for burning our vessels on the high seas, or for sequestering our property in her ports, as a prerequisite to the performance of our compact with her, as this proposition be adopted. The object of this bill was to remove doubts existing in the minds of some as to the operation of the law of May last, and to relieve a part of our own citizens. It was not to impose new conditions to the contract already offered.

Mr. WRIGHT replied with considerable warmth. He was not for violating our faith by imposing new conditions; but Great Britain had utterly refused to accept the proffered engagement within the time specified; and the time was as much an ingredient in the proposition as the fact itself. Having refused to accede to our proposition, it would be a breach of our faith with France now, after the time had elapsed, if Great Britain was permitted to come in and resume intercourse with us on a bare revocation of her edicts.

Mr. GARDENIER again spoke. He urged to gentlemen on the same side of the House as the gentleman from Maryland, to reflect whether, as France had required us to cause Great Britain to respect our rights, the rejection of this proposition (for impressment unquestionably injured our rights) would not be deemed a failure on our part to perform the conditions required by Napoleon as prerequisite to the revocation of his decrees.

The question was taken on Mr. WRIGHT's amendment, and decided in the negative—yeas 21, nays 83, as follows:

YEAS—William Anderson, Joseph Calhoun, Martin Chittenden, John Clopton, William Crawford, Joseph Desha, Barent Gardenier, Jas. Mr. STURGES then moved (at ten o'clock) an adjournment. He believed, if an adjournment took place this evening, the bill would not be delayed to-morrow, otherwise than by the proposition of amendments. Motion lost—61 to 44.

Mr. MUMFORD.—I regret that the question just taken, to redeem our fellow-citizens held in bondage on board the floating dungeons of a foreign Power did not prevail. It cannot be in serious contemplation to abandon the honest tars of our country. But, since the majority have decided otherwise, with all due deference I submit. I will now proceed, and ask the indulgence of the House, at this late hour of the night, while I take a brief review of some of the observations which fell from my colleague (Mr. GARDENIER) on our commercial relations; and, as I see him in his seat, I hope he will correct me in case I should misquote his observations. The only question, in my opinion, is not now who began first to make aggressions on our commerce; but to consider, as Americans, whether we ought to put as much confidence in the proposed arrangement with one of the belligerents, as we did in the arrangement made with the other. We have printed and sent out to the people, in the course of a few years, more than thirty thousand copies of arguments, and we have convinced them that we have the best of the argument, though we have not convinced them that we have defended their rights; and the belligerents still persevere in their system of "feeling power and forgetting right." We have now arrived at a momentous crisis in our foreign relations; and great would be my satisfaction to hear that Great Britain had revoked her Orders in Council. But, let us look back, and see what prospect there is of such an event. In 1806, we expected much from the Fox administration, and we were met with an Order of Council blockading one thousand miles of coast from the Elbe to

H. OF R.

Brest, and thus shutting you out of the most lucrative avenues of your commerce with one stroke of the pen, and no actual force of investment to make an effectual blockade. Some gentlemen indulge a hope from the Regency, and I confess I did myself—but I am now convinced that we have nothing very favorable to expect from them. It will be a change of men, in my opinion, but not a change of principle; they will not vary in their monopolizing system. Have gentlemen forgotten the Grenville administration—and he will likely be the Prince's Premier—is not the memorable Jay Treaty within the recollection of the members of this House, extending articles to be denominated contraband of war, to your flour and salted provisions and fish? and we were forced into Great Britain under the construction of that treaty with our cargoes of provisions, and compelled to take an arbitrary price of ten per cent. profit, fixed by the maximum of British merchants, at the nod of Pitt, while those who escaped the British fangs, and arrived safe in France, obtained more than one hundred per cent. profit for the very same kind of articles.

Mr. Labouchere, as I have seen in the papers, was sent over to Great Britain from King Louis of Holland, as a confidential agent, to make overtures, that, in case certain events taking place, to be agreed upon by the respective parties, Holland should be taken under the immediate protection of Great Britain. But, after many fruitless visits and notes, &c., between him and the Marquis Wellesley, (much in the same manner as he amuses Mr. Pinkney,) he returned to Holland without accomplishing any specific object; and, notwithstanding the magnitude of the trade of Holland was so great, yet it would not do to accede to Mr. Labouchere's proposals, as it would interfere with the system of the paper blockades. Sir, we have it from high authority, that a French Court of Prizes, and a British Court of Admiralty are as much alike, as one egg is like another. I have just received an extract from a London paper, dated December 14, 1810, and confirmed by letters from that city, as follows: "The case of the Fox, in our Courts of Admiralty, has been again postponed; but that of the Sloth, which was destined from New York to St. Sebastian's, was determined yesterday morning, after a short hearing. It was decided on the principle of the law of blockade, as declared in our Orders of Council, that this vessel was lawful prize to the captors, and she was condemned accordingly." I will now inform the House, on my own responsibility, that I saw this vessel loading in the port of New York with a cargo of cotton of different kinds, and some logwood, and that I saw the documents, and of my own knowledge, can state, that the vessel and cargo were truly and bona fide American property, and sailed from New York for St. Sebastian's after the receipt of the Duke of Cadore's letter of 5th August, taken and sent into England in the month of November last, and now condemned. Here, sir, is the practical interpretation of the British cabinet in relation to their Orders in Council; it is worth more than all and any other means you can employ to obtain correct data on which we can form a correct opinion, it being a plain matter of fact. The old legerdemain is still going on. Sir William Scott belongs to the Privy Council, Marquis Wellesley also. Who can say, that there is not an understanding between them? I am sure I cannot. But, may we not presume that it has a squinting that way, especially when we peruse the correspondence to Mr. Pinkney, and observe that while the Marquis Wellesley is amusing him, Sir William Scott is condemning real bona fide American property.

My colleague told you that, of the articles of that part of the country you came from, and the articles of the growth of the State of New York, ninety-nine hundredths find a British market. I will insure my colleague that if he will persevere in those markets under the present state of things, it will terminate in the utter ruin of him who shall continue in that market, and shall do no other business but confine himself exclusively to a British market. He said that Great Britain arrests your vessels and saves them from the Emperor of France. Very true, sir; but she takes good care to appropriate the vessels and cargoes to her own use. Of what consequence is it to an American to be told that this one or that one robbed him the most? It makes no difference to him; he knows, however, that he has lost his property between them. My colleague seemed to argue as though this bill was a non-intercourse altogether with England. No such thing. He may export to that country when and where he pleases in her dominions, but cannot import from them; but I will assure him that he shall be met with such heavy impositions and restrictions, that he will very soon regret that he had undertaken to send the produce of his country to a British market at the present time. It is very true, we can send our flour to Lisbon and Cadiz to a good market, but will that gentleman, or any other, undertake to say that a market for the produce of his country shall depend upon the precarious issue of a doubtful battle? What would be the consequence if the battle should turn in favor of the French Emperor, on the markets of Lisbon and Cadiz? Could we then go there, if we do not comply with the contract of our own law of May 1st, 1810?

When I hear of French privateers taking your vessels near your own shores; a British schooner firing into one of your regular packet coasters from New York to Charleston, escaped only by superior sailing, and the same schooner, off Charleston light-house, forcibly enter one of your innocent trading vessels, and peremptorily demand a citizen of our country, who had a regular protection from the collector of Boston; and, on being asked, why the man was detained? the answer was, "We want men, and we will have them."—Is it possible that such outrageous conduct can be called an affair? I do hope we shall soon make use of more energetic and stronger arguments than we have heretofore done, in order to protect the liberty of the citizen in his person and in his property; and, when in order, I will bring forward a motion to that effect.

Mr. BLAISDELL next took the floor. He went into a lengthy examination of the present and past state of our foreign relations, arraigning the measures of the Administration for several years past, and deprecating the passage of the present bill, as merely a continuation of the system of the past five years. When he had been speaking half an hour, or thereabouts, it was discovered that a quorum of the House was not present, several members having at once withdrawn from the House.

A motion was then made by Mr. WRIGHT, (at quarter past eleven,) to adjourn, and decided in the negative—yeas 10, nays 65, as follows:

NAYS—Lemuel J. Alston, Willis Alston, jun., William Anderson, David Bard, Burwell Bassett, William W. Bibb, Robert Brown, William A. Burwell, William Butler, Joseph Calhoun, Langdon Chelms, Matthew Clay, James Cochran, William Crawford, Richard Cutts, John Dawson, Joseph Desha, John W. Epes, William Findley, Meshack Franklin, Barzillai Gannett, Gideon Gardner, Thomas Gholson, Peterson Goodwyn, James Holland, Jacob Hufty, Ebenezer Huntington, Richard M. Johnson, Thomas Kenan, William Kennedy, Aaron Lyle, Alexander McKim, William McKinley, Pleasant M. Miller, John Montgomery, Nicholas R. Moore, Thomas Moore, Jeremiah Morrow, Gurdon S. Mumford, Thomas Newbold, Thomas Newton, John Nicholson, Peter B. Porter, John Rea of Pennsylvania, John Rhea of Tennessee, Matthias Richards, Samuel Ringgold, John Roane, Erastus Root, Ebenezer Sage, Thomas Sammons, Ebenezer Seaver, Samuel Shaw, Dennis Smelt, John Smilie, George Smith, Henry Southard, John Thompson, Uri Tracy, George M. Troup, Charles Turner, jr., Robert Weakley, Robert Whitehill, Ezekiel Whitman, and Robert Witherspoon.

Mr. BLAISDELL proceeded in his speech.

It afterwards appeared that there was not a quorum. Several members having withdrawn, a motion to adjourn was made without effect eight only voting for it.

A quorum appeared, and Mr. BLAISDELL again proceeded in his historical review of the events of the last year, and analysis of the documents respecting our foreign relations, presented to Congress at the present session. The following are his remarks entire:

Mr. BLAISDELL.—Mr. Speaker: Nothing would induce me to address you at this late hour, while there is so great a commotion in, and so many tokens of impatience manifested by, the House, but a sense of duty, and a desire to lend my feeble aid, in arresting the progress of a measure which, in my opinion, involves a question of no less importance than whether we are prepared, after having been insulted, robbed, and deceived, by the French Emperor, to follow the fatal example of the petty servile States of Europe, and throw this people into the embraces of that monster, at whose perfidy and corruption Lucifer blushes and Hell itself stands astonished. If I understand the amendment of the honorable gentleman from Virginia, its principle object is to renew the non-intercourse of 1809, so far as it respects Great Britain, which was previously attempted to be revived by the proclamation of the President of the second of November last. I should have supposed that, rather than have made so glaring a confession that that State paper had misstated fact, the gentleman would have been dissuaded from his darling object, the non-intercourse. But it seems that when it comes in competition with the views of Napoleon, the veracity of the President must be sacrificed. But, sir, convinced as I am, that our paper war, which has been applied to all purposes, even to calling out the army, raising the militia, pressing the horses, &c., and sending them on an expedition the distance of five hundred miles, with express orders not to fight, has damned the character of this Government, broken down the spirit of the nation, embarrassed our citizens, and emptied the late overflowing Treasury, so as to render the resort to borrowing necessary; I cannot but hope that the amendment on your table will be rejected to give place to an amendment offered some days ago by an honorable gentleman from New York, (Mr. EMOTT,) when this bill was under discussion in Committee of the Whole.

Sir, if I understand that amendment, it went to suspend the whole restrictive system, except the third section of the law of May last, which saves fines and forfeitures incurred under our various restrictions. This amendment, to be sure, changes the position recommended by the Executive, but not much more than the bill, with the addition of the amendment now under consideration. Although it becomes this House to pay due deference to Executive recommendations, yet, if there are good reasons for a departure from such recommendations, it equally becomes the members of this House, out of a regard to the correctness of their own proceedings, to make such a departure correspond with the reasons which produced it. The position recommended by the Executive made its first appearance in a short paragraph in the President's Message, recommending such a modification of the law of May last, as would remove all doubts as to its exposition and execution; for the details of such modification we are referred to the report of the Secretary of the Treasury. In this report we find a project recommended to enforce the non-importation against English merchandise of every kind and from every country. In the first place, by making the proclamation of the President, declaring that the French edicts had ceased to violate our neutral commerce on the first day of November last, the only evidence of that fact; and in the second place, by authorizing the officers of the Army and Navy to enter ships, dwelling-houses, stores, or any other place, to search for and seize merchandise suspected of being imported contrary to law, and making a donation of the boon so seized to the wretch who should be hardy enough, in defiance of all moral obligation, thus to rob his neighbor; and in the third place, by declaring all merchandise so seized in the Northern section of the Union, adjoining the British provinces, to be forfeited, unless by a palpable inversion of the rule of evidence in all other cases, and even in this case, adopted in all other sections of the Union, he is able to prove that the merchandise was legally imported and the duties paid—with many other provisions, all of which have been laid before this House, in the first bill on the subject reported by the Committee of Foreign Relations, the details of which are too well recollected to need pointing out, or to be suffered to meet a public investigation at this time.

But, sir, with all due deference to the high ministerial officer who recommended the project, and likewise to the honorable committee who reported the bill, I may be allowed to pay it the compliment of saying that, in my opinion, previous to the reign of that tyrant, who, by a military force, aided by projects of this kind, has destroyed the sanctuary of justice, and has spread pillage, debauchery, robbery, and death, throughout the greater part of Europe; such a bill as that would have been scouted from this Hall as the production of a madman. But on receiving the Message of the President, covering the letters of Mr. Russell, the American Chargé des Affaires at Paris, stating that American vessels, loaded with bona fide property of American citizens, had been seized and sequestered in the ports of France, under the Berlin and Milan decrees, as late as the 9th of December, doubts seemed to arise in this House, whether the decrees had ceased to operate on the first of November, as the President had declared. And the bill was sent back to the committee, for the purpose, as I understood, of bringing in a bill to suspend the operation of the law of May last, until we should hear from France, whether the Emperor had disavowed those seizures, and whether the decrees had actually ceased to operate on the first of November. And I did understand the honorable chairman of the committee, and several other gentlemen on the other side of the House, to say on that occasion, that if, after we had new arrivals from France, that did not prove to be the case, they should be as ready as any gentleman to repeal the whole code of restrictive laws until the Emperor should learn to respect our rights. What evidence have we had since to give us a more favorable prospect, as it respects the revocation of the decrees? Not a syllable. But, on the other hand, we have conclusive evidence that they were not so revoked that their operation ceased on that day.

If it be asked where this evidence appears, the answer is ready. In the first place, by the letter of the Grand Judge, the Duke of Massa, to the President of the Council of Prizes, as also by the letter of the Minister of Finance to the Director General of the Customs, both dated the 25th of December, fifteen days after the manly remonstrance of Mr. Russell, in the case of the Orleans Packet; in which remonstrance he states the outrageous conduct of the custom-house officers, and requests a prompt and speedy disavowal of the seizures, and that the property be again placed in the hands of the owners. But, sir, is there anything in these two letters which looks like a disavowal of the seizure in express violation of the promise of the Duke of Cadore? No, sir, although these letters were written fifteen days after the remonstrance of Mr. Russell. Instead of this they both agree that the decrees did not cease to operate on the first of November, but that the property taken with the Orleans Packet, and all the property which should be seized between the first of November and the second of February, must remain in depot to wait the pleasure of the Emperor, on our causing our rights to be respected by England.

But how, Mr. Speaker, are we to cause our rights to be respected? Is it by merely reviving the law of May last, as is the object of this amendment? Certainly this is not their meaning; for both these letters have reference to that law, as well as the proclamation of the President giving it effect, and to the circular of the Secretary of the Treasury, addressed to the collectors of the several ports, enjoining a strict execution of that law. No, sir, this is not what is to be done, which will satisfy the Emperor. He who flatters himself that this will be sufficient, shuts his eyes against official evidence to the contrary; as well in the above recited letters, written with a perfect knowledge of the performance on our part, and the promise of a performance on the part of France on the first day of November, as in the letter of the French Minister in the United States on the 12th of December, in which we are told that the French restrictions on our commerce are not to cease, but only on the result of firm and energetic measures to be adopted and persevered in by the two Governments against the common enemy.

But shall I be told that the letters of the Grand Judge and Minister of Finance promised that the property taken from our citizens since 1st of November should be restored, if we cause the law to be carried into effect after the 2d day of February, and therefore we were to believe it and ought to wait until we hear whether that has been the case. For the honor of my Government, I hope not. Is it really come to this, that we are brought to acknowledge that the Duke of Cadore was correct when he told General Armstrong that His Majesty could place no reliance on the American Government? No, sir, if this be true, for heaven's sake let us not express it. But what is this amendment which re-enacts the law of May last, and such pitiful reasoning as I have heard on this occasion, but placing our seal to that infamous insinuation? The President, on the mere promise of the Minister of the Emperor, that the Berlin and Milan decrees should cease to operate on the first day of November, placed full faith and reliance on that promise, and issued his proclamation on the 2d, presuming the promise had been fulfilled—and, shall we say that the Emperor is justifiable in disbelieving the law of May last, solemnly enacted by the three branches of the Government and the President's proclamation, together with the Circular of the Secretary of the Treasury, enjoining the law to be carried into effect?

I hope, not, for if we are become so pitifully servile as this, well might Cadore, in his letter of February 14th, 1810, tell General Armstrong that the Americans were without just political views, without honor, and even independence. And if we, by adopting this amendment, condescend to justify the Emperor, in his insult upon the plighted faith of our Government, in my opinion we shall furnish the American people and the world with just ground to say Amen to the declaration of Cadore in that respect. Will any gentleman still say, that the decrees ceased to operate on the first of November, since we have had official information from the French Government itself, that our vessels are to be seized under these decrees until the second of February? I trust not. Those gentlemen who support this amendment, ought to recollect that the sections, which go to re enact the law of May last, contain a confession, that that law is not now in operation; for if the decrees did actually cease to operate on the first of November, no one doubts but the law is now in full force, without the provisions of this bill. When the honorable chairman of the committee first offered his amendment, a misunderstanding seemed to take place between him and two gentlemen on the opposite side of the House, viz. the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. WRIGHT,) and the gentleman from Tennessee, (Mr. RHEA,) which undoubtedly happened in this way. While the honorable chairman well knew that the decrees did not cease on the first of November; therefore to keep alive the spirit of the law of May, which gave England three months after they did cease, it became necessary to lengthen the time for her to revoke; and the other two gentlemen, as it would seem, really supposed, that, because Mr. Pinkney had said that Cadore's letter was precision itself, these decrees really did cease to operate agreeable to that promise; although we have the official information from Mr. Russell on our tables, that the Orleans Packet was the first case that had happened after the first of November, to which the Berlin and Milan decrees could have been applied, and that they were applied in that case, and that several late arrivals, which left France from twenty to twenty-five days afterwards, bring no information from him that a change had taken place, and had that been the case, he would certainly have communicated information to the Government before the rising of Congress. On the contrary, these arrivals confirm what he had stated, and say, that every vessel arriving in France shares the same fate. Mr. Speaker, until I heard those two gentlemen, I did suppose that no man of common sense could have believed a position, in such direct opposition to evidence. And from the opinion which I have of the discernment of the gentleman from Tennessee, I think I must have misunderstood him, while perhaps it may be improper to include the other gentleman in the supposition.

Sir, I seldom trouble the House with any observations of mine, nor is it my intention, at this time, to examine and expose all the winding and management which has been practised, to bring about such a state of things as to render plausible this measure at this time. I shall, however, examine the non-intercourse system from the date of the law of March, 1809, and inquire what was its professed object? What use has been made of it? And how it has been regarded by the belligerents? And also notice some of its effects upon our own citizens as well as upon the Treasury. What must be the inevitable consequence if this measure is suffered to go into effect? I take it to amount to an entire non-importation of any of the articles, products, or manufactures of more than three-fourths of the civilized world, to which our merchants would, at this time, run the risk of attempting voyages; for, from the Continent of Europe no one returns unless at the expense of this Government. The dominions of Great Britain, including the East and West Indies, as well as her European dominions, and those on the American Continent, are immense. The products of these various countries formed a principal part of those importations of the last year, which, while the non-intercourse slept, gave new life and vigor to every branch of business. Our seaports, which the year before presented the gloomy appearance of cities besieged by a hostile foe, again resumed the appearance of enterprise, industry, and wealth. Thousands, who in 1809 were either a burden to their friends, in the poor-house, or begging their bread in the streets, were in 1810 enjoying the fruits of their industry in a comfortable supply of the necessaries of life, while the farmer and planter sowed his seed and cultivated his field, with the comfortable prospect that his crop would not decay on his hand for want of a market. Now, sir, although exportation is not interdicted by this bill, yet I apprehend the result will be much the same. I can hardly be expected that Great Britain, who gentlemen on the other side of the House are fond of considering as the cause of all our commercial distress, will condescend to pay us specie for our produce, while our ports are closed, not only against her shipping of all kinds, but against every article of her products and manufactures, as well as those of her colonies and dependencies, while they are open to those of her enemy. Again, what was the effect of the non-intercourse in 1809 upon our Treasury? In addition to the bankruptcy and wretchedness spread over the face of the whole country, we are informed by the annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury, laid on our tables, that the net revenue arising from duties on merchandise and tonnage, accruing during that year, amounted to only $6,527,000, while we are informed in the same report, that this source of revenue in the three first quarters of the year 1810, while commerce was free, amounted to a sum exceeding $7,250,000, and the Secretary adds, that he believed the whole revenue arising from duties on merchandise and tonnage for that year would amount to more than $12,000,000; making an increase in this year, when commerce was unshackled, of $5,473,000, notwithstanding all the robberies of Napoleon, which probably amounted to more than forty millions, a free importation of the avails of which would have greatly increased the revenue of that year. From this view of the subject, we find a deficit in the revenue of 1809, caused by this measure, of $5,473,000, and, in anticipation of the effects of the law now about to be enacted, the Secretary of the Treasury has, in the same report, recommended an immediate additional duty to be laid upon importations, which, together with the high duties already established by law, he thinks will not amount to more than $8,000,000, making an anticipated deficiency in the next year's revenue, occasioned by this measure, of $4,000,000 compared with that of 1810. But if we compare the revenue arising from duties on merchandise and tonnage during the year 1809, while commerce was restricted by the non-intercourse, with what it was in 1807, while it was unshackled, we shall find a deficiency of about $11,000,000.

From this view of the subject, which is taken from authentic documents, which I invite gentlemen to controvert if they have it in their power, it is demonstrated that if we suffered this system to go into operation, we are not only to again reduce our citizens to a state of bankruptcy in their private fortunes, while loaded with additional taxes, but, notwithstanding the aid of these additional taxes, our Treasury is, if possible, to be reduced to a more complete state of bankruptcy than at present. I put it to gentlemen, who are in the confidence of the Cabinet, to say, why we are called upon again to plunge this nation into such a state of poverty and wretchedness? Is it necessary as a measure of self-defence, as the only mode of resistance which will bring England to terms? For myself I should suppose that our late experiment in this species of warfare, at which France took so much offence, as to take occasion to seize and confiscate the property of American citizens, to the amount of $40,000,000, which rendered necessary an appropriation of $80,000 during the present session, in order to enable those of our citizens, who had been thus robbed and plundered, to revisit their native shores, afforded a spectacle too humiliating to suffer us to make another attempt so soon, and before we have so far recovered from the effects of our late experiment as to be able to defray the ordinary expenses of government without having recourse to annual loans for the purpose. Are we bound to adopt this measure on account of the faith of Government being pledged to France by the law of May last?

Mr. Speaker, in answering this inquiry, I must be indulged to begin with the non-intercourse of March, 1809—notice its effects upon the belligerents and on our own citizens, as well as the law of May last—and the management of that law, so as to render plausible the measure now under consideration. It may not be amiss, while we trace this subject, to have our eye upon the position marked out by that great and good man, President WASHINGTON, and published to the world in his proclamation of neutrality. But, to begin with the non-intercourse of March, 1809, which same measure was proposed by Mr. Madison, previous to the Jay Treaty, and which could at that time have been put to silence only by the influence of a WASHINGTON, who, instead of trying to provoke England to a war, determined to send a Minister to demand justice. And, Mr. Speaker, painful as it is to recollect from whence we are fallen, the voice of the American Government at that time commanded respect, and the object was obtained in the restoration of the property of our citizens, agreeably to an adjustment and estimate of a Board of Commissioners—a majority of whom were Americans—and a Treaty of Amity, Commerce, and Navigation, was entered into with that nation by Mr. Jay, which, although condemned by that class who now manage the helm of State, yet history furnishes no example of any nation increasing so rapidly in wealth and commercial strength as this nation did, until the commercial part of that treaty expired—that part being temporary.

But, to return to the law of March, 1809, you will recollect, sir, that the minority, whose pride it is to follow the example of a WASHINGTON, opposed that law as unnecessary and impolitic, and the Journals show that they voted against it; but the President (Mr. Jefferson) hailed it as the favorite of his Secretary, (Mr. Madison,) and cordially gave it his signature. And one of its mighty effects has been to transfer forty millions of the property of our citizens into the coffers of Napoleon, to aid him in his project for obtaining the liberty of the seas. This law was immediately published and sent to our Ministers at London and Paris, as it held out both threats and flattery to England and France, as an inducement to them to repeal their unjust edicts, although it was well understood at the time as operating entirely and only against the former, as France could have no intercourse with us while at war with England.

Here give me leave to inquire what has been the further effect of this law. It seems England, although she saw that if it had any operation at all, it operated only against her, was willing to consider it as a municipal regulation of our own, and treated it as such, while Bonaparte at first, and for ten months, passed it over as inoffensive to him, until our vessels, which had been shut up in our ports by its elder sister, the embargo, having got released from that strong measure, flocked into the ports of France, Spain, Holland, and Naples, all under the immediate and entire control of France, when, on the 23d March, an order was issued by his gracious and loving Majesty to seize and confiscate the property of our citizens in all those countries; which property is, by the best calculation, estimated at more than forty millions. And you will perceive, Mr. Speaker, that the Duke of Cadore saw, that, by suffering the law to pass unnoticed, till our property released from the embargo had filled nearly every port in Europe, under French control, and then issuing an order which was to have a retrospective operation of ten months, was such a gross outrage upon every principle of honor and justice, as well as the usages of public law, that he, in a letter to General Armstrong, of the 5th August, 1810, attempts to excuse the piratical transaction, by saying that the Emperor knew nothing of the law of March, until very lately. But, I pray gentlemen to take notice that General Armstrong, in his letter to Cadore of the 10th of March, (five months before the one just recited from Cadore,) asserts that this law was communicated to him in the month of June or July preceding—one whole year before the declaration made by Cadore.

But, to pursue this subject, on the 1st day of May, 1810, while this robbery, I ought to presume, was unknown to the Executive—certainly to the people—this non-intercourse law was repealed; but the majority, for wise purposes, I presume, did, in the same law that repealed the non-intercourse, give the President power, in case England or France should, before the 1st day of March, so revoke or modify her edicts as that they should cease to violate the neutral commerce of the United States, to declare the same by proclamation; in which case, the non-intercourse should be revived against the nation neglecting to revoke or modify her edicts, in like manner, for the space of three months after the date of such proclamation. And you will recollect, sir, that this law was also opposed by the minority, not so much, perhaps, because they suspected either the integrity or impartiality of the President, as because they thought it unconstitutional to commit a power to the Executive which was, in its nature and effect, an act of legislation, viz: to revive a law at his discretion which was to affect the great interest of the nation, and might result in war. I say, at his discretion; and I ask gentlemen to take notice that the law reads, “so revoke or modify.” This law was also sent by the President to our Ministers at London and Paris, as he states in his Message. But, what was it sent there for? Only to be used as an inducement to those nations to revoke their unjust edicts, which was the avowed object of the provision when it passed. And, if sent there for that purpose, it would seem, that, to have acted a neutral part, it ought to have been used alike at the palaces of St. Cloud and St. James. But, Mr. Speaker, what was the fact? Here we may learn the management of which I spoke when I first addressed you. This law, which you will perceive was in the nature of a generous overture made to the belligerent who first revoked his edicts, changed its character when offered to the other belligerent, who should neglect to revoke the obnoxious edicts until after his enemy had done so; and, instead of being a generous offer, contained a threat, that if she did not revoke, we should shut our ports against her products, while they should be open to those of her enemy. And this is the light in which it was viewed by our Government, as will be seen in Mr. Smith’s letter to General Armstrong, of the 5th day of June, 1810, (printed documents, p. 35,) in these words: “It might be added, that the form in which the law now presents the overture, is as well calculated as the overture itself to gain a favorable attention, inasmuch as it may be regarded by the belligerent first accepting of it as a promise to itself and a threat only to its adversary.” For this view of the subject, gentlemen will perceive that it is much more agreeable to close any matter in dispute upon a generous offer for so doing, than it would be to do so while threatened by their opponent that if it is not done they must suffer the consequence of their own folly and his vengeance. Now, in looking through the documents, I mistake if gentlemen have not discovered some management in this business, so that while the law was presented to France as an offer made to herself, it should be presented to England in no other character than that of a threat. It seems that the first correspondence with our Minister which we are suffered to see, is a letter from Mr. Smith to Mr. Pinkney, of the 22d May; although it appears from that letter that the Secretary of State had sent a copy of the law in a previous letter of the 4th of that month to Mr. Pinkney, as also another copy in the letter of the 22d; but we hear nothing of instructions in either to use this new overture, which the law presents, to the best advantage at the Court of St. James, while it retained its character of an offer made to that Government. Indeed, it would seem most natural to suppose that the instructions given in this business were contained in the letter of the 4th, which was the first enclosing a copy of the law. But, at this we are not suffered to look; nor at the one sent to General Armstrong, of the same date, which was also the first to him enclosing a copy of the law.

But, Mr. Speaker, as we are not suffered to see the first correspondence on this important business, which we are called upon by the Executive to carry into effect by a new act of legislation, it becomes doubly our duty to examine well this letter of the twenty-second, and see what that treats of, and whether it compares with the first we are suffered to see, sent to General Armstrong on this subject. In this letter to Mr. Pinkney of the twenty-second, the Secretary commences, as he says, with much surprise, that Great Britain had not revoked her blockades, and that she had not sent a man of rank to replace Mr. Jackson; and, after having dwelt at great length on the latter of these subjects, he mentions that he had sent a copy of the law, as also another, in his letter of the fourth of that month, and tells Mr. Pinkney to let the British Government know that the provisions of the law would be carried into effect, but not a syllable of proffering it as an offer made to that Government and a threat to France. But, instead of this, the Secretary selects two subjects, which he must have known would be difficult to close, and tells Mr. Pinkney that if another Minister was not sent to replace Mr. Jackson, to let the British Government know that he would return to the United States. And as though this was not sufficient to prevent the British Government from closing with the condition of the new overture, the attack on the Chesapeake must be settled in a manner agreeable to the propositions made to Mr. Rose and Mr. Erskine, which he might well know would not be done, as the British Government had told him it could not be closed in that way. On the first of July, Mr. Pinkney acknowledges Mr. Smith's letter of the twenty-second of May, and very properly goes on to execute the instructions it contained as to the British Government sending a man of rank to replace Mr. Jackson, &c. And, in my opinion, very properly notices the scrap of instructions it contained, respecting the law of May last, by merely mentioning, that while he is engaged with Lord Wellesley on these other subjects, he thinks he shall draw his attention to the non-intercourse law, but I find no account of his ever presenting the law to that Government.

Now, Mr. Speaker, while we see in this letter of the twenty-second the substance of all we are permitted to see of the use to be made by Mr. Pinkney of this law, as an inducement to the British Government to revoke the Orders in Council, let us examine what was the course pursued towards the French Government to induce it to take advantage of the law, while it retained the character of a favorable overture, so that the British Government should have to meet it as a threat, or as a rod held over them to procure the revocation of their edicts. In order to do this, I shall examine the first letter which is suffered to come to public view, from Secretary Smith to General Armstrong, after the date of the law of May first. This bears the date of June fifth, documents, page 34. In this, we find that he had sent two before, each one enclosing a copy of the law, and no doubt both containing instructions what use to make of it. For we find, even in this third letter, that Mr. Smith tells General Armstrong, (to use his own words,) "If there be sincerity in the language held at different times by the French Government, and especially in the late overture to proceed to amicable and just arrangements in the case of our refusal to submit to the British Orders in Council, (not blockades,) no pretext can be found for longer declining to put an end to the decrees of which the United States have so justly complained." And here, I entreat gentlemen to notice that this is the first ground stated by our Government to that of France, as being that which would be insisted upon from England—a compliance on her part required to entitle her to the provisions of this law, viz., her relinquishing the Orders in Council. We may here notice, that Mr. Smith adds, as a further inducement to France to take advantage of the law, while it retained the character of a favorable overture, "that by putting in force the non-intercourse against England, agreeable to the terms of this statute, that the very species of resistance would be made which France has been constantly representing as the most efficacious." But, Mr. Smith goes still farther in his instructions, and tells General Armstrong, "that it may be added, that in the form in which the law now presents the overture, it is as well calculated as the overture itself to gain a favorable attention, inasmuch as it may be regarded by the belligerent first accepting it as a promise to itself, and a threat only to its adversary." In this letter, we find that the Secretary states a first ground, which was necessary in the first instance to entitle the French Government to the provisions of this law. What was this ground? Why, he tells General Armstrong to let the French Government understand that the President would not proceed to give the law effect, if the restoration of the property of our citizens be finally refused; and closes his letter by directing him to let that Government know that the only ground, short of a preliminary restoration of the property, on which the contemplated arrangement could take place, would be an understanding that the confiscation was reversible, and that it would become immediately the subject of discussion, with a reasonable prospect of justice to our injured citizens. Was this the ground on which the subject was placed? It seems so, from this official letter of the Secretary. Yes, sir, it was; and with due deference, I may be allowed to say, the only honorable and just ground; and if the American Government had possessed independence enough to have still occupied this ground, we would not have had the mortification to discuss the bill on the table at this time. But, instead of this, although Mr. Smith had just received Cadore's insulting letter, in which he more than insinuates that, as a Government and nation, we are destitute of just political views, without honor, energy, or even independence, and closes by letting our Government know of the seizure and sale of the property of our citizens in all the ports of Europe under French control; what was the conduct of the American Government on this occasion? I entreat gentlemen to take notice, that, with this horrid picture of insult and robbery fresh in their recollection, the same conciliatory disposition, guided by the principles of neutrality, which dismissed a British Minister for an implied insult, induced Mr. Smith to inform General Armstrong that the President thought it best not to make any animadversions on that subject at that time. (Printed documents, page 34.) The next letter on this subject worthy of notice, is one of the 5th of July, in which Mr. Smith acknowledges the receipt of information, that the property which he had said in his last must be restored, in order to entitle France to the American commerce while it was denied to England, was sold, and the proceeds deposited in the caisse priée—privy purse of the Emperor. Here, indeed, Mr. Smith seems to have almost forgot himself, and to conceive he was giving instructions how to proceed with a British Minister, and tells General Armstrong to demand every reparation of which the subject was susceptible. But, Mr. Speaker, is it not worthy of notice that he closes even this spirited letter, with such a history of piracy and insult then on his desk before him, by quitting the ground he had taken in his letter of the fifth of June, and, instead of a proposed renewal of the non-intercourse against England, if she should neglect to withdraw her Orders in Council, which was the only ground taken by the President with Mr. Erskine, and also the only thing contemplated when the law of May last was passed, as also the only ground taken by himself only one month before, (having, it is presumed, heard from France in the interval,) he condescends to tell the General, that if France should demand it, he might give her to understand that it was the President's intention to renew the non-intercourse against England, if she did not also rescind her blockades. It is here again to be noticed, that he again repeats, what he had before told General Armstrong, that a restoration of the property was indispensable, in order to a renewal of the non-intercourse against England.

But again: will, I had like to have said, the servile manner, in which a rescinding the blockade is coupled as a condition with the withdrawing the Orders in Council, escape notice? Immediately on instructing General Armstrong to state to the French Government that a repeal of the blockade of eighteen hundred and six would be insisted on, the Secretary adds: "You will 'press the reasonableness of permitting the United States to proceed in such way as they may 'think proper, in relation to any subsequent 'blockades, or any other blockades not against 'France,' which to me reads in this way, i. e., as we have, at the request of the French Government, receded from our first ground, and included blockades also, you are instructed humbly to request Bonaparte to permit us to do our own business in our own way in future. My God! After all this, to see the Government of my country soliciting, at the feet of the Emperor of France for permission to manage their own affairs in their own way! What American can read this correspondence without laying his hand upon his heart and exclaiming, O my Government, my Government, now is the gold become dim, and the most fine gold changed! The next thing we meet with, is Mr. Smith's letter of the 2d of November, to General Armstrong, enclosing the President's proclamation, declaring the edicts of France so revoked, as that they ceased to violate the neutral commerce of the United States, and of course the non-intercourse to be revived against England after the 2d of February, if she did not in the meantime revoke her orders, which, after the ground taken, and so often repeated, with respect to the restoration of the property, must astonish every American. But we have still this as a consolation, that Mr. Smith, notwithstanding he had been told by the Duke of Cadore that it was impossible any compromise could take place on that subject, says in the letter enclosing the proclamation that the President presumes that the requisitions contained in his letter of the 5th of July, as to the restoration of the property, will have been satisfied. In the name of God, Mr. Speaker, what grounds had he for this presumption? In addition to this, in his letter of the 5th of November, Mr. Smith instructs General Armstrong to let the Emperor know that the third section of the law of March, 1809, at which he took so much offence, was not intended to operate against his subjects, but against our own citizens. And although this may be, and probably is, true, yet a confession of this kind, after so recent and aggravated insult and violence, must I think be sickening to the American people, and Napoleon himself will be at a loss to know why it was made unless to testify our loyalty. But our loyalty to the contrary notwithstanding, the Duke of Cadore in his letter to General Armstrong of the 12th of September, in answer to one from him of the 7th of that month, tells the General, that the Emperor sees with pleasure that the Americans are far from acknowledging the tyrannical principles of English legislation, yet informs him that as to the merchandise confiscated, it having been confiscated as a measure of reprisal, the principles of reprisal must be the law in that affair.

Now, Mr. Speaker, after seeing how the law of May, 1810, has been used with the French Government, and for aught we know, not used at all with that of England, until it had assumed the character of a threat, together with the various changes of position taken by our Government in this business, I think it demonstrates a management, which, if duly examined, will not leave much doubt whether it be indispensably necessary to suffer this law to go into operation, either as a measure of resistance against England, or of good faith towards France. For instance, at one time, England must repeal her Orders in Council to entitle her to the benefit of the law; at another, viz: after hearing from France the condition must include a repeal of the blockades also, and on the part of France, she must rescind her decrees and restore the property, then a promise is to be accepted as it respects the property, and, to top the climax, the proclamation issues on the presumption of an agreement having taken place, on the part of France, that the property shall be restored. But after all this we are told by Cadore, on the 12th of September, to be contented, for as to the property in question it will not be restored.

But, Mr. Speaker, it seems that the President, in compliance with a resolution of the House of the 21st of December, has furnished documents which put the question beyond a doubt, that the proclamation was issued, declaring that the French decrees were repealed, so that they ceased to violate the neutral commerce of the United States, when, to say the least, he had no official information of the fact, or, if he had, he has taken care to keep it to himself. Mr. Smith, in his letter to Turreau, of the 18th of December, is compelled to say in effect, that the French restrictions on our commerce are not rescinded, or to use his own words: "If, then, for the revoked 'decrees, municipal laws producing the same commercial effect have been substituted, the mode 'only, and not the measure, has undergone an 'alteration." In this situation, I should like to be informed so to modify our laws as to carry the non-importation against England and her dependencies forcibly into effect, and thus destroy the small remains of our commerce, the effects of which we have so recently felt at the Treasury, since the repeal of the non-intercourse law in May last, as I have already shown from the Secretary's report. This information I have not as yet been able to obtain, although I have sought for it, unless I resort to the last paragraph in General Turreau's letter of December 12, to Mr. Secretary Smith, in answer to one from the Secretary, remonstrating against the exclusion of cotton and tobacco from the ports of France. In reply to which he says, among other things, that he thinks some modification will take place in this respect, but tells him that this will depend upon the firm and persevering measures to be pursued by the two Governments against the common enemy. In this intimation of his Imperial Majesty through his Minister, which, by-the-by, is not the first of the kind, will I fancy be found the only necessity of suffering this measure to go into operation. And are gentlemen prepared to obey? I trust not. No, sir, I will not for a moment entertain so degrading an idea. But, firmly believing the contrary, I still hope the amendment will be rejected, and with it the whole restrictive system, until France shall learn to respect our rights.

Mr. Speaker, I had here intended to have closed my remarks, had I not heard the declarations of several gentlemen on the other side of the House against the judicious observations of the gentleman from New York, (Mr. EMOTT,) in support of the amendment which he did himself the honor to submit. But, since the uncandid aspersions so liberally bestowed on that occasion, I can expect nothing but to be denounced as an opposer of my Government, if not as an enemy to my country. But, sir, to both these charges I shall plead not guilty, and I must still be indulged while I repeat part of the remarks I have made on the documents, and sum up the evidence to prove the fallacy of these charges. And here give me leave to ask, what were the conditions of the law of May last as between this Government and that of France? I take it to be, that if France should so revoke or modify her edicts, as that they should cease to violate our neutral commerce, and if Great Britain should not also revoke in a given time, then the non-intercourse was to go into effect against her agreeably to the law of May last. What did the Administration conceive that the French Government must do in order so to revoke or modify her edicts that they might cease to violate our neutral commerce? Sir, the opinion of the Executive on this interesting question can only be ascertained by examining the correspondence which passed between the Secretary of State and General Armstrong on this subject. And to that correspondence, and the conduct of the French Government, I shall resort for that opinion. And to this end I shall proceed to examine the first letter from Mr. Secretary Smith to General Armstrong, which is suffered to come to public view, after the law of May first, and which enclosed a copy of that law; which is his of June fifth, page 34 of the documents, in which he tells the General to let the French Government know, that if the property forcibly seized and taken from our citizens had been sold, and a restoration finally refused, that the President would not proceed to carry the non-intercourse into effect with Great Britain; and the Secretary also instructs Gen. Armstrong to let the French Government understand, that the only ground, short of a preliminary restoration of the property, would be a declaration that the confiscations were reversible, and that it should become immediately the subject of discussion, with a reasonable prospect of justice to our injured citizens.

The next letter from the Secretary to General Armstrong on the subject, is one bearing date July 5th, in which the Secretary says to the General: "You have been already informed that, with the repeal of the French edicts must be combined the restoration of the property of our citizens, as an indispensable evidence of the justice of the French Government towards the United States, and upon this ground, and this alone, would the President proceed to give the law effect against Great Britain." The third letter of the Secretary to the General, which is worthy of notice, is that of July 17, in which he tells him that "he has dispatched Lieutenant Miller, in order to obtain early information of the disposition of the French Government in relation to the condition of the law of May, so that the President may have it in his power to lay the same before Congress at an early period of the session." The next letter which passed from the Secretary to General Armstrong, was one of the 2d of November, enclosing the President's proclamation, declaring the French edicts to be so revoked as that they would cease to operate on the 1st day of November, and, even in this letter, the General is instructed to make the French Government understand that, with the revocation of the Berlin and Milan decrees, must be combined the revocation of all the edicts of France violating our neutral rights, as, also, that the President had issued the proclamation on the presumption that the requisition contained in his letter of July 5th, respecting the restoration of the property of our citizens, had been complied with. Thus, sir, it appears that our Executive has insisted that, to have the French edicts so revoked as to cease to violate our neutral commerce, the property seized and held under the sanction of those decrees must be restored. Instead of being an opposer of the Government in this honorable attitude, I heartily approve of the position which was then taken. But, Mr. Speaker, what does the Executive say as to the French restrictions on our commerce being rescinded? The Secretary, in his letter of December 13, to the French Minister, while remonstrating against the exclusion of cotton and tobacco from the ports of France, among many other things of nearly the same import, says: "If, then, for the revoked decrees, municipal laws producing the same commercial effect have been substituted, the mode only, and not the measure, has undergone an alteration." Again, Mr. Speaker, what has been the conduct of the French Government in relation to a compliance with the law, as it had been explained by the Executive during the whole of this period? It will be recollected that Cadore, in his first letter on this subject, in answer to a remonstrance from General Armstrong against the unjust seizure and sequestration of the property of American citizens, in which remonstrance the General signifies the surprise of our Government at the outrageous act, and requests information as to the prospect of its being restored, tells the General that it is impossible any compromise should take place on the subject.

Mr. Speaker, to be sure, on the 5th of August, he tells General Armstrong that the Berlin and Milan decrees were revoked, and, on certain conditions, would cease to operate on the first of November. But, even in this part of the business, we have only the promise of the Minister, and not the act of the Emperor; and, it will be recollected that, at the date of the Berlin decree, when we were similarly circumstanced, we were told that it was the opinion of the man, and not the act of the Government. But, on this point, we have Mr. Russell's official letter of the 11th of December, testifying that the Berlin and Milan decrees did not cease to operate on the first of November, but, that the first case that had happened after that time, to which they could be applied, was that of the Orleans Packet, and that, on the 9th of December, they were applied in that case. We have, also, the two letters already mentioned of the Grand Judge and Minister of Finance, both confirming the position that they had not ceased to operate the fifty-five days after the 1st of November; and the news by several late arrivals says that every vessel which comes within their reach shares the same fate with the Orleans Packet. But, sir, as to the other parts of the requisition of our Government, viz: the restoration of the sequestered property, Cadore, in his letter of September 12, in answer to one from General Armstrong, of the 7th of that month, wherein the General requires a definitive answer, whether the Emperor would consider the restoration of the property as a subject of present or future negotiation; or, whether the act of His Majesty already taken in the seizure and sale of the property of our citizens is to be considered as conclusive against remuneration? To which plain questions Cadore condescends to be equally plain in his answers, and to tell the General that, as to the merchandise confiscated, it having been confiscated as a measure of reprisal, the principle of reprisal must be the law in that affair. And, last of all, the French Minister in the United States, in his letter of the 12th of December, in answer to one from the Secretary of State, remonstrating against the exclusion of cotton and tobacco from the ports of France, among other things, tells the Secretary, that he thinks some change will take place, but requests the Secretary not to mistake him; for, that this will not be a measure of chance, to take place on the part of the Emperor alone, but must be the result of firm and energetic measures, to be adopted and persevered in by the two Governments against the common enemy. Now, sir, for this short and correct statement, which, I trust, neither declamation nor sophistry will put down, as long as official documents are admitted in evidence, I would ask, who can say that we are bound by the law of the first of May last to renew the non-intercourse; (I will not say against England, but against ourselves,) and thus reduce, or even annihilate our revenue, and load our citizens with additional taxes, as, I trust, I have already shown, if this amendment is adopted?

Mr. Speaker, if I am to be called an enemy to my country for opposing this measure, under present circumstances, to my country I will appeal; being entirely willing that the honorable gentleman from Maryland (Mr. WRIGHT) and his friends should share the whole of the honor of advocating the right of the Emperor to take and withhold the property of our citizens. Sir, it creates no astonishment to hear that gentleman contend that we are bound by the law of May to carry the non-intercourse into effect against Great Britain, but, to hear a gentleman possessed of the discernment of the honorable chairman of the committee who reported this bill, make this declaration, is truly astonishing, when the reverse is the fact. I trust I have already shown that in every communication from our Executive to the French Government on the subject, that Government has been told that if, in connexion with the revocation of the decrees, the sequestered property was not given up, the non-intercourse would not be renewed against England. These several letters were communicated to this House, and published nearly three months since, and are, at this moment, in the hands of the British Government, and, by this tenure, that Government has a right to rest assured that the non-intercourse will not be renewed against them. Indeed, to believe the contrary, would be an insult to the plighted faith of the Executive.

Sir, I am sensible of the impatience of the House, and I can assure them that, aside from a sense of duty, nothing could have induced me to have undertaken the task I have attempted to perform. I shall, therefore, close my remarks, after having entered my solemn protest against the folly and madness of the project, and shall have done my duty when I have voted against the amendment.

Mr. BIGELOW then took the floor, and, immediately after he commenced, a quorum not being present, a motion to adjourn was lost, 55 to 14. A quorum appearing, Mr. B. proceeded. At a quarter before one o'clock, a quorum not appearing, a motion was made by Mr. KNICKERBACKER to adjourn—lost, ayes 8.

Mr. JOHNSON moved that the officers be sent out to notify the members to attend, and to compel their attendance. In doing so, he declared he was only influenced by motives resulting from a sense of duty, in consideration of the great quantity of public business before the House at the present session.

Mr. KNICKERBACKER opposed the motion on account of the lateness of the hour, and renewed the motion for adjournment, which was again negatived.

Mr. JOHNSON withdrew his motion, under the idea that a quorum was present.

Mr. GARDENIER renewed the motion to direct the attendance of members.

Mr. BURWELL, Mr. TAGGART, and Mr. BIGELOW, spoke against the motion, and Mr. RHEA, Mr. GARDENIER, and Mr. PORTER, in favor of it.

The arguments on the one hand were, the impropriety at this time of the night, at this season of the year, and on such an important subject, of bringing the members from their beds; and on the other, the urgency of the business, and the evident intention to delay or defeat this bill, with which many gentlemen had withdrawn from the House.

A motion was then made to adjourn, (at half-past one,) and decided as follows:

YEAS—Joseph Allen, Abijah Bigelow, Daniel Blaisdell, Barent Gardener, Nathaniel A. Haven, Herman Knickerbacker, Robert Le Roy Livingston, Benjamin Pickman, jun., Lewis B. Sturges, Benjamin Tallmadge, Killian K. Van Rensselaer, Laban Wheaton.

NAYS—Lemuel J. Alston, Willis Alston, jun., William Anderson, David Bard, Burwell Bassett, William W. Bibb, Robert Brown, William A. Burwell, William Butler, Joseph Calhoun, Langdon Cheves, Matthew Clay, James Cochran, William Crawford, Richard Cutts, John Dawson, Joseph Desha, John W. Eppes, William Findley, Meshack Franklin, Barzillai Gannett, Gideon Gardner, Thomas Gholson, Peterson Goodwyn, James Holland, Jacob Hufty, Richard M. Johnson, Thomas Kenan, Aaron Lyle, William McKinley, Pleasant M. Miller, John Montgomery, Nicholas R. Moore, Thomas Moore, Jeremiah Morrow, Gurdon S. Mumford, Thomas Newbold, Thomas Newton, John Nicholson, Peter B. Porter, Elisha R. Potter, John Rea of Pennsylvania, John Rhea of Tennessee, Matthias Richards, Samuel Ringgold, John Roane, Erastus Root, Ebenezer Sage, Thomas Sammons, Ebenezer Seaver, Samuel Shaw, Dennis Smelt, John Smilie, George Smith, Henry Southard, John Thompson, Uri Tracy, Charles Turner, jun., Robert Weakley, Robert Whitehill, Ezekiel Whitman, and Robert Witherspoon.

Mr. BIGELOW.—Mr. Speaker, I regret extremely that, at this late period of the session, and at this late hour of the night, the high sense of the duty which I feel that I owe to my constituents and to my country, should compel me to submit to the consideration of the House a few remarks upon this all-important subject. They will be of a general nature, candid, and as much as possible confined to the subject of debate.

Sir, on this occasion, I feel no disposition to censure the conduct of the President. Permit me, however, before I proceed to the subject, to notice a very singular remark of the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. ROSS.) That gentleman observed, "that when this bill was laid on your table, he was determined to vote against it; that he considered it wrong in principle, and injurious in its consequences; and that he should now vote against it, had not several gentlemen, particularly the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. QUINCY,) been so severe in their censures upon the conduct of the Administration. He felt it his duty to support the Administration, and should, therefore, vote for the bill, although he disliked it."

Sir, I apprehend the President will not feel under very great obligations to that gentleman for this kind of support. For myself, I am free to declare, that stronger reasons than those must operate upon my mind, before I can give my sanction to a measure professedly impolitic and unjust.

This bill, Mr. Speaker, is advocated on the ground that, by the law of May 1810, we are under obligations to France to prohibit commercial intercourse with Great Britain. If, sir, I rightly recollect, for I have not the law before me, the substance of the provision, as it respected France, was, that if she so revoked or modified her edicts and decrees, as that they should cease to violate our neutral commerce, and Great Britain refused, for three months, to pursue a similar course; then was this system of non-intercourse to commence, as it respects Great Britain.

Mr. Speaker, I deny that the faith of the nation is pledged by the law of May, 1810. It is neither a contract nor a treaty. To constitute a contract, two parties are necessary, at least. All writers upon the subject have so considered it; and sir, if one party can make a contract with another, without the knowledge, consent, or approbation, of the other, it is a new discovery, with which, as yet, I am unacquainted. Such, sir, is the nature of the contract referred to. The Congress was the only party concerned in making it. France knew nothing of it, it was made wholly without her consent or approbation. How, then, is the national faith plighted to France by that law? Sir, I know of but one way in which the faith of this nation can be pledged to another, and that is, by a treaty approved and ratified by the constituted authorities; and surely, sir, no gentleman will contend that this law amounted to a treaty. If, then, it was neither a contract nor a treaty, the faith of the nation is not pledged. The most you can make of it is, as was observed on a former occasion, by the honorable gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. RANDOLPH,) "that it is a rule of conduct for ourselves." But, sir, I am willing to admit, in case France had fairly and honestly complied with the conditions of the law, so often referred to, that good faith on our part might have required that we should pass the present bill. What was the condition to be performed on the part of France? Sir, she was to revoke and modify her decrees, so that they should cease to violate our neutral commerce. This has not been done. The Berlin and Milan decrees are not even nominally revoked. Look at the letters of Mr. Russell, our Chargé des Affaires at Paris, of the tenth of December last. Look at the letters of the Dukes of Massa and Gaeta, of the twenty-fifth of the same month. Look at her conduct subsequent to the first of November, the time when you were informed that those decrees would cease to operate. Has she not seized every vessel which has arrived at her ports since that period? Upon this point I will not waste the time of the House by attempting to show that those decrees are still in force, a fact, which has been already so fully and amply proved by the candid and able arguments of the honorable gentleman from New York, (Mr. EMOTT.)

But, sir, I will go further, and, for the sake of argument, admit, not only that the law of May, 1810, has all the binding force upon this nation of a treaty made by the regular, Constitutional authorities, but that the Berlin and Milan decrees were, on the fifth day of August last, actually revoked; and, after the first day of November, ceased to violate our neutral commerce. There is still another important point to be considered, and I hope gentlemen will attend to it with candor.

Sir, it is a principle well established by the law of nations, as well as by the laws of nature and reason, that when one nation, in consequence of revoking certain acts injurious to another nation, claims from the other nation the performance of a promise made on condition that those acts should be revoked, it is necessary that the nation thus claiming the fulfilment of the promise, should first, not only revoke those injurious acts, but it should also be done fairly and honestly, without subterfuge or reserve, and without, at the same time, adopting other measures equally injurious, and producing the same effects. Now, sir, admit that the declaration of the Duke de Cadore, in his letter of the 5th of August, 1810, that the Berlin and Milan decrees were revoked, and, after the first of November, would cease to violate our neutral commerce, was an actual revocation of those decrees; still, sir, if this was merely to amuse and deceive us, if another act equally injurious was at the same time substituted, will it be contended that France has, nevertheless, fairly complied with the conditions of your law? Sir, it is a very singular fact that, on this very fifth day of August, another decree was issued by the French Emperor, which was equally injurious, and amounted, in fact, to a prohibition of our commerce, as much as the Berlin and Milan decrees. I allude to the duties established by the Emperor on articles of American produce, which were so enormously high that the owner would prefer an abandonment of his cargo to a payment of the duties. Even this was insufficient; for, by a subsequent decree, various articles were prohibited, and those which were allowed must only be exported in vessels which should sail from Charleston or New York.

Is this, sir, that fair, that honest repeal of the Berlin and Milan decrees; is this that bona fide performance of the condition; that, ceasing to violate our neutral commerce, which lays us under such solemn obligations to France? Am I not, then, Mr. Speaker, authorized to say, that the condition of the law of May, 1810, has not been complied with? I trust, sir, as to this point, that the letter of the Secretary of State to Mr. Turreau, of the 18th of December last, will be considered as conclusive. In this letter, the Secretary, speaking of the enormous duties which have been mentioned, observes: "If, then, for the 'revoked decrees, municipal laws, producing the 'same commercial effect, have been substituted; 'the mode only, and not the measure, have undergone an alteration."

To my mind, sir, this insidious, this perfidious conduct, on the part of Napoleon, is infinitely more base, and merits the indignation of the American people infinitely more than would an open refusal to revoke the obnoxious decrees. It is an attempt, if I may be allowed the expression, to gull and deceive us, by an artful, intriguing policy, which ought to excite our jealousy, and rouse our highest resentments. I trust, sir, I have fairly shown that our faith is not plighted, that we are under no obligations to Napoleon. If in this I am correct, then the passage of the present bill is a mere question of policy and interest.

It would be a mere waste of time to attempt, by a reference to the past evils which have resulted from this restrictive system, to show the impolicy of its continuance. The bad effects already produced are but too well known. This, sir, is the favorable moment to erase it from your statute books; the policy and interest of the nation require it.

Let us examine, for a moment, the consequences of its continuance.

Do you believe, sir, that your merchants, a great portion of whose property has been seized by foreign nations, when the remnant of their vessels, which have escaped, shall, upon entering your own ports, be seized by your own custom-house officers, that they will be satisfied to lose the remainder of their property, in pursuance of your own laws? They will think it hard enough, that millions of their property have been seized by France, by Denmark, and by Sweden, without having the remainder seized on their return, and confiscated by their own Government. Surely, sir, they will require strong evidence of the fact, that your faith is plighted to France, before they will be satisfied with the measure you are about to adopt.

Mr. Speaker, I am not the Representative of merchants, I feel no peculiar interest in their favor; but I consider them a useful class of citizens; their interests are closely connected with the interests of your farmers; and, in this point of view, they are at least entitled to notice. Hitherto, your merchants have been noted for their fairness, and for the respect they have paid to your revenue laws. But, sir, after having their property plundered by France, by Denmark, and Sweden, will they not, when they learn that from a scrupulous regard to your faith plighted to France, a faith however which has no existence, you seize, with a few exceptions, all which return; will they not, I repeat it, endeavor to land their cargoes so as to escape the vigilance of your officers? Have you no apprehension that, when they have once learnt the art of smuggling to save their property from seizure and confiscation, they will afterwards practise it, to avoid the payment of duties? I fear that this system will have a tendency to corrupt the morals of your merchants, and from them it will extend throughout the country.

Sir, I will detain the House but a moment longer. Had this bill gone far enough; had the majority permitted amendments which would have secured the property of your merchants to a sufficient extent, much as I deprecate this restrictive system, and desirous as I am of embracing this favorable moment for its repeal, I might have been tempted to vote for the bill; as it is, I cannot but oppose it.

Mr. SAMMONS moved an adjournment.

Mr. BUTLER moved to send for the absent members. Although so many had deserted their duty, he hoped there were still enough left to compel the attendance of the remainder.

The motion to adjourn was lost, yeas 10.

The motion was then made to send for absent members.

Considerable conversation took place on the subject.

Mr. SMILIE expressed his hope that an adjournment would not take place on any account. He saw a determination in the minority to prevent the passage of the bill; and as the rules now stood, they had a power to do it by talking. In this state of things, and in the situation in which the minority now overruled the majority, it was imperiously required of those who remained at their post to compel the attendance of absentees.

The question was taken on Mr. BUTLER's motion, and carried, yeas 41.

At twenty minutes past two, the Doorkeeper was accordingly despatched for the absentees.

A motion was then made to adjourn, yeas 6, nays 62.

At ten minutes past three another member, viz: Mr. SAWYER, appeared.

A quorum not being present—

A motion was made to adjourn.—Lost, 40 to 18.

At half past three o'clock a call of the House was ordered. It appeared that there were seventy-one members, including the Speaker, wanting one of a quorum.

Mr. SOUTHARD stated the improbability of getting a quorum to attend to business, and his own inability to remain longer, and, therefore, moved an adjournment.

Mr. P. B. PORTER seconded the motion. He said he now saw the impossibility of getting a quorum; that whenever an additional member came in, a member was detached from a certain corps in the House, so as to leave the House continually wanting one of a quorum.

The motion was negatived, yeas 29, nays 31.

Several motions were made at different times for compulsory process; but it was the opinion of the Speaker that no such process could be issued unless a quorum was present.

Mr. SAMMONS again moved to adjourn, yeas 25, nays 28.

After further consideration, a motion to adjourn prevailed, 31 to 23.

The House adjourned after a most desultory and fatiguing session of eighteen hours, the last four of which a quorum was not present, nor could other members be induced to attend.

WEDNESDAY, February 27.

The House formed a quorum at half-past ten o'clock.

A motion was made by Mr. T. MOORE, and seconded, that the House do adjourn; and, the question being thereon taken, it was determined in the negative—yeas 5, nays 73.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill, entitled "An act for establishing trading-houses with the Indian tribes;" and the bill, entitled "An act to erect a light-house on Boon Island, in the State of Massachusetts, to place buoys off Cape Fear river, and to erect a beacon at New Inlet, in the State of North Carolina, and to place buoys at the entrance of the harbor of Edgartown, and to erect a column of stone on Cape Elizabeth, in the State of Massachusetts," with amendments to each; to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

On motion of Mr. JOHNSON, the bills were ordered to lie on the table.

COMMERCIAL INTERCOURSE.

The House resumed the unfinished business.

The question was taken, without debate, on the first section of the amendment proposed by Mr. EPPES, viz: "that which goes to authorize the President, whenever Great Britain shall have so revoked or modified, &c., to declare the fact, upon which the non-intercourse shall cease," &c.—and decided as follows:

The question then recurred on the second section proposed as an amendment, by Mr. EPPES, viz: declaring that, until the proclamation of the President declaring the revocation, the non-intercourse shall be in force in relation to Great Britain.

On this question the debate re-commenced.

Mr. GOLD.—Mr. Speaker, at a period when the civilized world is convulsed by continued war, to its centre; when the European continent is exhibiting the marks of ruthless conquest, and is threatened with all that barbarism, with which Atilla, with his invading hordes, overwhelmed the Roman world, it becomes the Councils of this nation to move with cautious steps on the theatre of our foreign relations; to move, sir, with a fixed eye on the great law of neutrality, and yield an implicit obedience to its high injunctions.

It eminently becomes, sir, the Government of this country, in all our concerns with the belligerents of Europe, to carry an even hand, to manifest to both a fair, impartial, and equal conduct. Without such a course, the consequences to our peace and prosperity, from the jealousy and violence of warring nations, are inevitable, and, with it, we can hardly promise ourselves exemption from aggressions and spoliation; such and so destructive is the spirit of the times. Need I, sir, to excite caution in legislation, refer the House to the consequences of the non-intercourse act, of the 1st of March, 1809; for, however, free from all exception from the belligerents was that act, yet France, in the wantonness of power, made it the pretext for the exercise of the rigorous right of reprisal by an additional decree, which, with the preceding, have, like the besom of destruction, swept our property from the ocean.

It was on that act, that the Rambouillet decree, of the 23d of March last, was founded for its sole justification; and so do the very terms of the decree, shameful and disgraceful as it is, import.

In reviewing the proceedings of our Government under the act of the 1st of May last, (the act upon which the President's proclamation for a non-importation with Great Britain is founded,) permit me, sir, to ask if the spirit of a fair and impartial neutrality, so eminently necessary in the critical situation of the United States, has guided our proceedings with the respective belligerents? By this act, if either of the belligerents rescinded its edicts, violating our neutral rights, the non-intercourse act was to be put in force against the other refusing to rescind, and the President, by proclamation, was to declare such fact of rescinding. Under this provision, sir, the President substituted a prospective engagement for a fact done; a promise for a performance; the future for the past, and hence, sir, have resulted our present difficulties; that crisis which bears so hard upon the American people. It is not, sir, my object to impeach the motives of the President in this ill-fated proceeding; I am to presume a love of country guided him; but it is impossible not to see in the measure a course indulgent to France, a construction upon the letter of the Duke de Cadore, of the 5th of August last, (touching the revocation of the decrees of Berlin and Milan,) the most favorable and advantageous to that country, and offensive to Great Britain. For, sir, notwithstanding the above proclamation, the noonday sun is not plainer than that those decrees are not revoked; nor indeed, sir, will they, in my opinion, ever be revoked under the above act. The utmost extent of our hopes, from the last despatches transmitting the official communication of the twenty-fifth of December last, from the Grand Judge Massa, and the Minister of Finance, Gaete, is, that our vessels (with their cargoes) seized in the ports of France since the first of November, in violation of the stipulation of the above letter of the 5th of August, and of all that is holden sacred among nations, may be at some future day, under some new and embarrassing conditions, flowing from the policy of Napoleon, restored to our suffering citizens. By the last paragraph of the above letter of the Minister of the Finances, it would seem that the Emperor and King has shut his eyes upon past engagements, and referred all that concerns us to the second day of February, when new toils are to be spread, as is to be presumed, for the unsuspecting, credulous, and confiding American merchant and navigator. Against the mass of evidence, that the French decrees are not revoked—evidence which is increased by the melancholy advices of every east wind—the honorable member (Mr. RHEA) from Tennessee, refers us to the President's proclamation, as a foundation for our faith in the repeal of the decrees to rest on; this is evidence indeed of things not seen. As well might the trembling mariner look to his almanac for the state of the weather at the moment the pitiless tempest is beating upon him, and his vessel is sinking under the shock of the elements. Whatever ground of hope or belief in the good faith of France existed at the time of issuing the proclamation, subsequent events have removed those grounds from under our feet, and blasted all our hopes; the wily policy of the French Court stands confessed; the Emperor loves but to chasten; he seduces but to destroy.

While the indulgent course, the favorable interpretation of the letter of Cadore of the 5th of August above mentioned, was adopted by the Cabinet towards France; was a similar temper and disposition manifested in relation to Great Britain?

I fear, sir, this part of the case will not well bear scrutiny. That the Orders in Council, and not the doctrine of blockade, were the objects of the act of the 1st of May, in relation to Great Britain, not only the debates of the period, but the recollection of every member of this House will bear me out in asserting. That mere cruising blockades, and every other blockade not supported by an actual investing force, is unwarranted by the laws of nations, is my clear conviction; it is the result of examination and reflection on the subject; but unfounded in public law as is the doctrine set up by Great Britain, its abandonment or modification can only be expected from treaty, and not by an isolated declaration at the threshold, under the threat of a specific alternative. The Orders in Council being removed, the blockade of May 1806, would have been little more than nominal; why then was it insisted on as indispensable, under the above act? Through a strange fatality, something, inconsiderable in itself, is always found in our demands upon Great Britain, to bar a settlement.

Commercial Intercourse.

But, Mr. Speaker, what is calculated much more to put in jeopardy the neutral character of our Government is the bill on the table. While all is uncertainty and embarrassment with France; while her decrees remain merely suspended and not revoked; while your merchants, trusting to the plighted faith of the Emperor, have been drawn into the French ports and there betrayed and sacrificed; while commerce is bleeding at every pore under the merciless gripe of Napoleon, we are called on to go farther to conciliate France, than she was entitled to, had she faithfully revoked her decrees. Upon revoking his decrees, the Emperor was entitled to have the act of the 1st of May carried into effect against Great Britain, and he was entitled to no more. Such, sir, is the precise condition imposed on the United States, by the letter of the Duke de Cadore, of the 5th of August, and this is the whole extent of the requirement. Upon what ground, then, sir, is it that we are called on to pass this additional non-importation act against Great Britain? If France has revoked her decrees, is not a non-importation with Great Britain inevitable, and does it not exist? But I will put the key to the door; let us not dissemble; France has not revoked, and for that cause and that alone, has the question arisen, whether there be at this time a legal non-importation with Great Britain. If, sir, there be any other difficulty, in the way of a non-importation with Great Britain; if there does exist any other possible obstacle, let the advocates of the bill name that obstacle. I make the appeal to gentlemen, I demand of the chairman of the committee who reported this bill, why and wherefore it is presented? France has failed to revoke her decrees, and as such revocation was, under the act of the first of May, a pre-requisite to non-importation with Great Britain, such non-importation must fall, unless this additional act in favor of France is passed. This, sir, is the whole length and breadth of the case; and on no other ground can this disastrous measure be placed. If France revoked her decrees, she was entitled to a non-importation against Great Britain, and if she failed to revoke, what? The bill gives the answer—she is equally entitled; so that, do what France may do, the end must be a non-importation with England. Such, sir, is the logic of your bill; such the impartiality towards the belligerents; such and so barefaced the subversion of the great principle of the act of May last.

The principle of the act of May was just and equal; our offers to Great Britain and France were the same, and the result, in case of refusal, alike to both. France met the offer by the famous letter of Cadore, of the 5th of August; in which, with more than conjurer's skill, this disciple of the Jesuits brought together and united both present and future; he revoked and did not revoke; he gave up the decrees and yet retained their operation or effects; he made the revocation both absolute and conditional; absolute for obtaining the President's proclamation, conditional for the purpose of eluding performance; absolute for drawing our property within his clutches, conditional for retaining it, to fill his coffers and fatten his minions; in fine, sir, the letter was one thing, or another thing, or nothing at all, as artifice might suggest or future events render necessary.

But, sir, the most copious source of error that I have witnessed during the various debates upon the proceedings under the act of the 1st of May, is found in the extent of the Berlin and Milan decrees. The gentlemen, who have commenced their career of conciliation with France, treated those decrees as operating only on the narrow ground of direct commerce between the United States and Great Britain and on our vessels to other ports which have submitted to British search; hence the effort to justify the late seizures of our vessels in France, upon grounds consistent with the repeal of those decrees, as being laden with British colonial produce, &c. But, sir, this cannot avail or give the least color to the pretence of a repeal.

The Berlin decree (that decree which emanated from the French Emperor at the capital of prostrate Prussia, where he sat like Marius over the ruins of Carthage) contains ten distinct articles; the 6th and 7th prohibit all trade in British merchandise, and, the more effectually to close all the avenues to the Continent, exclude from the continental ports all vessels coming from Great Britain or her colonies, or that shall have visited the colonies after the date of the decree. The Duke de Cadore, by the above letter of the 5th of August, pledged the Emperor, his master, for the entire repeal of this decree without any reservation. Had this pledge been faithfully redeemed; had such repeal been had with good faith, it would have subverted the whole continental system and removed all difficulty both between the United States and France, and between us and Great Britain, as it must have produced the actual result required by Great Britain, in restoring the commerce of the world to that state it was in at the promulgation of the decrees. Although the above decrees partake of municipal as well as external regulation, yet the French Emperor, foreseeing that Great Britain would not relinquish the ground taken while the continental system, so hostile to her commercial interests, was continued, and yielding for a moment, as is supposed, to the groans of subjugated States, stipulated by the above letter for a relinquishment of his system by an entire repeal of those decrees. Let me repeat, sir, had France proved faithful to her engagements, the United States would at this moment have had a prosperous commerce with Europe, and the present state of things is fairly imputable to the Emperor, with whom that bill on your table invites us to proclaim "all is well," I look about me, sir, with emotions of concern and anxiety to find a ground on which to justify the course adopted by this bill towards the belligerents. The peace, the reputation, and honor of my country is concerned. While the great principles of justice and fair neutrality shall be our landmarks and guide, come what may, fall when we may, we shall stand justified to the world; and what is of more consequence, we shall have the support of our own consciences; the sweet and consoling reflection, that we stand clear of fault and deserve a better fate. This bill will not give the United States this high and enviable condition.

If our Army and Navy is not so great as those of our enemy, our reasons ought to be at least as good, and our cause as just. This high ground of justice and neutrality is about being given up by this measure, and France is to be selected for our friend, and England marked as an enemy, while the former has never ceased to this day to violate our neutral rights to the extent of her power; to outrage all that is respected among civilized nations.

It was not sufficient for the Emperor to withhold the revocation of his decrees, but insult is added to injury; the United States must acknowledge themselves the aggressor in all things and submit to his correction. This Government, whose only fault was in too long suffering, justly required, by the above act of the first of May, the repeal of those unlawful edicts to precede any step on the part of this country; but the Emperor has reversed all, requiring our non-importation with Great Britain to be actually carried into effect previously to a revocation of his decrees, or even a restoration of our property seized since the first of November. Such, sir, is the insulting course prescribed by the above communication of the Grand Judge, Massa. The Emperor requires the submission, and, by this act, (which enacts an immediate non-intercourse with Great Britain, without regard to the fact whether France has or has not repealed her decrees) you comply.

With what embarrassment and confusion will the American Minister at the Court of St. James' present this act, which violates the sacred pledge given to that Court, in a communication to Marquis Wellesley made by Mr. Pinkney on the 10th of December last (page 29 of last message and documents from the President.)

In that letter our Minister presents the United States as impartial and just in requiring from France an actual revocation of her decrees, before she could be entitled to a non-importation against Great Britain. His representations and assurances of this unshaken disposition of our Government are strong; his language is emphatic; "to put the law of non-importation before the revocation of the edicts, was impossible." Why will you, sir, give that Court such a triumph, and your Minister such mortification, as must ensue upon a communication of this act?

It only remains, sir, for me to regret the necessity, which this bill has imposed on me, to introduce so often Great Britain and France, and to speak of their relative conduct towards this country. It would have given me much pleasure to avoid a course of observation which cannot fail to be misrepresented, and expose to imputations of foreign predilections. But, sir, the act of the 1st of May, and the bill on your table, rendered the discussion of the relative conduct of the belligerents indispensable. In opposing this bill, (which gives to France friendly intercourse, and to Great Britain hostile non-importation) I have been constrained to canvass the reason for such a preference; and to demand why you depart from the course of equal and impartial resistance to both the belligerents, as long as they continue without a change of measures to violate our rights.

Mr. GHOLSON next spoke on the opposite side of the question. He repelled the assertions and argument of those who had endeavored to persuade the House to consent to a breach of the plighted faith of the nation, under an alleged non-performance of her share of the engagement on the part of France. He examined the subject analytically, and quoted the letters of the Dukes of Massa and Gaeta as evidence of a revocation, of such a nature as would not have been questioned, had they proceeded from another quarter. If the law of May last was to be carried into effect, this section ought to be passed to remove all doubt or uncertainty as to its operation, &c. Mr. GHOLSON spoke two hours.

Mr. PEARSON.—It is but seldom, Mr. Speaker, I address you, especially on subjects of the nature and importance of that which is now under discussion. Perhaps on this account, I may not be the less entitled to your indulgence and the attention of this assembly.

I am not so vain, as to indulge the hope of being able to cast much additional light on the momentous subject before us; and, from the indications, which are but too plainly perceived, of the determination of a majority of this House, to pass this bill with all its imperfections on its head, I despair of obtaining within these walls a single convert to my opinion; but, sir, the high imperious voice of duty summons me to an exertion, and for my country, my constituents, and myself, I am bound to obey. I embrace the present moment with more cheerfulness than I should have done any preceding period of the debate, because I feel no artificial warmth, no excitement, except that which flows immediately from the subject. My feelings, naturally ardent, have, it is true, been much quickened at various stages of this discussion, and sir, I am much indebted to the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. GHOLSON) who last addressed you, for having aided me much in resuming that temper of mind which alone ought to be manifested in our deliberations. The calm, dispassionate, and unassuming address of that gentleman (Mr. G.) deserves my approbation, and I give it freely; but as for the truth of his premises, the soundness of his logic, and correctness of his conclusions, they are left to the sanction of those whose perceptions are very different from mine. In the course of my remarks, some of the most prominent observations of that gentleman will not escape my notice.

Mr. Speaker, no nation can be great, prosperous, and happy, or, if it is, can continue that greatness, prosperity, and happiness long, unless it is governed and directed by the sound principles of justice, honor, and impartiality; and more especially, should those principles be regarded in a Republic, whose very base is virtue, and whose support is the aid and approbation of honest and honorable men. The instant this foundation and this support is torn away, the superstructure crumbles into ruins; the elegant fabric of liberty is seen no more; anarchy with all its deformities, or despotism with all its horrors, raise their hideous crest, pull down the temple of liberty and give chains to its votaries. It is to be hoped, Mr. Speaker, that this state of things will not be the result of the present measure; but, when connected with the proceedings of this Government for several years past, and particularly with something which has been lately done, but which I am not at liberty to name, my mind is filled with dreadful forebodings of our fate, and no slight apprehensions for the character of the nation, and the best interests of the people.

Being opposed to the principles of this bill, and having no confidence in the reasons or pretences by which it is attempted to be justified, I shall not trouble you with an exposition of its particular details, however novel, arbitrary, and impolitic they may appear. The bill proposes substantially a revival of that system of commercial restrictions, under which the people of our country have so long and severely suffered. It substantially denies all intercourse with Great Britain and her colonies, by excluding from our ports British vessels of every description, and the products and manufactures of that nation of every kind, and to whomsoever they belong; while at the same time, every possible indulgence is granted to France—her vessels, armed and unarmed, her products and those of the nations which she has subjugated, find no restraint from us. Here let me remark, that to those two contending Powers, whenever their interest, or the interests of either of them come in contact with the interests of my own country, I feel no preference, I make no discrimination; my first best wishes ever are at home. I now solemnly appeal to gentlemen, why shall we, at this moment, make this marked distinction? Why shall we take this hostile attitude against Great Britain, and open our arms to the embrace of France? When, by doing so, we must inevitably afflict our own people, and depart from that character of neutrality, which has been the alleged boast of the present and late Administration; and which alone has afforded those in power an apology with the people for those wild schemes of policy, with which their course has been but too plainly marked, and that accumulated distress which every man has seen, and every honest man has felt? Can it be because Bonaparte has said, he loves the Americans? I, sir, know no other cause. I know it has been said on this floor, and said too by the honorable gentleman who reported this bill, and his honorable colleague, (Mr. Gholson) that the Berlin and Milan decrees are revoked; and, in compliance with the law of the late session of Congress, the faith of this nation is pledged to Bonaparte, for the due execution of that law against Great Britain. To those opinions my understanding cannot assent—the obligation to Bonaparte I neither feel nor believe. That none such exist will not, in my opinion, be difficult to prove. For a fair understanding of this question, it becomes necessary to apply to the law of May, 1810. On that law and the proceedings which have been subsequently adopted by this Government and France, must the propriety of the present measures be justified or condemned. The act alluded to, in substance, declares: "That in case either Great Britain or France shall, before the 3d day of March next, so revoke or modify her edicts, that they shall cease to violate the neutral commerce of the United States, which fact the President of the United States shall declare by proclamation, and if the other nation shall not, within three months thereafter, so revoke or modify her edicts in like manner, the restrictive provisions of the law of 1809 are to be revived and have full force and effect against the nation so refusing or neglecting to revoke or modify," &c. and the restrictions imposed by the act, are from the date of such proclamation, to cease and be discontinued in relation to the nation revoking or modifying her decrees in the manner aforesaid.

The emphatic words of this law are, so revoke or modify, as that they cease to violate, &c. Here is a positive, unconditional, indispensable prerequisite, to be complied with before the President was authorized to exercise the power given to him; a specific fact was to exist, and he was empowered simply to make its existence known to the nation; no discretion was allowed; nothing left to doubtful construction—no conditional promissory note of a perfidious agent, of a more perfidious master, was contemplated by the law. The great question now is, does the fact on which the proclamation was alone to issue, and on which its legitimacy solely depends, exist, or does it not? The very doubt ought to decide the question—the burden of proof unquestionably ought to rest on those who call on us to pass this law; and in their own language, execute the contract, and violate not the faith so solemnly plighted to "Napoleon the Great"—unfortunately the evidence on which they rely disproves the fact, and we are enabled to do what can seldom be done, and ought never to be required—prove a negative.

The letter of the Duke de Cadore, of the 5th August, 1810, the proclamation of the 2d of November, and Mr. Pinkney's diplomatic special pleading in his letter to the Secretary of State, of the 10th of December, constitute the whole burden of proof upon which the advocates of this bill rest their defence, and the evidence of the fact, on which alone it can be justified. I have stated the law, and what I conceive to be its obligations on the President and ourselves. It will now be proper to take a correct view of this famous letter of the Duc de Cadore of the 5th August, this honied charm, which has seduced us into a labyrinth, from whose gloomy cells and devious windings we are, I fear, not soon to be extricated. This letter, which contains but one sentence of plain truth, viz: "That the Emperor applauded the general embargo laid by the United States"—after asserting the most palpable falsehood, by denying that the Emperor had knowledge of our law of March, 1809, until very lately, and justifying the seizure and condemnation of all American property which had entered, not only the ports of France, but those of Spain, Naples and Holland, dating from the 20th of May, 1809; and declaring that reprisal was a right commanded by the dignity of France, a circumstance on which it was impossible to make a compromise—the letter proceeds: "Now Congress retrace their steps, they revoke the act of the first of March, the ports of America are open to French commerce, and France is no longer interdicted to the Americans. In short Congress engages to oppose itself to that one of the belligerent Powers, which should refuse to acknowledge the rights of neutrals. In this new state of things, I am authorized to declare to you, sir, that the decrees of Berlin and Milan are revoked, and that after the first of November they will cease to have effect; it being understood, that in consequence, of this declaration, (remark, Mr. Speaker, this declaration, not this fact,) the English shall revoke their Orders in Council, and renounce the new principles of blockade, which they have wished to establish, or that the United States, conformable to the act you have just communicated, shall cause their rights to be respected by the English"—then follows in sweet accents His Majesty's declaration of love for the Americans, his solicitude for our prosperity, and the glory of France.

This is the gilded pill, in which lurks a most deadly venom, and which if we swallow, I fear all the political quackery of the nation cannot save us. On this letter, gentlemen rely for the revocation of the French edicts, and the freedom of our commerce with France. Allowing the most favorable construction to this letter and abstracting it from circumstances, and facts both before and after its date, it will not bear gentlemen out in their conclusion; it does not satisfy your law, and did not warrant the state of things which has been and is about to be produced. Instead of an existing and determined fact, we have a promise, and that too clogged with conditions, which it was well known to the Emperor would not or could not be complied with to the extent required by him. The conditions which depended on Great Britain, he knew, never would be yielded, and that which depended on ourselves was nothing short of war with England or our own citizens, by oppressing them with a perpetual embargo. Instead of an authenticated act of revocation, bearing the authority of the most ordinary law or edict of the French Empire, we have nothing but a letter from the agent of the Government, and which the Emperor may disavow at pleasure—as was done in the case of the Minister of Marine, in his explanations to General Armstrong of the intended operation of the Berlin decree—instead of the restoration of the immense amount of American property, of which your citizens have been most cruelly and unjustly robbed by this fell monster of the age—and which the President declared, through the Secretary of State, in letters to General Armstrong of the 5th of June and July, must precede an arrangement with France, and was an indispensable evidence of the just purpose of France towards the United States; instead of having forty or fifty millions worth of our property restored, we are vauntingly told, that the property was confiscated as a measure of reprisal, that the principles of reprisal must be the law in that affair, and that a compromise would be inconsistent with the dignity of France—the plain English of which is, we have the property and we will keep it. Mr. Speaker, are we to be thus amused? Common honor and common sense revolt at the idea.

An honorable gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. CHEVES,) whom I am very much inclined to respect, in an ingenious argument which he made the other day, to prove that the French decrees were revoked, told you that the revocation of those decrees depended on the mere volition of the mind of the Emperor; not requiring authentication or form; and although they might be revived the next moment, or substituted by other regulations equally affecting our neutral rights, still they were revoked. Thus attributing an authority to Bonaparte, descriptive of the power of the God of nature—when he said let there be light and there was light. And in reply to the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. QUINCY,) who contended that form was essential to the repeal of a decree, he remarked that the gentleman wanted form and not substance. From this course of reasoning, I conceive the gentleman has admitted, that this pretended revocation has neither form nor substance. An edict may be defined to be, a law promulgated in such form as the institutions of the country require, or some act of sovereign authority, which has gone through the established forms of office, so as to become obligatory. The edicts of France have an appropriate form, their authority is attested by the Emperor and publicity is given, for the direction of those whose duty it is to carry them into effect. Sir, the decree of the most absolute monarch on earth is no decree till it is published. I contend that a revocation or modification of an edict require the same or equal solemnities with its enactment; the fact must exist and be officially made known before it becomes obligatory—no declaration of an intention to revoke, can constitute an actual revocation. The act ought not only to be determined and public, but susceptible of authentication, and capable of being communicated to the nation and the world.

This opinion, if it needs authority, is supported by the instructions of the Secretary of State to our Ministers at Paris and London, of the 5th July. Mr. Pinkney is directed in these words—"If the British Government should accede to the overture contained in the act of Congress, by repealing or so modifying its edicts, as that they will cease to violate our neutral rights, you will transmit the repeal, properly authenticated, to General Armstrong, and if necessary, by a special messenger, and you will hasten to transmit it also to this Department—similar directions are given to General Armstrong."

Will it for a moment be contended, that the formal authentication required by the Administration; could mean a Jesuitical; insolent, equivocal, conditional letter, full of sound, and meaning nothing for our good? But, say gentlemen, the President received the evidence and issued his proclamation. This is true; but why has he done so, and how justified by the law under which alone he was authorized to act, is, to my mind, perfectly inexplicable; why, in the course of this arrangement with France, he has varied the ground which he first took—why dispensed with requisites at one time declared indispensable—why he advanced in exactions from Great Britain in proportion as he receded from demands on France, is left for himself and those who have more wisdom than myself, to determine. I trust, sir, I have a proper share of confidence in the Executive, and have no disposition to detract from his merit; but he is only man, and therefore subject to the frailties man is heir to. We have as yet no such maxim among us, as that the Executive is infallible—he can do no wrong. Whatever may be the disposition of other gentlemen, I am as yet too free, too much of a genuine Republican to subscribe to such a doctrine. I said, sir, that in the course of this arrangement with France, the administration advanced in their demands on Great Britain and receded as to France.

I argue from the documents, which accompanied the President's Message at the opening of the present session of Congress. The first letter in the documents from the Secretary of State to Mr. Pinkney, of the 20th January, 1810, does not contain a word on the subject of blockades—on the contrary, the Orders in Council are alone required to be repealed, as preparatory to a treaty with Great Britain; and the British Government are assured of the cordial disposition "of the President to exercise any power with which he may be invested, to put an end to acts of Congress, which would not be resorted to but for the Orders in Council, and at the same time of his determination to put them in force against France, in case her decrees should not also be repealed."

His letter of the 4th of May, which was the first after passing the act of the 1st of May last, that enclosed a copy of that act, is not published. On the 22d of May, another letter is sent enclosing a second copy of the act of Congress, in which there is not to be found any requisition of a repeal of the blockade which is now made a sine qua non to an arrangement with Great Britain. But on the 2d of July, after the arrival of the John Adams, which brought the correspondence between our Ministers at Paris and London, and the Agents of the British and French Governments, on the subject of the repeal of their several orders and decrees; and when it was known that the British Government would not abandon her system of blockade and adopt the principles contended for by France—in this letter, I say, is contained not only a demand of the repeal of the Orders in Council, but also of the blockading order of May, 1806. I have already shown, from the letters before me, of the 5th June and July, that the restoration of the property of our citizens, confiscated by the order of Bonaparte, was declared by the Executive as an indispensable pre-requisite to an arrangement with the French Government. But the proclamation of the President has been issued without a cent of property being restored; nor is there the most distant prospect of our regaining a shilling from his iron grasp. Thus have the administration changed the ground first taken, increased the demands on Great Britain, and abandoned what was deemed indispensable on the part of France.

So conscious was the President of the just expectation of the people of this country, that provision would be made for the restoration of their property, he informs Mr. Armstrong on the 2d of November, the day the proclamation was issued, that "in issuing the proclamation it has been presumed, that the requisition on the subject of 'the sequestered property will have been complied with.'" From what this presumption arose, I am at a loss to say—the letter of the Duc de Cadore to General Armstrong, of the 12th September, had been received here; we had been told there would be no compromise; the law of reprisal must govern. Sir, the law of reprisal, as recognised by the laws of nations, could never have authorized the seizure. Reprisals can only be resorted to in case of an act of hostility committed by one nation on the property or citizens of another, and after compensation for the injury has been demanded and refused; and even in that case, the property taken is to be held only in pledge, till satisfaction is made by the offending nation. The moment that confiscation takes place the principle of reprisal ceases and it becomes an act of war. We had done no injury to France; we had violated neither the rights of the persons or property of her subjects—no demand of indemnity was ever made; not a complaint whispered, till nearly twelve months after the passing of the law, (and after its expiration too,) which is made the pretext for this monstrous outrage. The law of reprisal had nothing to do with the affair, and the confiscation of our property excludes the idea of restoration. I confess I was astonished, and felt humbled as an American, when I heard the language of the President of the United States, in his Message to Congress at the opening of the present session on this subject. Instead of that high indignant tone, demanded by the honor and feelings of the nation, he, in the mildness of calm philosophy, says, "It was particularly anticipated that as a further evidence of just dispositions towards them, restoration would have been immediately made of the property" of our citizens, seized under a misapplication of the principles of reprisals, and a misconstruction of a law of the United States. This expectation has not been fulfilled. Thus the question as to the restoration seems to be abandoned; one kind, loving word from Napoleon the Great, (as he has been triumphantly called in this House,) this modern Alexander (without his virtues, with all his faults) disarms us of our rage, and we give millions for his embrace.

It is in vain, sir, to seek for evidence of the revocation of the Berlin and Milan decrees in this letter of the 5th August; we have before us the most conclusive, the most damning testimony of their continued operation as late as the 25th December. By a letter from our Chargé d'Affaires, dated Paris, 10th December, we are informed that "the New Orleans Packet, lately arrived at Bordeaux, has, with her cargo, the bonu fide property of citizens of the United States, and laden at the port of New York, been seized by the director of the customs, under the Berlin and Milan decrees." He further states, that "the case of the New Orleans Packet is the first which has occurred since the first of November, to which the Berlin and Milan decrees could be applied, and if they are applied in this case, it will be difficult for France to show one solitary instance of their having been practically revoked."

The letter from Charles Meyer, our Consul at Bordeaux, of the 14th December, states, that the brig New Orleans Packet, of New York, has been seized by the collector, and her cargo put in the imperial custom-house. The schooner Friendship, of and from Baltimore, has been sequestered. The gentleman from Virginia (Mr. GHOLSON) has argued against the operation of those decrees, on the authority of a letter from Mr. Russell, contained in that bundle of trash, scraped up from the surplus fund of rubbish on the files in the office of the Secretary of State, and which was carefully laid on our tables the other day, from which it appears, that no seizure had been made of American property since the 1st of November. But unfortunately for the gentleman and his argument, the letter alluded to is dated the 1st of December, when indeed no seizure had been made—but why? Because no vessels had then arrived. It was surely unnecessary to tell us what did not happen on the 1st of December, when we well know what did happen on the 10th of December. The gentleman further stated, that there was no evidence of the capture of the schooner Friendship; this statement is equally unfortunate; because we have actual evidence that this vessel was actually sequestered, and I do suppose the gentleman, on reflection, will be inclined to admit that the capture or seizure must have been made before condemnation could take place. But we have still further evidence of the continued operation of those decrees by official acts of the French Empire, as late as the 25th of December, 1810. The Duke of Massa, in a letter to the Minister of Justice, dated Paris, 25th December, after reciting the letter of the Duc de Cadore, of the 5th August, the President's proclamation and the circular letter of Mr. Gallatin to the collectors of the customs, remarks: "In consequence of this engagement, entered into by the Government of the United States, to cause their rights to be respected, His Majesty orders that all the cases which may be pending in the Council of Prizes of captures of American vessels made after the 1st of November, and those that may in future be brought before it, shall not be judged according to the principles of the decrees of Berlin and Milan, but that they shall remain suspended; the vessels captured or seized to remain only in a state of sequestration, and the rights of the proprietors being reserved for them until the 2d of February, the period at which the United States having fulfilled the engagement to cause their rights to be respected, the said captures to be declared null," &c. Nearly the same instructions are given at the same time to the director general of the customs by the Duke of Gaete—he says: "Those American vessels which have entered the ports of France since the 1st of November, or may enter in future, and those which have been sequestered in contravention of the decrees, must be the object of a special report." And on the 2d of February, the Emperor's intentions are to be made known. Can the most credulous, the most devoted mind now believe that those decrees are repealed, and that they have ceased to have effect—if so, why are our vessels seized at all? Why is their fate to be suspended awaiting the will of the Emperor? Are we ready to submit to be bound to security for our good behaviour? Are we thus to be whipped into the adoption "of strong and energetic measures against the common enemy?" Are we to torture our own citizens and take a hostile attitude against Great Britain, to obtain the liberation of a few vessels which have been brought before the Council of Prizes in France since the 1st of November? For, sir, be assured, if any are ever to be restored, it will only be those which have arrived in French ports since the first of November, and have not been finally condemned. As to those of a previous date, their fate is irrevocably sealed. What then is our situation if we pass this bill, or continue the law of last session, or give effect to the President's proclamation? We literally say to France, we abandon all claim to indemnity for the multiplied injuries and insults we have received from you, open our ports freely to you and close them against Great Britain, with the hope that you will repeal your Berlin and Milan decrees, and not condemn the vessels which you may have seized since the 1st of November. Thus, instead of bottoming the President's proclamation and this law on the actual repeal of those decrees, and the restoration of property, you expect a repeal to take place, bottomed on this law and the proclamation. Thus, in the spirit of modern chivalry, the injured party makes the concession and pays the price of peace.

Sir, if such a state of things had been attempted to be produced directly in relation to Great Britain or perhaps to France, at the last session of Congress, it would have been scouted with indignation from every section of the country.

Were it necessary, Mr. Speaker, I might contend, on the authority of the present and late Administration, that the operation of the Berlin and Milan decrees never would cease as to this nation, until complete satisfaction had been obtained for the injuries sustained under them. In the famous case of the Chesapeake (an event which I feel as much as any man) the sentiments of the Administration then were, that the act of aggression, although disavowed, continued in full force; that it never could be discontinued, never cease to exist, till complete compensation was made. If this opinion is correct, and I am inclined to give it my assent, then I say, the decrees of France never can cease to exist as to this nation, till we have been compensated for the incalculable insults and injuries we have sustained in consequence of their operation.

Mr. Speaker, the chairman of the committee (Mr. EPPES) who reported the bill, in reply to the very able speech of a gentleman from New York (Mr. EMOTT) who addressed you in the early stage of this discussion, appeared to me rather to question the purity of the source from which they came, than to have answered the arguments of that gentleman. This mode of reasoning may answer the purposes of gentlemen—but is surely unfavorable to fair investigation; it tends to abridge the freedom of debate, and prevent that firm, decisive, and candid exposition of those measures, which we conceive may vitally affect the happiness of the people. This is a privilege and a duty which I shall ever regard and ever perform. The same gentleman (Mr. EPPES) and several others, have reminded us of the arrangement made with Mr. Erskine; and offer it as a precedent for the justification of the President's proclamation and this bill, (which are substantially one and the same thing.) I had supposed that that unfortunate arrangement would have been kept out of sight by gentlemen on the other side of the House. It was to have been expected they would carefully avoid an attempt to make one bad precedent justify another; they must have forgotten how that arrangement militates against the proclamation, and the demand which is now so positively made of a revocation by Great Britain of her order of blockade of May, 1806. That arrangement, almost dictated by the Administration, and which was perfectly satisfactory to us all, did not contain one syllable, not the most distant intimation, relative to the repeal of that order, which now appears to excite so highly the indignation of gentlemen, and has been magnified into a cause of war. The order of blockade was at that time more recent, and if so injurious as now alleged, could not have escaped the attention of the Executive, and his vigilant Cabinet, when they were providing for the annulment of the Orders in Council of January and November, 1807. That arrangement was made without requiring a repeal of the blockade—now nothing can be done without a repeal, and thus we are to be blockaded both at home and abroad.

It may be further remarked, that by the law of February, 1808, the President was authorized to suspend the embargo as to France or Great Britain, on the same conditions pointed out by the act of May, 1810. In the exercise of that power, the President instructed Mr. Pinkney to propose to the British Government a repeal of the embargo as to that nation, and its continuation against France, if the Orders in Council of January and November, 1807, should be rescinded. At that time nothing was said, no demand was made, not even a proposition offered on the subject of the blockade in question. My attention, sir, has been somewhat drawn to this part of the subject by the importance which has been given to it in the documents before me, and the arguments of gentlemen of this House, particularly the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. EPPES,) who said much on this subject the other day, in answer to arguments which the gentleman from New York (Mr. EMOTT) did not make. He reiterated last night that his arguments were unanswered and unanswerable. I do not, profess, sir, to be perfectly acquainted with the practical extent of the order of blockade of May, 1806, nor do I know the precise quantum of injury we have sustained by it, nor am I to be understood as attempting its justification—I should be the last to concede any principle or any right to which my country has a claim. But, sir, I am compelled to believe, that an artificial importance is at this moment given to the subject, which it has not received at any other period since the adoption of that regulation by the British Government. I have already shown that, in the negotiation of 1808, and in the arrangement with Mr. Erskine, the question was not even made a matter of contestation; and, sir, from an examination of the Executive papers, from the date of the order of the blockade down to the present session of Congress, I have not been able to discover a single paper remonstrating against the order, or insisting on its revocation, nor do I know of a single case of the condemnation of an American vessel under its operation. On the contrary, at the time of its adoption, (during the administration of Mr. Fox, who was believed to be as friendly disposed towards us, as any man who ever administered the affairs of the British Cabinet,) this measure was spoken of by our Minister at London (Mr. Monroe) as a relaxation favorable to neutral commerce. It may not be improper to refer to the order itself, as communicated by Mr. Fox to Mr. Monroe, on the 16th of May, 1806; after the preamble this note states "that the King, taking into consideration the new and extraordinary means resorted to by the enemy for the purpose of distressing the commerce of his subjects, has thought fit to direct that necessary measures should be taken 'for the blockade of the coast, rivers, and ports, 'from the river Elbe to the port of Brest, both 'inclusive; and the said coast, rivers, and ports, 'are, and must be considered, as blockaded. But 'His Majesty is pleased to declare that such block- 'ade shall not extend to prevent neutral ships 'and vessels, laden with goods not being the prop- 'erty of His Majesty's enemies, and not being 'contraband of war, from approaching the said 'coasts and entering into and sailing from the 'rivers and ports; (save and except the coast, 'rivers, and ports, from Ostend to the river Seine, 'already in a state of strict and rigorous block- 'ade, and which are to be considered as contin- 'ued,) provided the said ships and vessels so ap- 'proaching and entering (except as aforesaid) 'shall not have been laden at any port belonging 'to, or in possession of, His Majesty's enemies, 'and that the said ships and vessels so sailing 'from the said rivers and ports (except as afore- 'said) shall not be destined to any port belonging 'to, or in possession of His Majesty's enemies, nor 'have previously broken the blockade." This order, then, only excludes from those ports ves- sels having enemies' property on board or articles contraband of war, in both of which cases, they are liable to seizure by the law of nations, at least, it has been long contended for on the part of Britain; it also prevents the direct carrying trade from one port to another of an enemy. If this latter extension is not recognised by the law of nations, it is generally the subject of treaty, and was provided for by our treaty with the British Government, and the late convention formed by Mr. Monroe with the British Govern- ment, but which was rejected principally because Great Britain required us not to submit to the Berlin decree—a requisition, sir, infinitely short of what we are now to comply with, at the dic- tation of France—by which colonial produce was required to be relanded in the United States before it would be admitted into the ports of the Continent. By this order, bona fide neutral ves- sels, with neutral produce, sailing from our own country, never were affected.

The gentleman from Virginia (Mr. EPPES) has said this order of blockade has not a single feature of a regular blockade; in this, the gen- tleman is tolerably correct, and when he denoun- ces, what in the fashionable cant of the day are called paper blockades, I join most heartily in the execration. It is true this order of May, 1806, has scarcely a feature of a regular blockade. It was not avowed at the time to be even a con- structive blockade, nor was the right contended for of blockading without an actual investing force. It does not, like ordinary blockades, at- tempt a complete prohibition to all trade with those ports, but only to the particular objects and specified cases which I have mentioned. The previous measures of France are declared by Mr. Fox to be the cause of this order. What were those measures? They were no less, as regards ourselves, than a violation of the treaty which had been solemnly entered into between this country and France; by harassing our trade, seizing and confiscating our vessels in pursuing the commerce guaranteed to us by that treaty; she had usurped authority in almost every port and city from Elbe to Brest, and excluded the introduction of British products and merchan- dize, whether belonging to American citizens or British subjects.

Now, sir, let me state to you the language of our Minister (Mr. Monroe) at the time this or- der was issued. In his letter of the 17th of May, to the Secretary of State, speaking of the order, he says, "the note is couched in terms of re- 'straint, and professes to extend the blockade 'further than it has heretofore done, neverthe- 'less it takes it from many ports already block- 'aded, indeed all east of Ostend and west of the 'Seine, except in articles contraband of war and 'enemy's property, which are seizable without 'blockade; and in like form of exception, con- 'sidering every enemy as one Power, it admits 'the trade of neutrals within the same limits to 'be free, in the productions of enemy's colonies, 'in every but the direct route between the colony 'and parent country.

"It cannot be doubted but the note was drawn 'by the Government in reference to the question, 'and if intended by the Cabinet as a foundation 'on which Mr. Fox is authorized to form a treaty, 'and obtained by him for the purpose, it must be 'viewed in a very favorable light; it seems clear- 'ly to put an end to further seizures, on the prin- 'ciple which has heretofore been in contestation." This view of the subject, which surely is a fair one, connected with the silence of the Adminis- tration for four years, must put an end to the clamor so often raised against this order, which has been the alleged cause of the Berlin decree, and charge against Great Britain, of having been the first aggressor on our neutral rights. Sir, we have indeed been insulted, injured, and abused by both nations, to an extent which would justify any measures in our power, but let us not palliate the crimes of one, and magnify those of the other; and above all let us not whip ourselves because they will not respect us; let us not become so Quixotic, as to act the part of a famous knight in the tales of chivalry, who tortured himself be- cause his mistress would not be kind.

Mr. Speaker, as the arrangement with Mr. Erskine has been often mentioned, and much re- lied on by the advocates of this bill, it deserves some further notice. That arrangement was the first act of the present Executive, after he came into office; it was presumed to have been fairly and properly made—it was hailed as a political jubilee by all denominations of politicians—par- ticularly those who had not contributed to the elevation of the present Chief Magistrate; we thought we perceived in that event the evidence of a disposition in the present Executive (which we could not discover in his predecessor) to re- lieve this country from that system of commer- cial restriction, that self-destroying policy, which had made us poor indeed; we also thought a de- termination was manifested not to decline any advantageous accommodation with Great Britain, whether France said yea or nay. It will be but too well remembered that we had been groaning for two years under the pressure of non-importation, embargo, and non-intercourse—your treasury was drained, your citizens unable to pay their debts, and your courts of justice actually shut up, at least so far in many States (and among the rest the State which I have the honor in part to represent) as to suspend the effect of executions; your cities and seaports were inactive or deserted, gloom and dismay marked the features of the nation, and hope had almost bid us farewell; we fancied in this arrangement the glimmerings of returning sunshine, peace, and prosperity—with honest and upright hearts, we were willing to applaud the hand that gave it, without questioning or suspecting the manner or motives with which it was given. The delusion soon vanished; and I have no hesitation to declare, had I then known what I now know, I should have not offered such unqualified applause.

The arrangement with Mr. Erskine differed from the present, in other respects than those pointed out in the preceding part of my remarks. It opened intercourse with Great Britain, but did not change the state of our relations with France, by imposing any additional restrictions—we were then in a state of non-intercourse with France, and that state was continued; in the present case, we do not preserve the same state of relations with Great Britain, but impose restrictions which did not exist at the date of the proclamation.

The arrangement with Mr. Erskine, it is true, like the letter of the Duc de Cadore, was to take effect in futuro, but, for a very different and better reason, it required the sanction of his Government, and time was necessary to obtain it—not so with this deceitful letter—it was written at the French Court, the sign manual of the Emperor could have been affixed, and orders for the cessation of the Berlin and Milan decrees could and ought to have immediately issued. If it had been the honest and fixed intention of Bonaparte to put an end to the operation of those decrees, in consequence of our law of May last—why ought he not to have done so on the 5th of August, as well as promise to do so on the first of November? Our law was then before him, and he knew the declared intention of this Government. Will it be said here, as he has said, “no reliance could be placed in the Americans?” Shall we then trust him who refuses to trust us? I, sir, for one, will not.

Mr. Speaker, let us make a very strange and very false supposition, that the Berlin and Milan decrees were actually repealed, and did cease to have effect on the first of November. What have we gained? What advantage have we derived from it? And have we not been officially informed by the French Minister in this city (General Turreau) in his letter to the Secretary of State, of the 12th December, 1810, that our most valuable productions, particularly of the Southern States, are at this moment excluded from the ports of France? As to the important articles, cotton and tobacco, he says: “their importation into France is at this moment especially prohibited, but I have reasons to believe (and I pray you meanwhile to observe, sir, they do not rest on any facts) that some modifications will be given to this absolute exclusion. These modifications will not depend on the chance of events, but will be the result of other measures, firm and pursued with perseverance, which the two Governments will continue to adopt to withdraw from the monopoly and from the vexations of the common enemy a commerce loyal and necessary to France as well as the United States.” In this letter we find the touchstone, the true clue to French favor—war with England. Connected with this letter from Turreau, is a decree of the 15th July, 1810, which, in point of principle and arrogance, is not surpassed by any act in the history of Bonaparte. By this decree thirty or forty American vessels may import into France (under license) cotton, fish, oil, dye-wood, salt-fish, cod-fish, and peltry; they must export wine, brandy, silks, linens, cloths, jewellery, household furniture, and other manufactured articles; they can only depart from Charleston and New York, under the obligation of bringing with them a gazette of the day of their departure, also a certificate of the origin of the merchandise, given by the French Consul, containing a sentence in cypher. The French merchants who shall cause their vessels to come, must prove that they are concerned in the fabrics of Paris, Rouen, and other towns. Here is an attempt to extend French influence by bribing a select class of our merchants; granting favors to favorites. It is an attempt to make commercial regulations in our own ports, and to violate our Constitution, by giving a preference to the ports of Charleston and New York, over all the rest in the United States, which is specially denied by the Constitution. In addition to all this, we have a list of duties established at the French custom-house on the 5th August (the very day on which twenty or thirty American vessels and cargoes were sold and the proceeds given over to Bonaparte—the very memorable 5th August, the birthday of the celebrated letter of the Duc de Cadore) subjecting long staple cotton to a tariff of eighty cents per pound, short staple sixty cents, and tobacco forty cents per pound. By another decree of the 12th September, 1810, potash is taxed at one dollar twenty-five cents, cod-fish two dollars, rice four dollars per hundred—thus are we loved, favored, and taxed.

There can be no importation of American productions into France but on terms utterly inadmissible. The act of May last, in the language of the Secretary of State, had for its object not merely the recognition of a “speculative, legitimate principle, but the enjoyment of a substantial benefit. The overture then presented obviously embraced the idea of commercial advantage, it included the reasonable belief, that an abrogation of the Berlin and Milan decrees would leave the ports of France as free for the introduction of the produce of the United States, as they were previously to the promulgation of the decrees.

If, then, for the revoked decrees, municipal laws, producing the same effect have been substituted, the mode only and not the measure has undergone an alteration. If France, by her own acts, has blocked up her ports against the introduction of the products of the United States, what motive has the Government in a discussion with a third Power to insist on the privilege of going to France? Whence the inducement to urge the annulment of a blockade of France, when, if annulled, no American cargoes would obtain a market in any of her ports? In such a state of things, a blockade of the coast of France would be to the United States as unimportant as would the blockade of the Caspian sea. This is the language of truth and common sense, language which I did not very much expect to hear from the Secretary at this time; because it exposes the proclamation of the President, and condemns the present bill. But truth, like murder, will out, and it ought to strike dumb the advocates of this bill, and open their eyes to a different policy. But, sir, going on to the supposition that the French decrees are actually repealed, and cease to have effect, pursuing the principle about to be established of taking words for deeds, and form for substance, what is to become of the promise of Lord Wellesley to Mr. Pinkney, of the 31st of August, 1810—when he states that he is commanded by His Majesty to repeat the declaration made to this Government in February, 1808, of His Majesty's desire to see the commerce of the world restored to that freedom which is necessary for its prosperity, and his readiness to abandon the system which had been forced upon him, whenever the enemy should retract the principles which had rendered it necessary; and to assure us that whenever the repeal of the French decrees shall have actually taken effect, and the commerce of the neutral nations shall have been restored to the condition in which it stood previously to the promulgation of those decrees, he will feel the highest satisfaction in relinquishing a system which the conduct of the enemy compelled him to adopt. Here is a promise equally solemn, (and as there is at least as much virtue in the British Government as there is in that of France) as much to be relied on as that of the Duc de Cadore, and as certainly as the Berlin and Milan decrees were revoked, and would cease to have effect on the first of November, so certainly have we the same assurance that the orders of Great Britain would be rescinded. Shall we then believe the one and not the other? Shall we frown and look big at England, while, with timid and abject submission, we crouch at the feet of France, and quietly rivet the chains prepared for us? Mr. Speaker, the goddess of justice has been described as being blind, with sword in one hand, and the scale and balance in the other, but if she is invoked in this measure, she comes blind indeed, with a sword in one hand, but no balance in the other; in one hand is the emblem of war, in the other the badge of slavery.

Sir, are we apprized of the effect which the present measures may have on the property of our citizens, at this moment in the power of Great Britain, in her ports and those of her allies, Spain and Portugal? Have we forgotten the French principle of reprisals, and the sort of recognition they have received by the letter of the Secretary of State to General Armstrong, of the 5th of November, 1810, in which he was authorized to enter into a conventional arrangement with the French Government, requiring the sanction of the Senate for the restoration of French property seized under our non-intercourse law, as a condition for the restoration of American property condemned and sequestered under the Rambouillet decree of March, 1810? It is true we should have lost nothing by such a convention, because no French property had been seized by us under that law, and the forfeitures under the non-intercourse law contemplated violations by our own citizens, rather than French violations; but, sir, the principle is important, and unless we have more reliance on the justice and forbearance of England, than gentlemen declare they have, ought we not to be apprehensive that she will avail herself of this principle: follow the example of France, fill her coffers with our treasure, and trust to negotiation for forgiveness? This, sir, to my mind, is an important consideration, and well deserves the attention of gentlemen.

If war with England must happen, let it be done openly and for ourselves; let us not commence the attack by practising on our own citizens; and let it not be said we have been caught in the snares of Bonaparte. Mr. Speaker, I do not oppose this bill because it professes to give some relief to those merchants whose vessels sailed before the date of the proclamation, and which may have departed from a British port, prior to the 2d of February, 1811, but, sir, because I wish to rid the country of this whole consumptive system; and, if that cannot be done, I will not aid in propping up the President's proclamation, by taking from the judiciary of the country the power of deciding on its validity, which is one of the avowed objects of this bill. I had rather trust to the opinion of the judges for entire relief to our citizens, from the operation of the law of May, 1810, than grant the partial exemption contemplated by this bill. The honorable gentleman (Mr. EPPES) who reported this bill, declares that its great object is to prevent questions arising in the courts, on the construction of the law of May, 1810, and the effect of the President's proclamation. This, to my understanding, is legislating retrospectively; it is ex post facto; and, like the Rambouillet decree, is not only prospective, but retroactive. It takes from our citizens the right of appealing to the courts of justice for justice, and makes the fiat of the Executive the supreme law—a doctrine subversive of the first principles of republicanism, and strange to be advocated by gentlemen who came into power under the name of Republicans.

It is in vain, Mr. Speaker, to seek for the justification of this measure from anything France has done, or from the indications which she has given of her fixed course of policy. Her great object is the destruction of the commerce of the world; and she wishes to make us tributary to that end, and, if possible, to embroil us in a war with England.

The disposition of Bonaparte towards us rests not alone on his acts of aggression, rapine, and plunder; the imprisonment of our citizens, the burning and sequestration of our property. He has heaped upon this devoted country all the epithets which malice could suggest or tyranny dictate; he has exhausted the cup of bitterness, and made us drink the dregs of humiliation; he has declared his decrees should suffer no change, and that the Americans should take the positive character of allies or enemies. As long ago as the 15th of January, 1808, he issued a declaration of war for us against Great Britain; an unconditional surrender of your rights is demanded, or an obedience to his dictates. And are we not in the act of yielding obedience? Sir, the nation, which pretends to dictate laws to another, offers chains. With more than christian charity do we seem to forget and forgive the indignities offered to our national character; and the unkind, the severest cut of all to the present Administration, contained in the letter of the Duc de Cadore to General Armstrong, of the 17th of February, 1810; in which we are told that his Majesty could place no reliance on the proceedings of the United States. We are advised to tear to pieces the act of our independence; declared to be more abject than the slaves of Jamaica; that we are men without honor, energy, or just political views; that we will be obliged to fight for interest, after having refused to fight for honor. Our present rulers are there contrasted with the brave and generous heroes of our Revolution, and they are declared to be fit for the yoke which had been thrown off by their ancestors. This letter had scarcely reached our shores, the ink was scarcely dry, it was fresh in our memories, when the letter of the 5th of August was received; which, like a Lethæan draught, threw the shade of oblivion over our insults and our wrongs; we sipped the poison as it fell, and I fear it is fast spreading through the body politic.

Mr. Speaker, I turn with disgust from those polluted pages before me—this history of our wrongs, this tyrant's love—would to God they could be blotted from our memories; or, if remembered, let it be with abhorrence and detestation.

I deprecate the course of policy, if policy it may be termed, which is now about to be forced upon us. I protest against it as a measure injurious to ourselves; weak, temporizing, and partial in its operation on foreign nations; unauthorized by the actual state of things; and calculated to hasten the period of our union with the destinies of France.

Sir, unless we turn from this wayward course, this highway to ruin, the time cannot be very distant when your deserted ports, your uninhabited cities, your oppressed people, and even your firesides and your altars will only exhibit the sad signs of what they were. And I fear, sir, the period is fast approaching when it will not again be said, "that we are a people with whom the fierce spirit of liberty is stronger than among any other people on earth; whose institutions inspire them with lofty sentiments; who do not judge of an ill principle only by an actual grievance; but who anticipate the evil, and judge of the pressure of the grievance by the badness of the principle; who snuff the approach of tyranny in every tainted breeze."

When Mr. P. had concluded, the House adjourned to six o'clock this evening.

FEBRUARY 27—Six o'clock, P. M.

The House was called to order, and resumed the unfinished business.

A motion was made by Mr. RANDOLPH, to postpone the subject to Friday next, and lost—ayes 36 noes 36.

A motion was then made by Mr. R., to postpone it until to-morrow.

On this motion a debate, which from its nature caused irritation, took place, in which Messrs. RANDOLPH and EPPES were the principal speakers.

Much warmth was excited, and frequent calls to order made.

The question on postponement, till to-morrow, was decided by yeas and nays. For postponement, 44; against it, 74—as follows:

Mr. PITKIN spoke more than an hour against the bill generally, and in support of the particular proposition which he was about to make. He contended that the Emperor of France had not fulfilled his engagement to the United States, inasmuch as the decrees, if revoked, which he denied, had not been revoked on the day on which he had engaged to revoke them. He quoted the history of the connexion of Spain with France as evidence of the perfidy of Bonaparte, from whom he said no compliance with his promises could be expected, &c. In supporting his amendment, Mr. P. contended for its beneficial effects to our merchants; and it would not, he said, be more a breach of our contract with France than the first section of the bill now before the House. The one was, in fact, as much a departure from the engagement with France as the other. The following was the amendment offered by Mr. PITKIN:

Provided, also, That nothing in this act, or the act to which this is a supplement, shall be construed to affect any vessels owned wholly by a citizen or citizens of the United States, or the cargoes of any such vessels which shall have cleared out from any port in the West Indies within — days after the 2d of February, 1811.

The following were the yeas and nays on the motion:

Robert Whitehill, Robert Witherspoon, and Robert Wright—58.

Mr. PITKIN again moved to amend the section, by inserting after the provision excepting from the operation of the section, vessels which sailed for ports beyond the Cape of Good Hope prior to the 10th day of November, 1810, the words "or any ports in the West Indies." He said his object was to place the traders in our produce to the West Indies on the same footing with the great East India merchants.

For the amendment, 49; against it, 55—as follows:

Mr. LYON said there was no use in sitting here when gentlemen would not answer arguments that were advanced; and, when the only effect of his staying here was to keep a quorum to vote on the bill, he would not himself consent to remain longer. He moved an adjournment. Lost—ayes 24.

A motion was then made by Mr. STURGES, to add to the proviso, in favor of East India traders, the following:

"And, also, that where any vessel belonging to a citizen or citizens of the United States, shall have arrived after the second day of February, 1811, at any port of the United States from any British West India port, and said vessel shall have been, or shall be seized by virtue of this act, or the act to which this is a supplement, the owner or owners may apply to the district judge of the district where such seizure is made, (giving reasonable notice to the person or persons making such seizures,) and if it shall appear to the satisfaction of said judge, by statement or account current, on oath or affirmation, or such other proof as the nature of the case will admit, that said vessel had, at the time of her arrival, no other products or property from any British West India port than what arose from property actually exported from the United States previous to the proclamation of the President of the United States of the 2d of November, 1810, in that case the said district judge shall certify the fact to the proper officer having the custody of such vessel or property, whose duty it shall be thereupon to release and restore the same to the owner or owners thereof."

Mr. POTTER said he presumed no gentleman wished to enforce the non-intercourse in case France should not have revoked her decrees. Under this idea he moved to insert, after the clause declaring the non-importation in force as to Great Britain, the following amendment:

"In case France has so revoked or modified her decrees as that they have ceased to violate the neutral commerce of the United States."

Mr. EPPES remarked that this amendment would go to reduce things to that state which this law was intended to guard against, viz: it would place the decision on the existence of the non-intercourse at the discretion of the courts. He remarked also, that it was not proposed on either side of the House, after the arrangement, in April, 1809, with Great Britain, to re-enact the non-intercourse with her, conditioned that she should not fulfil her engagement. Why was it now thought necessary in this case?

Mr. WHEATON rose, and on this motion went at large into the merits of the bill, and of the course of Administration for years past. The bill was unnecessary; he could see no use for it, unless to favor the views of the great Napoleon, to the depression of Great Britain. He went into a train of reasoning to support the opinions he advanced, and to show that for the last ten years everything had gone wrong, and that this bill was a part of the same pernicious system.

The question on Mr. POTTER's amendment was decided by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS—Abijah Bigelow, Daniel Blaisdell, James Breckenridge, William A. Burwell, John Campbell, William Chamberlin, Epaphroditus Champion, John Davenport, jun., William Hale, Ebenezer Huntington, Richard Jackson, jun., Robert Jenkins, William Kennedy, Robert Le Roy Livingston, Nathaniel Macon, Archibald McBryde, William Milnor, Jonathan O. Mr. MUMFORD moved to make a verbal amendment in the proviso for excepting from seizure vessels sailing for a port beyond the Cape of Good Hope previous to the 10th of December.

Mr. PITKIN made a motion to strike out the whole proviso. He was unwilling that such a distinction should be made in favor of a particular class of merchants. He would place all merchants on the same footing.

Mr. RANDOLPH moved to recommit the section under consideration for the purpose of inserting the proviso just offered by Mr. PITKIN and rejected. Motion lost—60 to 40.

FEBRUARY, 1811.

Messrs. PICKMAN, GARDENIER, and EPPES, opposed Mr. PITKIN's motion.

Messrs. STANLEY and POTTER spoke in favor of it.

The motion was negatived—43 to 33.

Mr. MUMFORD's motion for a verbal amendment was then carried.

About half past one o'clock, the question was taken on concurring with the Committee of the Whole in the agreement to the second section of Mr. EPPES's amendment, and carried.

Mr. LYON moved to strike out so much of the last section under consideration as designates by numbers the sections of the non-intercourse law to be revived, and in place thereof to insert the sections themselves at large. He said that it would be insulting the people of the United States to pass the bill as it now stood, as they would not be able to ascertain the meaning of the law.

A division of the question was called for, and the question on striking out the words proposed to be erased was decided by yeas and nays, and lost—yeas 13, nays 67, as follows:

YEAS—James Emott, Barent Gardenier, Thomas R. Gold, Ebenezer Huntington, Matthew Lyon, Archibald McBryde, Timothy Pitkin, jr., Elisha R. Potter, John Stanley, Jacob Swoope, Benjamin Tallmadge, Archibald Van Horn, and Ezekiel Whitman.

Scudder, Ebenezer Seaver, Adam Seybert, Uri Tracy, George M. Troup, Charles Turner, jun., Robert Weakley, Robert Whitehill, and Robert Witherspoon.

It was now half past two o'clock in the morning.

Mr. LYON then called for the reading of all the sections which were enumerated in the section under consideration.

The reading was objected to by Mr. W. ALSTON, on the ground that it was only intended to consume the time of the House.

The question was stated by the SPEAKER, whether these sections should be read.

Mr. GARDENIER was speaking rather diffusely on this question, when the previous question was enforced.

Mr. GHOLSON called for the previous question on the motion for reading these sections.

The previous question was then taken according to the rules of the House, as follows: "Shall the main question be now put?" and carried in the affirmative.

Mr. GARDENIER then began to debate the main question on reading the document.

Mr. GHOLSON objected to debate in this stage of the business as out of order, the House having determined the previous question in the affirmative, and thereby precluded debate.

The SPEAKER decided that, according to the late practice of the House, it was in order to debate the main question after the previous question had been taken. He said that this practice had been established by the House by a decision two years ago, in opposition to an opinion which he himself had always entertained, and had then declared. His decision on that occasion was reversed, and he felt himself bound by that expression of the sense of the House.

Mr. GHOLSON appealed from the decision of the Speaker.

A debate commenced on this appeal from the Speaker's decision. Mr. P. B. PORTER made a question of order whether the appeal could be debated. The SPEAKER decided that such was the practice of the House.

From this decision, also, an appeal was made by Mr. P. B. PORTER, and the decision reversed by a vote—yeas 13, nays 66, as follows:

NAYS—Lemuel J. Alston, Willis Alston, jun., Wm. Anderson, David Bard, William T. Barry, Burwell Bassett, William W. Bibb, Adam Boyd, Rob't Brown, William A. Eppes, William Findley, Meshack Franklin, Barzillai Gannett, Gideon Gardner, Thomas Gholson, Peterson Goodwyn, James Holland, Jacob Hufty, Richard M. Johnson, Thomas Kenan, William Kennedy, John Love, Aaron Lyle, Samuel McKee, William McKinley, Pleasant M. Miller, Saml. L. Mitchell, John Montgomery, Nicholas R. Moore, Thomas Moore, Jeremiah Morrow, Gurdon S. Mumford, Thomas Newbold, Thomas Newton, John Porter, Peter B. Troup, Charles Turner, junior, Robert Weakley, Robert Whitehill, and Robert Witherspoon.

The question recurred on Mr. GHOLSON's appeal. The decision of the Chair was reversed; and it was decided by the House, that after the previous question was decided in the affirmative, the main question should not be debated.

The main question, viz: "Shall the document be read?" as called for by Mr. LYON, was taken, and determined in the negative.

Mr. BIBB moved that the bill be engrossed, and read a third time, and called for the previous question; but, at the suggestion of Mr. TROUP, withdrew his motion in order to enable Mr. T. to propose a new section to the bill, authorizing the President to employ a number of vessels to enforce the provisions of the bill.

Mr. MACON observed, that the section offered by the gentleman from Georgia, (Mr. TROUP,) involved an expenditure of money, and therefore put it to the Chair, whether the bill ought not to be recommitted to a Committee of the Whole, pursuant to the rules of the House.

Mr. TROUP said, that, to relieve the House from any embarrassment, he would now withdraw his amendment.

The question recurring on ordering the bill to be engrossed for a third reading,

Mr. MACON addressed the Chair on the merits of the bill at some length. He believed the President to have been justified in issuing his proclamation by the Duke de Cadore's letter; but as subsequent information had been received from France, the question appeared to him to resolve itself into this. Was the sequestration of our vessels from the 1st November to the 2d of February a violation of our neutral rights or not?—Had the decrees been so modified, under present circumstances, as that they had ceased to violate our neutral commerce? He conceived not, and should therefore vote against the bill. He deprecated the course of debate, and the irritation which prevailed in the House, as tending to bring this body into disrepute, &c.

Mr. GARDENIER offered the following amendment to the bill:

"And be it further enacted, That if the President of the United States shall not, on or before the — day of — next, announce, by proclamation, that the French Government has caused reparation to be made for such spoliation upon the neutral commerce of the United States as have been perpetrated in consequence of the unlawful edicts of France, violating that commerce, then the act to which this is a supplement shall cease and be void, anything therein, or in the proclamation of the President of the United States of the 2d November last, contained, to the contrary notwithstanding."

On motion of Mr. RINGGOLD, the previous question on the amendment was required.

The previous question was put and carried, Mr. GARDENIER proceeded to debate his amendment.

The SPEAKER declared, according to the decision of the House this evening, that the question now admitted not of debate.

Mr. GARDENIER appealed from the Speaker's decision, which was confirmed by the House.

The main question was then put on Mr. GARDENIER's amendment, and negatived.

Mr. G. then moved to amend the bill by adding thereto the following section:

"And be it further enacted, That if the President of the United States shall not, on or before the — day of — next, announce, by proclamation, that the French Government has caused restitution to be made of all vessels and cargoes seized by its order, or under pretence of any or either of its edicts violating the neutral commerce of the United States, or under any other unlawful pretence whatsoever, subsequent to the first day of November last, then and in such case the act to which this a supplement, shall and hereby is declared to be in force, as well against France and her dependencies as against Great Britain and her dependencies, to all intents and purposes, as if the proclamation of the President of the United States of the second day of November last had never been issued, anything in the said act, or in the said proclamation contained, to the contrary, in anywise notwithstanding."

Mr. RINGGOLD required the previous question.

Mr. RANDOLPH made some observations in the shape of inquiry of the Speaker as to the precise extent of the decisions on the subject of the previous question this evening; but he had not spoken many minutes, when, for something that was deemed objectionable in his remarks, he was called to order at once by several gentlemen.

Mr. RINGGOLD insisted on the call he had made for the previous question, as a right of which he would not be deprived.

The previous question being required by more than a sufficient number of members, it was put, and carried. The main question on the amendment was put and negatived.

It was now past four o'clock.

Mr. GARDENIER then moved the following amendment:

And be it further enacted, That if the President of the United States shall not, on or before the — day of — next, announce, by proclamation, that all French edicts violating the neutral commerce of the United States have been revoked, and that the French Government has actually ceased to violate the neutral commerce of the United States, the act to which this is a supplement shall cease and be void, anything therein, or in the proclamation of the President of the United States, contained, to the contrary notwithstanding."

The SPEAKER declared this amendment to be out of order, inasmuch as it was substantially the same with one which had been moved by Mr. POTTER, and negatived.

Mr. P. B. PORTER then said that, for the purpose of coming to a decision on the bill, and putting an end to a scene which was, to say the least of it, disreputable to the House, he moved for the previous question on engrossing the bill.

The previous question was taken and decided in the affirmative, and the bill ordered to a third reading—65 to 9.

The bill was then read a third time.

The previous question was required on its passage, and carried in the affirmative.

Mr. RANDOLPH twice successively moved an adjournment. Motions negatived; the first 65 to 10, the second 66 to 8.

The question on the passage of the bill was then decided in the affirmative—yeas 64, nays 12, as follows:

YEAS—Lemuel J. Alston, Willis Alston, jun., William Anderson, David Bard, William T. Barry, Burwell Bassett, William W. Bibb, Adam Boyd, Robert Brown, William A. Burwell, William Butler, Joseph Calhoun, Langdon Cheves, Matthew Clay, James

The House then adjourned to meet again at one o'clock.

[During the course of such a session as that of this evening, many circumstances occur of trivial importance, but yet sufficient to produce warmth, which it cannot be expected of a reporter of the deliberations of a Legislative body to report. Such incidents are of course omitted.]

The following is the bill as it passed this House:

A. Bill supplementary to the act, entitled "An act concerning the commercial intercourse between the United States and Great Britain and France, and their dependencies, and for other purposes."

Be it enacted, &c., That no vessel, owned wholly by a citizen or citizens of the United States, which shall have departed from a British port, prior to the 2d day of February, 1811, and no merchandise owned wholly by a citizen or citizens of the United States, imported in such vessel, shall be liable to seizure or forfeiture on account of any infraction or presumed infraction of the provisions of the act to which this act is a supplement.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That, in case Great Britain shall so revoke or modify her edicts, as that they shall cease to violate the neutral commerce of the United States, the President of the United States shall declare the fact by proclamation; and such proclamation shall be admitted as evidence, and no other evidence shall be admitted of such revocation or modification in any suit or prosecution which may be instituted under the fourth section of the act to which this act is a supplement. And the restrictions imposed, or which may be imposed, by virtue of the said act, shall, from the date of such proclamation, cease and be discontinued.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That, until the proclamation aforesaid shall have been issued, the several provisions of the third, fourth, fifth, sixth, seventh, eighth, ninth, tenth, and eighteenth sections of the act, entitled "An act to interdict the commercial intercourse between the United States and Great Britain and France and their dependencies, and for other purposes," shall have full force and be immediately carried into effect against Britain, her colonies, and dependencies: Provided, however, That any vessel or merchandise which may, in pursuance thereof, be seized, prior to the fact being ascertained, whether Great Britain shall, on or before the second day of February, one thousand eight hundred and eleven, have revoked or modified her edicts in the manner above-mentioned, shall, nevertheless, be restored, on application of the parties, on their giving bond with approved sureties to the United States, in a sum equal to the value thereof, to abide the decision of the proper court of the United States thereon; and any such bond shall be considered as satisfied if Great Britain shall, on or before the second day of February, one thousand eight hundred and eleven, have revoked or modified her edicts in the manner above-mentioned: Provided, also, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to affect any ships or vessels, or the cargoes of ships or vessels, wholly owned by a citizen or citizens of the United States, which had cleared out for the Cape of Good Hope, or for any port beyond the same, prior to the tenth of November, one thousand eight hundred and ten.

THURSDAY, February 28.

A motion was made by Mr. RANDOLPH to amend the Journal of yesterday, in that part of the Journal where the main question was put on the passage of the bill supplementary to the act, entitled "An act concerning the commercial intercourse between the United States and Great Britain and France, and their dependencies, and for other purposes," after the word "question," by inserting the following words: "without debate, being precluded by the decision of the House." And, the question being taken thereon, was determined in the negative.

The bill from the Senate, entitled "An act providing for the final adjustment of claims to lands, and for the sale of the public lands in the Territories of Orleans and Louisiana, and to repeal the act passed for the same purpose, and approved February sixteenth, 1811, was read twice, and the thirteenth section thereof committed to a Committee of the Whole to-day.

The bill from the Senate, entitled "An act to authorize the payment of certain certificates, credits, and pensions, and for other purposes," was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Saturday next.

The House proceeded to consider the amendments of the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act to erect a light-house on Boon Island, in the State of Massachusetts, to place buoys off Cape Fear river, and to erect a beacon at New Inlet, in the State of North Carolina, and to place buoys at the entrance of the harbor of Edgartown, and to erect a column of stone on Cape Elizabeth, in the State of Massachusetts."

Whereupon, the said amendments were referred to a Committee of the Whole this day.

The House proceeded to consider the amendments of the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act for establishing trading-houses with the Indian tribes," and the same being twice read, were severally concurred in by the House.

THIRD CENSUS.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

FEBRUARY, 1811.

Returned Bill—Armed Neutrality.

H. OF R.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States :

I transmit and recommend to the attention of Congress a report of the Secretary of State relative to deficiencies in the returns of the census.

JAMES MADISON.

FEBRUARY 28, 1811.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Feb. 27, 1811.

The Secretary of State respectfully represents to the President, that, agreeably to the several acts of Congress, authorizing the third census or enumeration of the inhabitants of the United States and the Territories thereof, instructions were issued to the several Marshals and Secretaries, conformably to the provisions of the law; in consequence of which, regular returns of the population of the following Districts and Territories have been received at the Department of State, to wit: Maine, Massachusetts, New Hampshire, Vermont, Rhode Island, Connecticut, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, Ohio, Kentucky, North Carolina, Georgia, West Tennessee, the Territory of Louisiana, the Territory of Indiana, the Territory of Illinois, the Mississippi Territory, and the District of Columbia; and that returns remain to be received from the District of East Tennessee, the Territory of Orleans, the Territory of Michigan, the District of South Carolina, and from the District of Virginia. That, with respect to the latter, a letter has been this day received from Andrew Moore, Esq., Marshal of the District of Virginia, dated "Richmond, February 20, 1811," informing that "no return has been received from Norfolk city, Norfolk borough, or Petersburg;" that he had pressed his assistants in those divisions of his district by "repeated letters;" and that "from their silence he doubts whether they have done any part of the business." The Secretary of State further represents to the President that the first of March, 1811, is the time limited by law, for the Marshals and Secretaries to complete their returns to this Department, and, as that period is now at hand, he suggests the propriety of recommending to Congress the consideration of the subject, in order that timely provision may be made by the competent authority for obviating such doubts and difficulties as may occur accidentally, or through negligence, to prevent the perfection of the enumeration or return of the inhabitants of any District or Territory, or divisions thereof, within the time prescribed by the several acts authorizing the third census.

All which is respectfully submitted.

R. SMITH.

The Message was read, and, together with the report accompanying the same, referred to Mr. BURWELL, Mr. PITKIN, and Mr. CHEVES, to report thereon, by bill, or otherwise.

RETURNED BILL.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the House of Representatives of the United States :

Having examined and considered the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Richard Tervin, William Coleman, Edwin Lewis, Samuel Mims, Joseph Wilson, and the Baptist Church at Salem Meeting-house, in the Mississippi Territory," I now return the same to the House of Representatives, in which it originated, with the following objection:

"Because the bill, in reserving a certain parcel of land of the United States for the use of said Baptist Church, comprises a principle and precedent, for the appropriation of funds of the United States, for the use and support of religious societies; contrary to the article of the Constitution which declares that Congress shall make no law respecting a religious establishment."

JAMES MADISON.

FEBRUARY 28, 1811.

The Message having been read—

Ordered, That to-morrow be assigned for the reconsideration of the said bill according to the Constitution.

ARMED NEUTRALITY.

Mr. MUMFORD offered the following resolution for consideration:

"Whereas when two or more nations go to war, those that remain at peace retain their natural right to pursue their agriculture, manufactures, and commerce; to carry the produce of their labor to all places, belligerent or neutral, as usual; to come and go freely without injury or molestation; and, in short, that the war shall be to them as if it did not exist, (with the exception only of not furnishing either implements of war for the annoyance of the other, nor anything whatever to a place actually invested by its enemy.) And whereas as a state of war at present existing between Great Britain and France furnishes no legitimate right to either to interrupt the agriculture and commerce of the United States, or the peaceable exchange of its produce with all nations: And whereas no nation can submit to have its peaceable industry suspended at the mere will of other nations in violation of their natural rights: Therefore,

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of authorizing, by law, merchant vessels of the United States to arm in defence of their persons and property on the high seas, against the spoiliations of all or any of the belligerents; and report by bill, or otherwise.

Mr. PITKIN said he had not the least objection to the resolution, but it was entirely unusual to prefix preambles to resolutions for appointing committees for inquiry. He said it was not only unnecessary but unprecedented.

Mr. WRIGHT spoke in favor of retaining the preamble. He had no objection to record his vote in support of the principles it contained.

The question on striking out the preamble was decided by yeas and nays. For striking out, 51; for retaining, 53—as follows:

YEAS—Joseph Allen, David Bard, William W. Bibb, Abijah Bigelow, Daniel Blaisdell, Adam Boyd, James Breckenridge, Robert Brown, John C. Chamberlain, William Chamberlin, Martin Chittenden, James Cochran, Richard Cutts, John Dawson, James Emott, Thos. R. Gold, William Hale, Daniel Heister, Jonathan H. Hubbard, Ebenezer Huntington, Robert Jenkins, Herman Knickerbacker, Joseph Lewis, jr., Edward St. Loe Livermore, Nathaniel Macon, Vincent Matthews, Archibald McBryde, Samuel McKee, Pleasant M. Miller, William Milnor, Nicholas R. Moore, Thomas Newbold, John Nicholson, Joseph Pearson, Benjamin Pickman, jr., Timothy Pitkin, jr., Lemuel Sawyer, John A. Scudder, Daniel Sheffey, John Smilie, Richard Stanford, John Stanley, James Stephenson, Lewis B. YAYS—Lemuel J. Alston, Willis Alston, jr., William Anderson, William T. Barry, Burwell Bassett, William A. Burwell, William Butler, Joseph Calhoun, Langdon Cheves, Matthew Clay, John Clopton, William Crawford, Joseph Desha, William Findley, Meshack Franklin, David S. Garland, Thomas Gholson, Charles Goldsborough, Peterson Goodwyn, William Helms, Jacob Hufty, Richard M. Johnson, Walter Jones, Thomas Kenan, William Kennedy, Aaron Lyle, Alexander McKim, William McKinley, Samuel L. Mitchill, John Montgomery, Thomas Moore, Gurdon S. Mumford, Thomas Newton, Elisha R. Potter, John Rea of Pennsylvania, John Rhea of Tennessee, Matthias Richards, Samuel Ringgold, Erastus Root, John Ross, Ebenezer Sage, Ebenezer Seaver, Adam Seybert, Samuel Shaw, Dennis Smelt, George Smith, John Smith, John Thompson, Uri Tracy, George M. Troup, Robert Weakley, Robert Whitehill, and Robert Wright.

Mr. PITKIN said he was in favor of the resolution. He hoped that it was not merely a flourish, but that something was to grow out of it; that the committee would make a report authorizing the arming. And if they were to make such a report in a practicable form, it would find his support, although perhaps some who had voted to retain this preamble would not be found on the same side with him.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH moved to strike out the words authorizing the committee to report by bill or otherwise. He supposed the object of the gentleman was to issue a luminous manifesto on the subject of our rights. If he wished to exercise his talents in making such a report, he did not wish to embarrass the committee by requiring them to report by bill.

Mr. MUMFORD hoped the motion would not prevail. He assured the gentleman from Maryland that he did not wish to display his talents in writing manifestoes. If the resolution should pass, and he should be on the committee, the bill should, if possible, be reported before sundown.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH's motion was negatived—59 to 32.

Mr. BIBB said, that no doubt the subject of the resolution was important and worthy of consideration, but every gentleman must be confident that it could not be acted upon during the present session. He was unwilling to excite the public expectation when it could not be realized, and therefore moved that the resolution lie on the table.

The motion was negatived—46 to 44.

FRIDAY, March 1.

The following letter was laid before the House by the SPEAKER:

To the Hon. J. B. VARNUM,

Speaker of the House of Representatives.

SIR: The report of the Comptroller, at the beginning of the present session, having stated that my accounts remained unsettled, and that I stood charged with all the moneys disbursed for the United States during my agency in Algiers, Tunis, and Tripoli; and this report having given rise to some debate in the House of Representatives, I now take the liberty of transmitting to you the enclosed letter from the Comptroller, stating that the said account is settled.

I beg you will communicate this to the House for their information, that it may go into the same channel of publicity with the mistaken suggestion that I had remained for thirteen years a debtor in a great amount to the public Treasury.

I will only add, that this account, precisely as now passed at the Treasury, was settled in the year 1797, with Colonel Humphreys, then Minister at Madrid, from whom I had received the money, and to whom, alone, I conceived myself accountable. I naturally concluded that he had passed it as incorporated in his own accounts. And it was only this Winter, and in consequence of the above report of the Comptroller, that I came to the knowledge that my name was ever written on the books of the Treasury.

I have the honor to be, &c.

JOEL BARLOW.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 28, 1811.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,

Comptroller's Office, February 27, 1811.

SIR: Your accounts as late agent of the United States, for negotiating with the Barbary Powers, are adjusted, and finally closed on the books of the Treasury. I have the honor to be, &c.

G. DUVAL.

JOEL BARLOW, Esq.

The letter was ordered to be printed.

On motion of Mr. NEWTON,

Resolved, That the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing for the settlement of the accounts of the persons who have taken, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, an account of the several manufacturing establishments and manufactures within their several districts, in pursuance of an act, entitled "An act further to alter and amend an act providing for the third census, or enumeration of the inhabitants of the United States;" and that they have leave to report by bill, or otherwise.

On motion of Mr. BIBB,

Resolved, That the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures be instructed to inquire into the expediency of granting the consent of Congress to an act of the State of Georgia, passed the twelfth day of December, 1804, establishing the fees of the harbor master and health officer of the ports of Savannah and St. Mary's; and that they have leave to report by bill, or otherwise.

Mr. ROOT, from the Committee of Claims, presented a bill concerning invalid pensions; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

Mr. DAWSON, from the committee appointed on that part of the President's Message, at the commencement of the session, presented a bill making further appropriations to complete the fortifications commenced for the security of the ports and harbors of the United States; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-day.

Mr. NEWTON, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, presented a bill declaring the consent of Congress to an act of the State of Georgia, passed the twelfth of December, 1804, establishing the fees of the harbor master and health officer of the ports of Savannah and

St. Mary's; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-day.

On motion of Mr. EPPES, the several orders of the day were postponed.

Mr. EPPES then called for the order of the day on the bill authorizing a loan.

The House, accordingly, resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the said bill.

Mr. EPPES moved to fill the blank in the first section with "$5,000,000;" which was agreed to.

The Committee rose, and reported the bill as amended; which report was concurred in, and the bill ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the amendments of the Senate to the bill erecting light-houses on Boon Island, &c.; which was reported as concurred with, and agreed to by the House.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act authorizing the President of the United States to accept the service of a number of volunteer companies, not exceeding fifty thousand men," to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill erecting the districts of Mumfremagog, Oswegatchie, and of the White Mountains; and on the bill, from the Senate, annexing part of Jersey to New York district, &c.; which, after considerable discussion, were reported, and ordered to a third reading.

The bill authorizing a loan was read a third time, and passed without opposition.

The bill respecting the districts of Mumfremagog, &c., and the bill for the relief of John Macnamara, were read a third time, and passed.

The bill authorizing the issuing of debentures in certain cases was taken up. On the question to postpone indefinitely—ayes 33, noes 56. The bill was then read a third time, and passed—ayes 55, noes 31.

Mr. BURWELL reported a bill for extending the time for completing the returns of the third census or enumeration of the people of the United States; which was read twice, and ordered to be engrossed.

The bill declaring the assent of Congress to an act of the State of Georgia, respecting certain fees of the health officer and harbor master of the ports of Savannah and Georgia, went through a Committee of the Whole, and was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The House adjourned to six o'clock, p. m.

MARCH 1—Six o'clock, p. m.

The bill from the Senate, entitled "An act authorizing the President of the United States to accept the service of a number of volunteer companies, not exceeding fifty thousand men," was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-day.

An engrossed bill to extend the time for completing the third census, or enumeration of the inhabitants of the United States, was read the third time, and passed.

An engrossed bill, declaring the consent of Congress to an act of the State of Georgia, passed the twelfth of December, 1804, establishing the fees of the harbor master and health officer of the ports of Savannah and St. Mary's, was read the third time, and passed.

An engrossed bill to annex a part of the State of New Jersey to the collection district of New York; to remove the office of collector of Niagara to Lewistown; to establish a new district, to be called the district of St. Lawrence; to make Cape St. Vincent, in the district of Sackett's Harbor, a port of delivery; and out of the districts of Miami and Mississippi to make two new districts, to be called the districts of Sandusky and Teche, and for other purposes, was read the third time, and passed.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the thirteenth section of the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act providing for the final adjustment of claims to lands, and for the sale of the public lands in the Territories of Orleans and Louisiana, and to repeal the act passed for the same purpose, and approved sixteenth of February, 1811;" no amendment being made, the bill was ordered to a third reading to-morrow.

FORTIFICATIONS.

On motion of Mr. DAWSON, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill making further appropriations to complete fortifications.

Mr. DAWSON moved to fill the blank for the sum with $131,000.

Mr. McKEE objected to such large annual appropriations for fortifications. He said he could not vote for this appropriation without further information.

The report of the Secretary of War on the subject was read.

Mr. MITCHELL read a letter of the Secretary of War to him on the subject.

The House adjourned at a quarter past 9 o'clock, without taking the question on the bill.

In the course of the day, Mr. MUMFORD several times attempted to call up his motion respecting the arming our merchant vessels, &c., but without success.

SATURDAY, March 2.

A letter was received from the Secretary of War, enclosing an account of the expenses of the National Armories at Springfield and Harper's Ferry, together with a return of the arms made and repaired at each, during the year 1810.

[At Harper's Ferry, arms manufactured in 1810 were 8,600; repaired, 606; expenses, including expense of additional buildings, $155,090 19. At Springfield, Massachusetts, arms manufactured, 10,301; repaired, 406; expenses, $122,774 08.]

Mr. NEWTON reported a bill allowing a reasonable compensation to the persons who have taken an account of the several manufacturing establishments; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. NEWTON proposed to fill the blank in the bill, for the amount to be appropriated, with $70,000. After debate, this motion was negatively, as also were motions to fill the blank with $60,000, $50,000, and $40,000. The blank was eventually filled with $30,000; and, as amended, the bill passed to a third reading, and was then read a third time, and passed.

The bill appropriating a sum of money for completing the fortifications, &c., was read a third time, and passed.

The bill concerning invalid pensioners was gone through in Committee, and read a third time, and passed.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act authorizing a loan of money for a sum not exceeding five millions of dollars," with an amendment; and the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of John Macnamara," also with an amendment; to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

The House proceeded to consider the amendments of the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act authorizing a loan of money for a sum not exceeding five millions of dollars;" and the said amendment being read, was concurred in by the House.

The House proceeded to consider the amendment of the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of John Macnamara;" and the said amendment being read, was concurred in by the House.

An engrossed bill, making further appropriations for completing the fortifications commenced for the security of the ports and harbors of the United States, was read the third time, and passed.

An engrossed bill for allowing a reasonable compensation to the persons who have taken an account of the several manufacturing establishments and manufactures within the United States, was read the third time, and passed.

The bill from the Senate, providing for the final adjustment of claims to lands, and for the sale of the public lands in the Territories of Orleans and Louisiana, and to repeal the act passed for the same purpose, the 10th of February, 1811, was read a third time, and passed.

The bill concerning invalid pensioners was read a third time, and passed.

RETURNED BILL.

The House proceeded to reconsider the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Richard Tervin, William Coleman, Edwin Lewis, Samuel Mims, Joseph Wilson, and the Baptist Church at Salem Meeting House, in the Mississippi Territory;" which was returned by the President of the United States, with objections.

The said bill was read at the Clerk's table, and is as follows:

An Act for the relief of Richard Tervin, William Coleman, Edwin Lewis, Samuel Mims, Joseph Wilson, and the Baptist Church at Salem Meeting House, in the Mississippi Territory.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, That Richard Tervin be and he is hereby authorized to produce to the Register of the Land Office and the Receiver of Public Moneys for the district east of Pearl river, in the Mississippi Territory, evidence of his having inhabited and cultivated a tract of land in said Territory, prior to the thirtieth day of March, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-eight; and, in case such evidence shall be produced, the said Register and Receiver are required to grant to the said Richard Tervin a donation certificate for such tract of land, not exceeding six hundred and forty acres.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That William Coleman be and he is hereby authorized to produce to the said Register and Receiver evidence of his right to a donation of a tract of land, on the Tombigbee river, in the said Territory; and in case he shall produce satisfactory evidence to the said Register and Receiver that he was entitled to a donation of such tract, according to the provisions of the second section of the act, entitled "An act regulating the grants of land, and providing for the disposal of the lands of the United States south of the State of Tennessee," and the acts supplementary thereto, it shall then be lawful for the said William Coleman to locate a quantity of land equal to that to which he was entitled under the abovementioned provisions, on any lands of the United States which shall have been offered at public sale in the said district, and that shall then remain unsold; and it shall be the duty of the said Register and Receiver to issue a donation certificate to the said William Coleman for the land so located by him.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That Edwin Lewis be entitled to the right of pre-emption in five acres of land, situate within the boundaries of a tract of land whereon he resides; which five acres was heretofore used for an encampment for the troops of the United States, so soon as the same shall cease to be used for that purpose; the said five acres to be paid for at the same price, and on the same terms and conditions, as are provided for lands granted by right of pre-emption in the Mississippi Territory.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That Samuel Mims be and he is hereby confirmed in his title to a tract of land, containing five hundred and eighty-four acres, granted by the British Government of West Florida to William Clark, so as not to deprive the heirs of said Clark, or any other person or persons, of their legal remedy, if any they have, for the recovery of said lands from the said Mims, his heirs or assigns.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That Joseph Wilson be and he is hereby authorized to enter with the Register of the Land Office his certificate of pre-emption right, granted to him by the Board of Commissioners for the district east of Pearl river, in the Mississippi Territory, for the quantity of four hundred and eighty acres of land, lying on the Tombigbee river, in the said Territory; and that payment be made therefor at the same price and on the same terms and conditions as are provided by law for other lands granted in right of pre-emption in said Territory.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That there be reserved, the quantity of five acres of land, including Salem Meeting-house, in the Mississippi Territory, for the use of the Baptist Church, at said meeting-house.

J. B. VARNUM,

Speaker of the House of Representatives.

GEO. CLINTON,

Vice President of the United States, and President of the Senate.

The President's objections were also again read: And after debate, the question, "That the House, on reconsideration, do agree to pass the bill,"

Wright.

And so the said bill was rejected; two-thirds of the House not agreeing to pass the same.

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. P. B. PORTER, from the committee to whom was referred, on the twenty-fifth ultimo, the memorial of the Stockholders of the Bank of the United States, made the following report, which was read:

"The committee to whom was referred the memorial of the Stockholders of the Bank of the United States, report:

"That they have carefully examined the various matters set forth in the said memorial, and attentively listened to the representations of the gentlemen who have appeared in behalf of the said petitioners. The object of the memorialists, is to obtain extension of their corporate powers beyond the period limited for the expiration of their charter, so as to enable them to prosecute for their debts, and to arrange, liquidate, and close the various concerns of the company.

"The committee are of opinion that a law of Congress, granting the powers prayed for, would facilitate the final adjustment of the affairs of the bank, although they do not think such a law indispensable to that object. But believing, as your committee do, that, in granting the original charter to the stockholders, Congress transcended the legitimate powers of the Constitution; the same objection now presents itself to the extension of any of their corporate capacities.

"If the committee had time to go into the investigation, and to present to the House the various reasons which have conduced to this opinion, it would be more than useless to divert its attention from the important concerns of the nation, at this late period of the session, to a subject which, but a few days since, was so fully and elaborately discussed.

They therefore beg leave to introduce the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the prayer of the memorialists ought not to be granted."

The House agreed to meet to-morrow, (being Sunday.)

The House then adjourned to six o'clock this evening.

MARCH 2—6 o'clock p. m.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, accompanied with sundry statements, prepared in obedience to the act to establish a Mint, and regulating the coins of the United States; which were read.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a statement of fines, penalties, and forfeitures, and of expenses attending prosecutions under the embargo and non-intercourse laws; which were read.

A bill from the Senate for the relief of Richard Tervin and others, being the same bill as that returned by the President, with the exception of the objectionable section respecting the church claim, was read three times, and passed.

INDIAN TREATIES.

The House went into Committee of the Whole on the bill making appropriations for carrying into effect a treaty between the United States and the Great and Little Osage Indians.

Mr. WEAKLEY moved an amendment appropriating a sum of money for extinguishing the Indian title to certain lands in the State of Tennessee.—Motion lost, 47 to 35.

The Committee rose, and reported the bill.

Mr. WEAKLEY renewed his motion in the House in the following form: "that a sum not exceeding ten thousand dollars, be and is hereby appropriated for the purpose of defraying the expense of holding a treaty with the Chickasaw nation of Indians, for extinguishing claims to lands in the States of Tennessee and Kentucky."

The motion was supported by Messrs. BARRY, McKEE, and WEAKLEY; and opposed by Messrs. STURGES and KEY.

Mr. GARDENIER moved the previous question on the amendment, which was determined in the affirmative.

Mr. G. proceeded to debate.

The SPEAKER declared the decision of the House to be, that debate could not take place on the question now.

Mr. GARDENIER appealed from the Speaker's decision, which was affirmed—yeas 63, nays 36, as follows:

Mitchell, John Montgomery, Nicholas R. Moore, Jeremiah Morrow, Thomas Newbold, Thomas Newton, John Nicholson, John Porter, John Rea of Pennsylvania, John Rhea of Tennessee, Matthias Richards, Samuel Ringgold, John Roane, Erastus Root, John Ross, Ebenezer Sage, John A. Scudder, Ebenezer Seaver, Adam Seybert, Samuel Shaw, Dennis Smelt, John Smilie, George Smith, Henry Southard, John Thompson, Uri Tracy, Charles Turner, jun., Robert Weakley, Robert Whitehill, Robert Witherspoon, and Robert Wright.

Mr. WEAKLEY's amendment was then negatived—51 to 42.

An engrossed bill making appropriations for carrying into effect a treaty between the United States and the Great and Little Osage nations of Indians, concluded at Fort Clarke, on the tenth of November, 1808, was read the third time.

Resolved, That the said bill do pass, and that the title be "An act making appropriations for carrying into effect a treaty between the United States and the Great and Little Osage nations of Indians, concluded at Fort Clarke, on the tenth day of November, 1808, and for other purposes."

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act in addition to the act to regulate the laying out and making a road from Cumberland, in Maryland, to the State of Ohio." The bill was reported without an amendment; which was concurred in by the House, and the amendment ordered to be engrossed, and, together with the bill, be read the third time to-day.

VOLUNTEER CORPS.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill from the Senate authorizing the President of the United States to accept the services of a corps of volunteers not exceeding 50,000 men.

Mr. ROOR said the provisions of it were impracticable, and could not be made to harmonize. By the first section the President was authorized to accept the service of volunteers who should associate themselves into companies, the officers of which were to be appointed in a manner prescribed by the States. From various companies must be selected a section to each to form one company of the volunteers, who could not be organized till the States should pass laws to carry this bill into effect. He presumed there was no State in the Union which had at present passed laws for this amalgamation of companies, &c. Mr. R. pointed out what he deemed other incongruities in the bill. He said it contained valuable provisions without providing the means of carrying them into effect; and it was too late in the session to attempt to remodel the law. He therefore moved that the Committee rise.

Mr. DAWSON spoke of the present situation of the country as being critical. A great majority of the House had formerly agreed to provisions similar to those contained in this bill. If the House were to refuse now to pass it, they would leave the President destitute of means, &c., &c.

Mr. TALLMADGE coincided with Mr. ROOR as to the details of this bill, and was proceeding to debate the merits of the bill. The Chairman apprized him that on a motion for the Committee to rise, the merits could not be debated.

The question on the Committee's rising was determined in the affirmative, and they were refused leave to sit again.

The bill from the Senate, entitled "An act in addition to the act to regulate the laying out and making a road from Cumberland, in the State of Maryland, to the State of Ohio," was read the third time, and passed as amended.

DISTRICT JUDGES.

The order of the day being called for on the bill to increase the compensation of the Judges in the District of Columbia—

Mr. QUINCY moved that it be indefinitely postponed. The reason he assigned was, that the salaries of the Judges of the United States were a matter to be acted on generally, and not specially. If the salaries of the Judges in this District were raised, so ought those in other districts, and not in this alone.

Mr. MILNOR spoke against postponement. It was no reason, because other Judges did not receive enough compensation, that a sufficiency should be withheld from the Judges of this District. It was impossible, he said, for a man to maintain himself decently for $1,600 a year in the District; the business of the District was very extensive, employing the Judges a great proportion of their time.

Mr. KEY opposed the motion for postponement. He spoke of the good character and conduct of the Judges, the laboriousness of their duty, the courts being twenty weeks in the year in constant session, besides as much time nearly occupied in their chambers in the duties of their office.

Mr. ROSS was in favor of the postponement. Inadequate as the salary was represented, there was never any difficulty in procuring persons to fill the vacancies in case of resignation. If there was no difficulty in filling the offices, what moral obligation was there to increase the salaries?

Mr. LIVERMORE and Mr. ALSTON spoke in favor of indefinite postponement, and Mr. GARDNER against it.

The motion for indefinite postponement was negatived, ayes 30; and the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill.

MARCH, 1811.

Extra Session.

H. OF R.

An addition of $200 was made to the salary of the Chief Judge, and $400 to that of the Associate Judges.

Mr. QUINCY moved to amend the bill by inserting; "And that the District Judges of the United States, in each and every district of the United States, shall each and every one receive the sum of $400 yearly, in addition to the compensation heretofore allowed by law."

The motion was lost, ayes 12.

The Committee rose and reported the bill as amended.

Mr. QUINCY renewed the motion he had unsuccessfully made in Committee; which was again negatived.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, 54 to 20, and was subsequently read a third time and passed.

Adjourned until to-morrow morning, ten o'clock.

SUNDAY, March 3.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill to remit certain fines, penalties, and forfeitures. The bill was reported with amendments thereto; which were read, and concurred in by the House, and the bill ordered to be engrossed, and read the third time to-day.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill, entitled "An act concerning invalid pensioners," with an amendment, to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill allowing additional compensation to the Postmaster General. The bill was reported with an amendment thereto; which was concurred in by the House, and the bill ordered to be engrossed, and read the third time to-day.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill for the relief of Charles Minifie. The bill was reported without amendment, and ordered to be engrossed, and read the third time to-day.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill for the relief of Lieutenant Colonel William Dent Beall. The bill was reported without amendment, and ordered to be engrossed, and read the third time to-day.

An engrossed bill allowing additional compensation to the Postmaster General was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. GARLAND, the several orders of the day, except the bill providing for the more effectual accountability of persons intrusted with public moneys, the bills from the Senate, and the engrossed bills, were postponed indefinitely.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill providing for the more effectual accountability of persons intrusted with public moneys; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported progress.

An engrossed bill to remit certain fines, forfeitures, and penalties, was read the third time, and passed.

An engrossed bill for the relief of Charles Minifie was read the third time, and passed.

An engrossed bill for the relief of Lieutenant Colonel William Dent Beall was read the third time, and passed.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have appointed a committee on their part, jointly, with such committee as may be appointed on the part of this House, to wait on the President of the United States, and inform him of the proposed recess of Congress.

On motion of Mr. RINGGOLD,

Resolved, That the Clerk of this House be authorized to pay, out of the contingent fund of the House, to James Claxton, the sum of one hundred dollars for his services during this session; and to Elextius Spalding, John Phillips, George Cooper, Richard Stewart, George N. Thomas, and Michael Sanford, the sum of fifty dollars each, in addition to their usual compensations.

On motion,

Ordered, That the several bills from the Senate, entitled "An act making further provision for the Corps of Engineers;" "an act concerning the communication by water along the northern confines of the United States, and for other purposes;" "an act authorizing a subscription on the part of the United States to the stock of the Ohio Canal Company," be severally postponed indefinitely.

The House proceeded to consider the resolution of the Senate appointing a joint committee to inform the President of the proposed recess of Congress; and the same was concurred in by the House; and Messrs. GARLAND and ANDERSON were appointed the committee on the part of this House.

The SPEAKER presented to the House a petition of the mechanics and manufacturers, in Mason county, in the State of Kentucky, praying that Congress may take the necessary steps to encourage and protect the various manufacturing establishments within the United States.—Laid on the table.

EXTRA SESSION

Mr. MONTGOMERY, after adverting to the uncertainty of the present state of our foreign affairs, and the temporary nature of the provisions existing in relation to them, offered the following resolution for consideration:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of fixing by law an earlier day for the meeting of Congress than the 1st Monday in December next, with leave to report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. POTTER opposed it on the ground that it was impossible for Congress to foresee a certain necessity for their meeting. If it should occur, the President was invested with the power to convoke Congress at his discretion.

Mr. LOVE was also opposed to the resolution even for inquiry. He could see no pressing occasion for an extra session; and the convening of Congress would be productive of great expense, and of great personal inconvenience to the members; and, although he himself should not be a member of the next Congress, he felt for those who would.

Mr. LIVERMORE was opposed to the resolution. He said he could not see why honorable gentlemen were so anxious for an extra session. Had they passed some act the operation of which they were afraid of; and did they therefore wish to be here? If so, they had better save themselves the trouble by immediately repealing the act. The President already had the power to call Congress; and he hoped gentlemen did not wish to take away from him the responsibility of convening them or not, as he should think proper.

Mr. TROUP was in favor of the resolution. It was true that an extra session would be attended with great personal inconvenience to himself; but, however great, he was willing to incur it to avoid a very great national evil. He was fully persuaded, considering the present state of our foreign relations, that there ought to be a session of Congress before the period fixed by the Constitution for the annual meeting of Congress.

The question was taken on the passage of Mr. MONTGOMERY's resolution.

For the resolution 29; against it 50.

INDIANA TERRITORY.

The bill from the Senate for the extension of suffrage in the Indiana territory, was taken up.

The first section being under consideration—

Mr. BIBB said it contained a principle on which he could not consent to act. He was sensible of the inconveniences under which the people of the Territory labor; that they are deprived of many rights, but the same deprivation of rights exists in all the Territories. At present it was penal to settle on the public lands. By the operation of this section, persons so settling contrary to law were permitted to vote—a premium was thus given for violations of the law. That objection was sufficient, if there was no other.

Mr. JENNINGS said, that the section was predicated upon a joint resolution of the Legislature of the Territory he had the honor to represent, and it was the request therefore of the freeholders only, who must be considered as having acted deliberately and from disinterested motives. He was loth to detain the Committee, when there were important subjects to be acted upon, and that too at so late a period of the session. He considered the principle contained in the first section of the bill to be undeniably correct. Mr. J. said that the citizens of the Territory were nearly all emigrants from the States, that they took with them all the ideas and feelings with respect to their liberty and rights with which they were impressed when citizens of the States from whence they respectively emigrated; and, that he could not believe that they were less qualified to exercise their rights in a proper manner, since they became subject to a Territorial Government, than when they were citizens of any of the States.

Other gentlemen expressed their opinions on the subject.

Mr. BIBB moved to amend the section by adding the following: "except such persons shall settle thereon contrary to law, and continue to reside thereon without permission of the United States."

Mr. JENNINGS observed that, by a law of the United States, many of those who were settled upon the public lands had obtained permission from the registers of the land office in which they respectively resided, and that it would be difficult to distinguish who were, or who were not settlers on the public lands contrary to law. It would, therefore, be extremely hard to deprive a great number of the citizens of the right which they were anxious to obtain, merely for the purpose of preventing a few, whom the gentleman from Georgia conceived to be illegal settlers upon the public lands, from voting.

Mr. RHEA of Tennessee opposed the amendment. He said that every one liable to militia duty ought to vote. Those persons performed militia duty, and were, in his opinion, entitled to vote.

The amendment was lost.

Mr. JENNINGS said that he had introduced the fourth section in the bill, from ideas he entertained that every man who acted as a legislator ought to stand upon independent and disinterested ground. That the clause of the section, which went to disqualify any person holding an office of profit under the Governor (justices of the peace, &c., excepted) from being eligible to the office of a member of the Legislative Council, or House of Representatives, or as a Delegate to the Congress of the United States for said Territory, until such office should be resigned, was intended to prevent the bartering of office for the purpose of inducing support to any candidate, who, at the time of being a candidate, should hold any office of profit except such as are excepted in this bill. Such a disqualification, so far as it goes, will have an equal operation upon every citizen of the Territory, while it would lead to pure and disinterested legislation, and operate as a barrier against any improper bias or encroachment upon the elective franchise. But, he said, a kind of silent legislation had been resorted to, in order to impress upon the minds of the members of this House that he was legislating to disqualify his competitor, if, indeed, he had but one. This was a secret mode of impeaching the motives of a legislator. He was not in the habit of impeaching the motives of any member, nor did he wish the motives by which he was actuated to be misrepresented. But, any person could qualify himself as a legislator by resigning an office of profit, which, Mr. J. conceived, he should, when he became a candidate to represent the people. He was not tenacious, however, for the principle contained in this section, if it would, in any measure, prevent the passage of the first section of the bill. He, therefore, moved that the section be stricken out.

Mr. HURTY opposed the motion to strike out. He could see nothing improper in the section, and hoped the motion would not be agreed to.

The motion was negatived, and the bill was then passed.

MARCH, 1811.

Adjournment.

H. OF R.

Evening Sitting.

The bills from the Senate were called up.

The bill authorizing the President to accept the services of a corps of volunteers, not exceeding fifty thousand men, was mentioned.

Mr. DAWSON hoped the House would take up the bill. They had determined there should not be an extra session, and it was incumbent on them to do something to provide for defence.

Mr. LYON said he had frequently voted for such bills when there was no prospect of war; and now, when we were going into war, and giving the provocation ourselves, he was of opinion it ought to be passed.

The bill was indefinitely postponed.

The bill for laying out a certain road in pursuance of the Treaty of Brownstown was next called up.

Mr. GOLD spoke in favor of considering it, and the bill was indefinitely postponed.

The bill for the relief of Thomas Campbell was next in order.

Mr. MILNOR and Mr. MONTGOMERY spoke in favor of taking it up.

The motion to postpone the bill indefinitely was negatived.

The bill authorizing the payment of certain certificates and pensions came next upon the tapis.

Mr. WHITMAN and Mr. JOHNSON spoke in favor of it.

The votes were, for postponement, 39; against it, 39.

Another count being called, there were, for postponement, 33; against it, 38.

Another count being called—for postponement 38; against it, 38.

The SPEAKER decided the question in the affirmative.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill for the relief of Thomas Campbell. Messrs. MILNOR, FINDLEY, and PICKMAN, supported, and Mr. ROOT opposed it.

A confidential message from the Senate caused the Committee to rise before the bill was gone through with, and the discussion of it was not resumed.

On motion of Mr. SMILE,

Resolved, That the thanks of this House be presented to JOSEPH B. VARNUM, in testimony of their approbation of his conduct in the discharge of the arduous and important duties assigned to him while in the Chair.

The SPEAKER then made his acknowledgments to the House in the following words:

Gentlemen of the House of Representatives:

I acknowledge, with grateful sensibility, the aid you have afforded me in the discharge of the duties of Speaker. Your approbation of my conduct in the important office you have been pleased to assign me, affords me very great consolation; and permit me to assure you, gentlemen, that you have my most ardent wishes for your individual prosperity and happiness.

Mr. BURWELL offered a resolution requiring the proper officers to cause to be laid before Congress, at their next session, a statement of all persons who receive money from the public Treasury, and the amounts they receive respectively.

Mr. STANLEY gave his hearty support to the motion, and Mr. ALSTON and Mr. EPPES suggested an amendment of it.

At this moment, Mr. GARLAND, from the committee appointed for the purpose, reported that they had waited on the President and informed him that they proposed to adjourn, and had received for answer that he had no further communication to make.

A message was received from the Senate, and reciprocated, that they were about to adjourn; a motion was then made to adjourn, and carried.

SUPPLEMENTAL JOURNAL

OF SUCH PROCEEDINGS OF THE THIRD SESSION OF THE ELEVENTH CONGRESS, AS, DURING THE TIME THEY WERE DEPENDING, WERE ORDERED TO BE KEPT SECRET, AND RESPECTING WHICH THE INJUNCTION OF SECRECY WAS AFTERWARDS REMOVED BY ORDER OF THE HOUSE.

THURSDAY, January 3, 1811.

A confidential Message was received from the President of the United States; when the House was cleared of all persons except the members and the Clerk, and the said Message was read, and referred to a select committee, composed of Mr. MONTGOMERY, Mr. CUTTS, Mr. W. ALSTON, Mr. P. B. PORTER, Mr. GRAY, Mr. HAVEN, Mr. HUNTINGTON, Mr. MILLER, and Mr. BARRY, to consider and report thereon.—[See Appendix.]

SATURDAY, January 5.

The House being cleared of all persons except the members and Clerk, on a motion made, and leave given by the House, Mr. MONTGOMERY, from the committee appointed, on the third instant, on the confidential Message of the President of the United States, presented a bill authorizing the President of the United States to occupy the territory therein mentioned, and for other purposes; which was read the first and second time.

A motion was then made by Mr. BURWELL, that it be the order for Monday next; and the question being taken thereon, it was resolved in the affirmative—yeas 80, nays 37, as follows:

YEAS—Joseph Allen, Lemuel J. Alston, Ezekiel Bacon, Burwell Bassett, William W. Bibb, Abijah Bigelow, Daniel Blaisdell, James Breckenridge, Robert Brown, William A. Burwell, William Butler, John Campbell, John C. Mr. MONTGOMERY, from the same committee, also reported a joint resolution, which is in the following words, to wit:

Taking into view the present state of the world, the peculiar situation of Spain, and of her American Provinces; the acknowledged claim of the United States on that country, for indemnifications of great magnitude, and the intimate relation of the territory eastward of the river Perdido, adjoining the said States, to their security, and tranquillity; Therefore,

Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the United States cannot see, with indifference, any part of the Spanish Provinces adjoining the said States eastward of the river Perdido, pass from the hands of Spain into those of any other foreign Power.

Which was received and read the first time; and, on motion, the said resolution was read the second time.

A motion was made by Mr. STANLEY, that it be referred to the Committee of the whole House to whom was referred, this day, the bill authorizing the President of the United States to occupy the territory therein mentioned, and for other purposes; and the question being taken thereon, it was determined in the negative.

A motion was then made by Mr. W. ALSTON, that it be referred to a Committee of the Whole, to-day; and the question being taken thereon, it was resolved in the affirmative.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the whole House on the said resolution; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose reported progress and had leave to sit again.

MONDAY, January 7.

The House being cleared of all persons except the members and the Clerk, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the joint resolution reported by the select committee appointed on the confidential Message of the President of the United States of the third instant; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported an amendment thereto; which was read: and on the question that the House do now concur in the report of the Committee of the whole House, a motion was made by Mr. QUINCY, that the said report and resolution do lie on the table; and the question being taken thereon, it was determined in the negative.

A motion was then made by Mr. STANFORD, to amend the resolution by striking out the preamble thereto, which is, as amended by the Committee of the whole House, in the following words, to wit: "Taking into view the present state of the world, the peculiar situation of Spain and of her American Provinces, and the intimate relation of the territory eastward of the river Perdido, adjoining the said States, to their security and tranquillity."

And debate arising thereon, an adjournment was called for, and carried.

TUESDAY, January 8.

The House resumed the consideration of the unfinished business of yesterday, which was depending and undetermined at the time of adjournment. The question being again stated from the Chair on striking out the preamble to the resolution reported by the Committee of the whole House, a division of the same was called for; and the question being taken on striking out, it was determined in the negative—yeas 41, nays 65, as follows:

YEAS—Joseph Allen, Abijah Bigelow, Daniel Blaisdell, James Breckenridge, John C. Chamberlain, William Chamberlin, Martin Chittenden, James Emott, Jonathan Fisk, Daniel Heister, Jonathan H. Troup, Charles Turner, jr., Robert Whitehill, Richard Winn, and Robert Witherspoon.

The question then recurred on concurring in the amendment reported by the Committee of the whole House, proposing to strike out of the preamble the following: "the acknowledged claim of the United States on that country for indemnifications of great magnitude." And the question being taken thereon, it was resolved in the affirmative—yeas 89, nays 21, as follows:

YEAS—Joseph Allen, William Anderson, Ezekiel Bacon, William T. Barry, Burwell Bassett, William W. Bibb, Abijah Bigelow, Daniel Blaisdell, James Breckenridge, William A. Pending the question, "Shall the resolution be engrossed for a third reading?" a motion was made by Mr. QUINCY, to amend the resolution, by striking out the words "with indifference," for the purpose of inserting the words "without serious inquietude;" and the question being taken thereon, it was determined in the negative.

A motion was made by Mr. BACON, to amend the preamble to the said resolution, by striking out the word "said," for the purpose of inserting the word "United;" and the question being taken thereon, it was resolved in the affirmative.

A motion was made by Mr. WRIGHT, to amend the resolution, by adding the following to the end thereof:

Resolved, That the President be requested to make such arrangements for the temporary possession of any part of Florida east of the Perdido, with the Spanish authorities, that he may think necessary for that purpose.

And the question being taken thereon, it was determined in the negative.

A motion was then made by Mr. STANFORD, to amend the resolution, by adding the following words to the end thereof: "And that the President of the United States, in pursuance of arrangements which may be desired by the Spanish authorities, be authorized to take temporary possession of any part or parts of the said Territory."

A question of order being made, whether the motion of the gentleman from North Carolina, Mr. STANFORD, was in order, as it apparently contained the principles embraced by the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Maryland, Mr. WRIGHT, the Speaker decided that it was not in order.

A motion was then made by Mr. MACON, that the said resolution do lie on the table; and the question being taken thereon, it was determined in the negative.

The question then recurred on the engrossing the resolution for a third reading; and the same being taken, it was resolved in the affirmative—yeas 74, nays 47, as follows:

A motion was made by Mr. MONTGOMERY, that a committee be appointed to carry the said resolution to the Senate; and the question being taken thereon, it was resolved in the affirmative.

Mr. MONTGOMERY and Mr. CUTTS were appointed a committee, in pursuance of the said resolution.

THURSDAY, January 10.

The House being cleared of all persons except the members and the Clerk, a confidential message was received from the Senate, by their committee, as follows:

Mr. Speaker: The Senate have passed a bill entitled "An act to enable the President of the United States, under certain contingencies, to take possession of the country lying east of the river Perdido, and south of the State of Georgia and the Mississippi Territory, and for other purposes;" in which bill they desire the concurrence of this House.

The House then proceeded to the consideration of the bill from the Senate; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole this day.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the said bill; and, after some time spent therein, Mr. SPEAKER resumed the Chair, and Mr. BASSETT reported that the Committee of the Whole have had under consideration a bill from the Senate to enable the President of the United States, under certain contingencies, to take possession of the country lying east of the river Perdido, and south of the State of Georgia and the Mississippi Territory, and for other purposes, and have agreed to the same, without amendment.

The House proceeded to the consideration of the report of the Committee of the Whole; and debate arising, an adjournment was called for, and carried.

FRIDAY, January 11.

The House resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee of the Whole, made yesterday; and on the question that the House do now concur in the report of the Committee of the Whole—

A motion was made by Mr. TROUP to amend the bill by striking out all the first section thereof, after the enacting clause, for the purpose of inserting the following:

"That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to take possession and occupy all or any part of the territory lying east of the river Perdido, and south of the State of Georgia and the Mississippi Territory, in case arrangement has been or shall be made with the local authority of the said Territory, at the desire of the said authority, for delivering up the possession of the same, or any part thereof, to the United States."

A division of the question was called for by Mr. RHEA; and the question being taken on striking out, it was determined in the negative—yeas 54, nays 66, as follows:

Consequently, the said motion was rejected.

A motion was made by Mr. BACON, to amend the bill by striking out the third section thereof, for the purpose of inserting the following:

"And be it further enacted, That after the possession authorized by this act shall have been taken by the President of the United States, the inhabitants thereof shall continue under the jurisdiction of the local government heretofore established, or which may hereafter be adopted therein, and the civil and military authorities there acting, shall be confirmed and continued in the exercise of their respective functions, so far as may be necessary to protect the people thereof in the enjoyment of their liberty, property, and religion, until other provisions shall be made by Congress therefor."

A division of the question was called for by Mr. MONTGOMERY; and the question being taken on striking out, it was determined in the negative—yeas 59, nays 66, as follows:

Consequently, the said motion was lost.

A motion was made by Mr. TROUP to amend the bill, by striking out after the word "States," in the seventh line of the first section, the following words: "Or in the event of an attempt to occupy the said territory, or any part thereof, by any foreign Government; and he may, for the purpose of taking possession and occupying the territory aforesaid, and in order to maintain therein the authority of the United States, employ any part of the Army and Navy of the United States, which he may deem necessary;" for the purpose of inserting the following:

"Or in the event of an attempted occupation of the said territory by any foreign Power other than Spain, the President of the United States may, for the purpose, and sole purpose, of repelling such occupation, employ any part of the Army and Navy of the United States, which he may deem necessary, causing no molestation or injury of any kind to the inhabitants of the said territory, save what may be absolutely necessary to the repulsion of such occupation."

And the question being taken thereon, it was determined in the negative—yeas 54, nays 68, as follows:

A motion was made by Mr. MILNOR to amend the bill by striking out the following words in the seventh line thereof, to wit: "Or, in the event of an attempt to occupy the said territory, or any part thereof, by any foreign Government."

And, debate arising thereon, an adjournment was called for, and carried.

SATURDAY, January 12.

A motion was made by Mr. SHEFFEY that the House do come to the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the further proceedings on the bill from the Senate, entitled 'An act to enable the President of the United States, under certain contingencies, to take possession of the territory east of the river Perdido, and south of the State of Georgia and the Mississippi Territory, and for other purposes,' be had with open doors, and that the injunction of secrecy be taken off in relation thereto."

On which a question was made, whether the said motion was in order; during a debate on the question of order, twelve o'clock arrived, when the order of the day on the unfinished business was called for; and the Speaker decided that, as twelve o'clock had arrived, and the order of the day had been called for, the call for the order of the day had the preference, and superseded the motion of the member from Virginia, (Mr. SHEFFEY;) from which decision an appeal was taken; and, on the question, "Is the decision of the Chair correct?" it was resolved in the affirmative—yeas 58, nays 51, as follows:

A motion was made by Mr. MONTGOMERY that a committee be appointed to wait on the Senate, and inform them that the House of Representatives have passed the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act to enable the President of the United States, under certain contingencies, to take possession of the country lying east of the river Perdido, and south of the State of Georgia and the Mississippi Territory, and for other purposes;" and, also, have concurred in the amendment of the Senate made to the confidential resolution of the eighth instant; and a committee was appointed, consisting of Mr. MONTGOMERY and Mr. MILLER.

MONDAY, January 14.

The House being cleared of all persons, except the members and the Clerk, Mr. GARLAND, from the Joint Committee for Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined an enrolled bill, entitled "An act to enable the President of the United States, under certain contingencies, to take possession of the country lying east of the river Perdido, and south of the State of Georgia and the Mississippi Territory, and for other purposes;" and that they had also examined an enrolled resolve which passed both Houses of Congress on the twelfth instant; and had found the same to be truly enrolled: Whereupon, Mr. Speaker signed the said enrolled bill and resolve.

Ordered, That Mr. MONTGOMERY and Mr. MILLER be appointed a committee to acquaint the Senate therewith.

THURSDAY, January 17.

The House being cleared of all persons, except the members and Clerk, Mr. ANDERSON, from the Joint Committee for Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee did, on the fifteenth instant, present to the President of the United States, for his approbation, an enrolled bill, entitled "An act to enable the President of the United States, under certain contingencies, to take possession of the country lying east of the river Perdido, and south of the State of Georgia and the Mississippi Territory, and for other purposes;" and an enrolled resolve passed on the twelfth instant.

A Message was received from the President of the United States, notifying that the President did, this day, approve and sign the abovementioned enrolled resolve.

FRIDAY, January 17.

The House being cleared of all persons but the members and the Clerk, the following resolution was submitted by Mr. SHEFFEY, for consideration:

"Resolved, That the injunction of secrecy imposed on the proceedings which have been transacted with closed doors, during the present session, be removed, and that the secret journal of such proceedings be published."

And on the question, Will the House now consider the said resolution? it was determined in the negative—yeas 45, nays 73, as follows:

On motion of Mr. MONTGOMERY,

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inform the Senate that the President of the United States did, yesterday, approve and sign an enrolled resolve, which originated in this House.

Ordered, That Mr. MONTGOMERY and Mr. GRAY be appointed the said committee.

SATURDAY, January 19.

The House being cleared of all persons, but the members and Clerk, Mr. MONTGOMERY, from the committee appointed, yesterday, to inform the Senate that the President of the United States did, on the seventeenth instant, approve and sign an enrolled resolve, which originated in this House, reported that the committee had performed that duty.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. OTIS, their Secretary:

Mr. Speaker: I am directed to inform this House that the President of the United States did, on the seventeenth instant, approve and sign an enrolled bill, entitled "An act to enable the President of the United States, under certain contingencies, to take possession of the country lying east of the Perdido, and south of the State of Georgia and the Mississippi Territory, and for other purposes."

SUNDAY, March 3.

The House being cleared of all persons, but the members and the Clerk, a message was received from the Senate, by Mr. TURNER, and Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, two members of that body, notifying the House that the Senate had this day passed a resolution in the form of a joint resolution of the two Houses of Congress, in the words following, to wit:

"Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, That the act passed during the present session of Congress, entitled 'An act to enable the President of the United States, under certain contingencies, to take possession of the country lying east of the river Perdido, and south of the State of Georgia and the Mississippi Territory, and for other purposes,' and the declaration accompanying the same, be not printed or published unless directed by the President of the United States, any law or usage to the contrary notwithstanding."

To which they desire the concurrence of this House.

The said resolution was read the first and second time.

A motion was made by Mr. QUINCY, that the said resolution be committed to a Committee of the whole House; and the question being taken thereon, it was determined in the negative.

A motion was made by Mr. BIBB, to amend the said resolution by striking out the first word, "resolved," and insert, in lieu thereof, the words "be it enacted;" and the question being taken thereon, it was resolved in the affirmative.

Another motion was made by Mr. BIBB, further to amend the said resolution, by inserting, after the word "that," in the third line, the words "this act and;" and the question being taken thereon, it was resolved in the affirmative.

A motion was made by Mr. JOHNSON, further to amend the said resolution, by inserting, after the word "published," in the tenth line, the following: "until the end of the next session of Congress;" and the question thereon being taken by yeas and nays, and a quorum, consisting of a majority of the whole House, not being present, the question was not determined.

The yeas and nays, as demanded by one-fifth of the members present, are as follows:

A motion was made by Mr. SHEFFEY that the House do come to the following resolution :

Resolved, That the Journal of the proceedings of this House on the resolution offered this day, to remove the injunction of secrecy in relation to the proceedings had with closed doors, during the present session, be published.

And on the question that the House do now proceed to the consideration of the said resolution, it was determined in the negative.

The doors were then opened ; and, after some time, closed again.

A confidential message was received from the Senate, by Mr. WORTHINGTON and Mr. BAYARD, two members of that body, notifying that the Senate had concurred in the amendments of the House of Representatives to their confidential resolution of this day.

Mr. GARLAND, from the Joint Committee for Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined an enrolled bill, entitled "An act concerning 'An act to enable the President of the United States, under certain contingencies, to take possession of the country lying east of the river Perdido, and south of the State of Georgia and the Mississippi Territory, and for other purposes;" and the declaration accompanying the same, and had found the same to be truly enrolled: Whereupon, Mr. SPEAKER signed the said bill and the declaration accompanying the same.

Ordered, That Mr. MONTGOMERY and Mr. GARLAND be appointed a committee to acquaint the Senate therewith.

A message was received from the Senate, by Mr. CUTTS and Mr. CAMPBELL, two members of that body, notifying the House that the President of the United States had approved and signed a confidential bill, passed this day, entitled "An act concerning 'An act to enable the President of the United States, under certain contingencies, to take possession of the country lying East of the river Perdido, and south of the State of Georgia and the Mississippi Territory, and for other purposes," and the declaration accompanying the same.

Ordered, That the doors be now opened.

COMPRISING THE MOST IMPORTANT DOCUMENTS ORIGINATING DURING THAT CONGRESS, AND THE PUBLIC ACTS PASSED BY IT.

GREAT BRITAIN.

[Communicated to Congress, December 5, 1810; and January 12, and February 19, 1811.]

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States :

I transmit to Congress copies of a letter from the Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States at London, to the Secretary of State; and of another from the same to the British Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs.

JAMES MADISON.

FEBRUARY 12, 1811.

To the House of Representatives of the United States :

I transmit to the House of Representatives a report of the Secretary of State, complying with their resolution of the 18th instant.

JAMES MADISON.

FEBRUARY 19, 1811.

[The following documents were communicated to Congress at the commencement of the third session of the eleventh Congress, and by Messages of the 12th January and 19th February, 1811.]

Extract—Mr. Smith to Mr. Pinkney.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
January 20, 1810.

In my letter to you of the 11th of November, 1809, you were authorized to assure the British Government that the United States sincerely retained the desire, which they have constantly professed, to facilitate a friendly accommodation of all the existing differences between the two countries; and that nothing would be more agreeable to them, than to find the successor of Mr. Jackson invested with all the authorities necessary for the accomplishing of so desirable an event; and, moreover, that if the attainment of this object, through your agency, should be considered more expeditious or otherwise preferable, it would be a course entirely satisfactory to the United States.

I am now charged, by the President, to transmit to you the enclosed letter, authorizing you to resume the negotiations with the British Government, under the full power that had been given severally and jointly to you and Mr. Monroe. And, in your discussions therein, you will be regulated by the instructions heretofore given to Mr. Monroe and yourself. It is, however, not intended that you should commence this negotiation until the requisite satisfaction shall have been made in the affair of the Chesapeake. And, in the adjustment of this case, you will be guided by the instructions which you have heretofore received from this Department in relation to it.

It is, moreover, desirable, that, preparatory to a treaty upon all the points of difference between the two countries, an arrangement should be made for the revocation of the Orders in Council. As it is uncertain what may be the ultimate measures of Congress, at the present session, it cannot be expected that the President can, at this time, state the precise condition to be annexed to a repeal of the Orders in Council. But, in general, you may assure the British Government of his cordial disposition to exercise any power with which he may be invested, to put an end to acts of Congress which would not be resorted to but for the Orders in Council, and, at the same time, of his determination to keep them in force against France, in case her decrees should not also be repealed.

[Enclosed in the foregoing letter.]

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
January 20, 1810.

SIR: The President, anxious to adjust the existing differences between the United States and Great Britain, and deeming it expedient to make another effort for that purpose, has given it in charge to me to instruct you to renew negotiations in London, under the commission dated the 12th of May, 1806, authorizing Mr. Monroe and yourself, severally as well as jointly "to treat with the British Government, relative to wrongs committed between the parties on the high seas or other waters, and for establishing the principles of navigation and commerce between them." I have the honor, &c. R. SMITH.

Relations with Great Britain.

Mr. Pinkney to Mr. Smith.

LONDON, February 19, 1810.

SIR: I received on the 12th instant, by Mr. Powell, whom I had sent some time before to France, a letter from Gen. Armstrong, of which a copy is enclosed; and, keeping in view the instructions, contained in your letter to me of the 11th of November last, I have written to Lord Wellesley to inquire whether any, and, if any, what blockades of France, instituted by Great Britain during the present war, before the 1st of January, 1807, are understood here to be in force. A copy of my letter to Lord Wellesley is enclosed.

It is not improbable that this official inquiry will produce a declaration, in answer to it, that none of those blockades are in force; and I should presume that such a declaration will be received in France as substantially satisfying the condition announced to me by General Armstrong.

I am not aware that this subject could have been brought before the British Government in any other form than that which I have chosen. It would not, I think, have been proper to have applied for a revocation of the blockades in question, (at least before it is ascertained that they are in existence,) or to have professed, in my letter to Lord Wellesley, to found, upon General Armstrong's communication, my inquiry as to their actual state. I have, however, supposed it to be indispensable (and have acted accordingly) that I should explain to Lord Wellesley in conversation the probability afforded, by Gen. Armstrong's letter, that a declaration by this Government, to the effect above-mentioned, would be followed by the recall of the Berlin decree.

I cannot, perhaps, expect to receive from Lord Wellesley an answer to my letter in time to send a copy by the John Adams, now in the Downs or at Portsmouth; but I will send it by an early opportunity, and will take care that General Armstrong shall be made acquainted with it without delay. I have the honor to be, &c.

WM. PINKNEY.

MARCH 23, 1810.

P. S. Since the writing of this letter Lord Wellesley has sent me the answer, (of the 2d instant,) of which a copy is now enclosed. It was not satisfactory, and I pointed out its deficiencies to Lord Wellesley in conversation, and proposed to him that I should write him another letter requesting explanations. He assented to this course, and I have written him the letter of the 7th instant, of which also a copy is enclosed. His reply has been promised very frequently, but has not yet been received. I have reason to expect that it will be sufficient, but I cannot think of detaining the corvette any longer. The British packet will furnish me with an opportunity of forwarding it to you, and I will send Mr. Lee with it to Paris, by the way of Morlaix.

I have the honor to be, &amp;c.

WM. PINKNEY.

Hon. R. SMITH, &amp;c.

[Enclosed in the preceding despatch.]

From General Armstrong to Mr. Pinkney.

PARIS, January 25, 1810.

SIR: A letter from Mr. Secretary Smith, of the 1st of December last, made it my duty to inquire of his Excellency the Duke of Cadore what were the conditions on which His Majesty the Emperor would annul his decree, commonly called the Berlin decree; and whether, if Great Britain revoked her blockades of a date anterior to that decree, His Majesty would consent to revoke the said decree? To these questions I have this day received the following answer, which I hasten to convey to you by a special messenger:

ANSWER.—“The only condition required for the revocation, by His Majesty the Emperor, of the decree of Berlin will be, a previous revocation by the British Government of her blockades of France, or part of France, (such as that from the Elbe to Brest, &c.,) of a date anterior to that of the aforesaid decree.”

I have the honor to be, &amp;c.

JOHN ARMSTRONG.

WM. PINKNEY, Esq., &amp;c.

Mr. Pinkney to Lord Wellesley.

GREAT CUMBERLAND PLACE,
February 15, 1810.

MY LORD: In pursuance of the intimation which I had the honor to give to your Lordship a few days ago, I beg to trouble your Lordship with an inquiry whether any, and, if any, what blockades of France, instituted by Great Britain, during the present war, before the 1st day of January, 1807, are understood by His Majesty's Government to be in force? I am not able at present to specify more than one of the blockades to which this inquiry applies, namely, that from the Elbe to Brest, declared in May, 1806, and afterward limited and modified; but I shall be much obliged to your Lordship for precise information as to the whole.

I have the honor to be, &amp;c.

WM. PINKNEY.

The Marquis WELLESLEY, &amp;c.

Lord Wellesley to Mr. Pinkney.

FOREIGN OFFICE, March 2, 1810.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your note of the 15th ultimo, wherein you request to be informed whether any, and, if any, what blockades of France, instituted by Great Britain, during the present war, before the 1st day of January, 1807, are understood by His Majesty's Government to be in force? I have now the honor to acquaint you that the coast, rivers, and ports, from the river Elbe to Brest, both inclusive, were notified to be under the restrictions of blockade, with certain modifications, on the 16th of May, 1806; and that these restrictions were afterwards comprehended in the Order of Council of the 7th of January, 1807; which order is still in force.

I have the honor to be, &amp;c.

WELLESLEY.

WM. PINKNEY, Esq., &amp;c.

Relations with Great Britain.

Mr. Pinkney to Lord Wellesley.

GREAT CUMBERLAND PLACE,
March 7, 1810.

MY LORD: I have had the honor to receive your Lordship's answer of the 2d instant, to my letter of the 15th of last month, concerning the blockades of France, instituted by Great Britain, during the present war, before the 1st day of January, 1807.

I infer, from that answer, that the blockade, notified by Great Britain in May, 1806, from the Elbe to Brest, is not itself in force, and that the restrictions which it established rest altogether, so far as such restrictions exist at this time, upon an order or Orders in Council issued since the 1st day of January, 1807.

I infer, also, either that no other blockade of France was instituted by Great Britain during the period above-mentioned, or that, if any other was instituted during that period, it is not now in force.

May I beg your Lordship to do me the honor to inform me whether these inferences are correct, and, if incorrect, in what respects they are so? I have the honor to be, &c.

WM. PINKNEY.

The MARQUIS OF WELLESLEY, &c.

Mr. Pinkney to Mr. Smith.

LONDON, February 23, 1810.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit, enclosed, a copy of a notification of the blockade of the "coast and ports of Spain, from Gijon to the French territory," received from Lord Wellesley two days ago. I have not yet given any answer to this communication. I have, &c.

WM. PINKNEY.

Hon. ROBERT SMITH, &c.

[Referred to in Mr. Pinkney's letter of February 23.]

Lord Wellesley to Mr. Pinkney.

FOREIGN OFFICE, February 20, 1810.

The undersigned, His Majesty's principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, has received His Majesty's commands to inform Mr. Pinkney, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary from the United States of America, that the King has judged it expedient to signify his commands to the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty to establish a strict blockade of the coasts and ports of Spain, from Gijon to the French territory, which will be maintained and enforced, according to the usages of war acknowledged and observed in similar cases.

Mr. Pinkney is, therefore, requested to apprise the American Consuls and merchants residing in England, that the whole of the Spanish coast above-mentioned is, and must be considered as, in a state of blockade; and that, from this time, all the measures, authorized by the law of nations and the respective treaties between His Majesty and the different neutral Powers, will be adopted and executed with respect to vessels attempting to violate the said blockade after this notice.

11th CON. 3d SESS.—37

The undersigned requests Mr. Pinkney to accept the assurances of his high consideration.

WELLESLEY.

WM. PINKNEY, Esq., &c.

Mr. Pinkney to Mr. Smith.

LONDON, March 21, 1810.

SIR: On the 27th of November, Mr. Brunnell delivered to me your letters of the 11th, 14th, and 23d of the preceding month, and on the Saturday following I had a conference with the Marquis of Wellesley, in the course of which I explained to him fully the grounds upon which I was instructed to request Mr. Jackson's immediate recall, and upon which the official intercourse between that Minister and the American Government had been suspended.

Lord Wellesley's reception of what I said to him was frank and friendly, and I left him with a persuasion that we should have no cause to be dissatisfied with the final course of his Government on the subject of our conference.

We agreed in opinion that this interview could only be introductory to a more formal proceeding on my part; and it was accordingly settled between us that I should present an official letter, to the effect of my verbal communication.

Having prepared such a letter, I carried it myself to Downing street a few days afterwards, and accompanied the delivery of it to Lord Wellesley, with some explanatory observations, with which it is not, I presume, necessary to trouble you. You will find a copy of this letter enclosed, and will be able to collect from it the substance of the greater part of the statements and remarks which I thought it my duty to make in the conversation above-mentioned.

Although I was aware that the answer to my letter would not be very hastily given, I certainly was not prepared to expect the delay which has actually occurred. The President will do me the justice to believe, that I have used every exertion, consistent with discretion and the nature of the occasion, to shorten that delay, which, though not ascribable, as I persuade myself, to any motive unfriendly or disrespectful to the United States, may, I am sensible, have been productive of some disadvantage. A copy of the answer, received on the day of its date, is enclosed.

Between the delivery of my letter and the receipt of the reply, I had frequent conversations with Lord Wellesley, some of which were at his own request, and related altogether to the subject of my letter. The rest were on other subjects; but Mr. Jackson's affair was incidentally mentioned in all. A particular account of what was said on these several occasions would scarcely be useful, and could not fail to be tedious. It will, perhaps, be sufficient to observe, that, although these conversations were less satisfactory to me than the first, there was always an apparent anxiety on the part of Lord Wellesley to do what was conciliatory; and that, in the share which I took in them, I was governed by an opinion that, although it might become my duty to avoid, with more than ordinary care, all appearance of my being a party to the ultimate proceeding of the British Government upon my official representation, it could not be otherwise than proper, in any turn which the affair could take, that I should avail myself of every opportunity of bringing to Lord Wellesley's mind such considerations as were calculated to produce a beneficial influence upon the form and character of that proceeding. In what light the President will view the course, after so much deliberation, this Government has adopted, it would not become me even to conjecture. If, either in manner or effect, it should not fulfil his expectations, I shall have to regret that the success of my humble endeavors to make it what it ought to be, has not been proportioned to my zeal and diligence.

Of my letter to Lord Wellesley of the 2d of January, I have very little to say. I trust it will be found faithful to my instructions; and that, while it maintains the honor of my Government, it does not neglect what is due to conciliation.

I am not sure that I ought to have quoted in it your letter to me of the 11th of November, of which the subject is undoubtedly given in the quotation from your subsequent letter of the 23d of the same month. But I saw no objection to a repetition of the just and amicable sentiment expressed in these quotations; and, as I had been induced, at my first interview with Lord Wellesley, to read to his Lordship each of the passages, I felt that I was in some sort bound to the introduction of both into my written communication.

My letter avoids all discussion, and all invitation to discussion, on the business of the Chesapeake, on the Orders in Council, and on other topics which circumstances have connected with both. It does not, however, entirely pass them by; but contains such references to them as, I supposed, were likely to be useful. I feel assured that, in this respect, I have acted in conformity with the President's intentions. Indeed, if I had acted otherwise, I should have complicated and embarrassed a question which I was ordered to simplify, and forced into combination the peculiar difficulties of several subjects, to counteract the wishes of my own Government upon each. I should have done so, too, without inducement; for I had no authority to make any demand or proposal in the cases of the Chesapeake and Orders in Council, or to act upon any proposal which Lord Wellesley might be inclined to make to me; and it was perfectly clear that these subjects were not susceptible of any very material written illustrations which they had not already received. I did not, however, imagine that I was to make no use of the reflections upon these which you had furnished in your letter of the 23d of November. I was, on the contrary, convinced that it would be proper to suggest them occasionally in conversation, with a view to dispose Lord Wellesley, and, through him, the British Government, to seek such fair and liberal adjustments with us as would once more make us friends. Accordingly, in my first conference,

I spoke of the affair of the Chesapeake and the Orders in Council, and concluded my explanations, which did not lose sight of your letter of the 23d of November, by expressing a wish that Lord Wellesley would allow me an early opportunity of a free communication with him on these heads. From the disposition evinced by Lord Wellesley, in the notice which he took of these suggestions and of that wish, I was inclined to hope that it might be in my power to announce to you, by the return of the corvette, that a new envoy would be charged, as the successor of Mr. Jackson, with instructions adapted to the purpose of honorable accommodation. My letter to his Lordship was written under the influence of this hope, and concludes, as you will perceive, with as strong an appeal to the disposition on which it rested, as could with propriety be made.

I recurrd, in subsequent conversations, as often as occasion presented itself, to the attack on the Chesapeake and to the Orders in Council. It soon appeared, however, that a new Envoy would not, in the first instance, be sent out to replace Mr. Jackson, and, consequently, that an arrangement of these subjects was not, in that mode, to be expected. A special mission would still less be resorted to; and it was not likely that approaches to negotiation would be made through a Chargé d'Affaires. It was still barely possible that, though I had no powers to negotiate and conclude, the British Government might not be disinclined to make advances through me, or that Lord Wellesley would suffer me so far to understand the views of his Government, as that I might enable you to judge upon what conditions and in what mode arrangement was practicable. This was possible, though not very probable; but it finally became certain that no definite proposal would, for the present at least, be made to us through any channel, and that Lord Wellesley would not commit himself upon the details to which I wished him to speak, but upon which, of course, I did not press him.

It only remains to refer you, for the actual sentiments of this Government, with regard to future negotiation, to the concluding paragraph of Lord Wellesley's letter to me; which is substantially the same with his recent verbal explanations; and to add that, in a short conversation since the receipt of his letter, he told me that, if I thought myself empowered to enter upon and adjust the case of the Chesapeake, he would proceed without delay to consider it with me.

I have not supposed that Lord Wellesley's letter requires any other than the common answer; and I have, accordingly, given the reply of which a copy is now transmitted. I have, &c.

WILLIAM PINKNEY.

Hon. ROBERT SMITH, &c.

[Referred to in Mr. Pinkney's despatch March 21, 1810.]

Mr. Pinkney to Lord Wellesley.

GREAT CUMBERLAND PLACE, Jan. 2, 1810.

MY LORD: In the course of the official correspondence which has lately taken place between the Secretary of State of the United States, and Mr. Jackson, His Majesty's Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary at Washington, it has unfortunately happened that Mr. Jackson has made it necessary that I should receive the commands of the President to request his recall, and that, in the mean time, the intercourse between that Minister and the American Government should be suspended.

I am quite sure, my Lord, that I shall best consult your Lordship's wishes; and the respect which I owe to His Majesty's Government, by executing my duty on this occasion with perfect simplicity and frankness. My instructions, too, point to that course as required by the honor of the two Governments, and as suited to the confidence which the President entertains in the disposition of His Majesty's Government to view in its true light the subject to which they relate. With such inducements to exclude from this communication everything which is not intimately connected with its purpose, and, on the other hand, to set forth, with candor and explicitness, the facts and considerations which really belong to the case, I should be unpardonable if I fatigued your Lordship with unnecessary details, or affected any reserve.

It is known to your Lordship that Mr. Jackson arrived in America, as the successor of Mr. Erskine, while the disappointment, produced by the disavowal of the arrangement of the 19th of April, was yet recent, and while some other causes of dissatisfaction, which had been made to associate themselves with that disappointment, were in operation; but your Lordship also knows that his reception by the American Government was marked by all that kindness and respect which were due to the representative of a Sovereign, with whom the United States were sincerely desirous of maintaining the most friendly relations.

Whatever were the hopes which Mr. Jackson's mission had inspired of satisfactory explanations and adjustments upon the prominent points of difference between the two countries, they certainly were not much encouraged by the conferences, in which, as far as he thought proper, he opened to Mr. Smith, soon after his arrival, the nature and extent of his powers and the views of his Government. After an experiment, deemed by the Government of the United States to be sufficient, it appeared that these conferences, necessarily liable to misconception and want of precision, were not likely to lead to any practical conclusion.

Accordingly, on 9th of October, Mr. Smith addressed a letter to Mr. Jackson, in which, after stating the course of proceeding which the American Government had supposed itself entitled to expect from him with regard to the rejected arrangement and the matters embraced by it, after recapitulating what Mr. Smith believed to have passed in their recent interviews relative to those subjects, he intimated that it was thought expedient that their further discussions, on that particular occasion, should be in writing.

It is evident, my Lord, from Mr. Jackson's reply of the 11th of the same month, that he received this intimation (which, carefully restricted as it was, he seems to have been willing to understand in a general sense) with considerable sensibility. He speaks of it in that reply as being without example in the annals of diplomacy; as a step against which it was fit to enter his protest; as a violation, in his person, of the most essential rights of a public Minister; as a new difficulty thrown in the way of a restoration of a thorough good understanding between the two countries.

I need not remark to your Lordship that nothing of all this could, with propriety, be said of a proceeding, in itself entirely regular and usual, required by the state of the discussions to which only it was to be applied, and proposed in a manner perfectly decorous and unexceptionable. The Government of the United States had expected from Mr. Jackson an explanation of the grounds of the refusal, on the part of his Government, to abide by Mr. Erskine's arrangement, accompanied by a substitution of other propositions. It had been collected from Mr. Jackson's conversations, that he had no power whatsoever to give any such explanation; or, in the business of the Orders in Council, to offer any substitute for the rejected agreement; or, in the affair of the Chesapeake, to offer any substitute that could be accepted; and it had been inferred, from the same conversations, that, even if the American Government should propose a substitute for that part of the disavowed adjustment which regarded the Orders in Council, the substitute could not be agreed to, (if, indeed, Mr. Jackson had power to do more than discuss it,) unless it should distinctly recognise conditions which had already been declared to be wholly inadmissible.

To what valuable end, my Lord, loose conversations, having in view either no definite result, or none that was attainable, could, under such circumstances and upon such topics, be continued, it would not be easy to discover; and I think I may venture to assume that the subsequent written correspondence has completely shown that they could not have been otherwise than fruitless, and that they were not too soon abandoned for that formal course to which, from the beginning, they could only be considered as preparatory.

After remonstrating against the wish of the American Government to give to the further discussions a written form, Mr. Jackson disposes himself to conform to it; and, speaking in the same letter of the disavowal of the arrangement of April, he declares that he was not provided with instructions to explain the motives of it; and he seems to intimate that explanation, through him, was unnecessary, not only because it had already been made through other channels, but because the Government of the United States had entered into the arrangement with a knowledge "that it could only lead to the consequences that actually followed." In the conclusion of the fourth paragraph of the letter, he informs Mr. Smith that the despatch of Mr. Canning to Mr. Erskine, "which Mr. Smith had made the basis of an official correspondence with the latter Minister, and which had been read to the American Minister in London," was the only despatch by which the conditions were prescribed to Mr. Erskine for the conclusion of an arrangement with the United States on the matter to which it related.

Mr. Smith's answer to this letter bears date the 19th of October; and I beg your Lordship's permission to introduce from it the following quotation: "The stress you have laid upon what you have been pleased to state as the substitution of the terms finally agreed on [in the arrangement of April on the Orders in Council] for the terms first proposed, [by Mr. Erskine,] has excited no small degree of surprise. Certain it is, that your predecessor did present for my consideration the same conditions which now appear in the present document; that he was disposed to urge them more than the nature of two of them (both palpably inadmissible, and one more than merely inadmissible) could permit; and that, on finding his first proposal unsuccessful, the more reasonable terms, comprised in the arrangement respecting the Orders in Council, were adopted. And what is there to countenance the conclusion you have drawn in favor of the right of His Britannic Majesty to disavow the proceeding? Is anything more common in public negotiations than to begin with a higher demand, and, that failing, to descend to a lower? To have, if not two sets of instructions, two or more than two grades of propositions in the same set of instructions; to begin with what is the most desirable, and to end with what is found to be admissible, in case the more desirable should not be attainable? This must be obvious to every understanding, and is confirmed by universal experience.

"What are the real and entire instructions given to your predecessor, is a question essentially between him and his Government. That he had, or, at least, that he believed he had, sufficient authority to conclude the arrangement, his formal assurances during our discussions were such as to leave no room for doubt. His subsequent letter, of the 15th of June, renewing his assurances to me, 'that the terms of the agreement so happily concluded by the recent negotiation will be strictly fulfilled on the part of His Majesty,' is an evident indication of what his persuasion then was as to his instructions. And, with a view to show what his impressions have been, even since the disavowal, I must take the liberty of referring you to the annexed extracts [see C] from his official letters of the 31st of July and of the 14th of August."

"The declaration, 'that the despatch from Mr. Canning to Mr. Erskine, of the 23d of January, is the only despatch by which the conditions were prescribed to Mr. Erskine for the conclusion of an arrangement on the matter to which it relates,' is now for the first time made to this Government. And I need hardly add, that, if that despatch had been communicated at the time of the arrangement, or if it had been made known that the propositions contained in it, and which were at first presented by Mr. Erskine, were the only ones on which he was authorized to make an arrangement, the arrangement would not have been made."

I suppose, my Lord, that it was impossible to disclaim for the American Government, in more precise and intelligible language than is found in this quotation, all knowledge of Mr. Erskine's instructions, incompatible with a sincere, honorable, and justifiable belief that he was, as he professed to be, fully authorized to make the agreement in which he undertook to pledge the faith of His Majesty's Government. Yet, in Mr. Jackson's next letter (of the 23d of October) to Mr. Smith, he says, "I have, therefore, no hesitation in informing you that His Majesty was pleased to disavow the agreement concluded between you and Mr. Erskine, because it was in violation of that gentleman's instructions, and altogether without authority to subscribe, to the terms of it. These instructions, I now understand from your letter, as well as from the obvious deduction which I took the liberty of making in mine of the 11th instant, were, at the time, in substance made known to you. No stronger illustration, therefore, can be given of the deviation from them which occurred, than by a reference to the terms of your agreement."

Your Lordship will allow me to take for granted, that this passage cannot be misunderstood. Its direct and evident tendency is to fasten upon the Government of the United States an imputation most injurious to its honor and veracity. The charge, that it had all along been substantially apprized, however it might affect to be ignorant, of the instructions which Mr. Erskine's arrangement were said to have violated, had before been insinuated; but it is here openly made, in reply; too, to a paper in which the contrary is formally declared by the official organ of the American Government.

This harsh accusation, enhanced by the tone of the letter in which it appeared, was in all respects as extraordinary as it was offensive. It took the shape of an inference from facts and asseverations, which necessarily led to the opposite conclusion. It was preferred as an answer to a claim of explanation, which Mr. Jackson professed not to be authorized by his Government to offer at all, but which he chose so to offer from himself as to convert explanation into insult. It was advanced, not only without proof and against proof, but against all color of probability. It could scarcely have been advanced, under any conviction, that it was necessary to the case which Mr. Jackson was to maintain; for His Majesty's Government had disavowed Mr. Erskine's arrangement, according to Mr. Jackson's own representations, without any reference to the knowledge which this accusation imputed to the Government of the United States; and it need not be stated, that no allusion whatsoever was made to it by Mr. Secretary Canning, in those informal communications to me which Mr. Jackson has mentioned. It was not, moreover, to have been expected that, in the apparent state of Mr. Jackson's powers, and in the actual posture of his negotiation, he would seek to irritate where he could not arrange, and sharpen disappointment by studied and unprovoked indignity.

The course which the Government of the United States adopted on this painful occasion was such as at once demonstrated a sincere respect for the public character with which Mr. Jackson was invested, and a due sense of its own dignity. Mr. Jackson's conduct had left a feeble hope that further intercourse with him, unproductive of good as it must be, might still be reconcilable with the honor of the American Government. A fair opportunity was accordingly presented to him of making it so, by Mr. Smith's letter of the 1st of November, of which I beg leave to insert the concluding paragraph:

"I abstain, sir, from making any particular animadversions on several irrelevant and improper allusions in your letter, not at all comporting with the professed disposition to adjust in an amicable manner the differences unhappily subsisting between the two countries. But it would be improper to conclude the few observations to which I purposely limit myself, without adverting to your repetition of a language implying a knowledge, on the part of this Government, that the instructions of your predecessor did not authorize the arrangement formed by him. After the explicit and peremptory asseveration that this Government had no such knowledge, and that, with such knowledge, no such arrangement would have been entered into, the view which you have again presented of the subject makes it my duty to apprise you that such insinuations are inadmissible in the intercourse of a foreign Minister with a Government that understands what it owes to itself."

Whatever was the sense in which Mr. Jackson had used the expressions to which the American Government took exception, he was now aware of the sense in which they were understood; and, consequently, was called upon, if he had been misapprehended, to say so. His expressions conveyed an injurious meaning, supported, moreover, by the context, and the notice taken of them had not exceeded the bounds of just admonition. To have explained away even an imaginary affront would have been no degradation; but when an occasion was thus offered, to qualify real and severe imputations upon the Government to which he was accredited, it could scarcely be otherwise than a duty to take immediate advantage of it.

Such, however, was not Mr. Jackson's opinion. He preferred answering the appeal, which had been made to him, by reiterating with aggravations the offensive insinuation. He says, in the last paragraph of his letter of the 4th of November, to Mr. Smith, "You will find that, in my correspondence with you, I have carefully avoided drawing conclusions that did not necessarily follow from the premises advanced by me; and least of all should I think of uttering an insinuation where I was unable to substantiate a fact. To facts, such as I have become acquainted with them, I have scrupulously adhered. In so doing, I must continue, whenever the good faith of His Majesty's Government is called in question, to vindicate his honor and dignity, in the manner that appears to me best calculated for that purpose."

To this, my Lord, there could be but one reply. Official intercourse with Mr. Jackson could no longer be productive of any effects that were not rather to be avoided than desired; and it was plainly impossible that it should continue. He was, therefore, informed by Mr. Smith, in a letter of the 8th of November, which recapitulated the inducements to this unavoidable step, that no further communications would be received from him; that the necessity of this determination would, without delay, be made known to his Government; and that, in the mean time, a ready attention would be given to any communications, affecting the interests of the two nations, through any other channel that might be substituted.

The President has been pleased to direct that I should make known this necessity to His Majesty's Government, and, at the same time, request that Mr. Jackson be recalled. And I am particularly instructed to do this in a manner that will leave no doubt of the undiminished desire of the United States to unite in all the means the best calculated to establish the relations of the two countries on the solid foundations of justice, of friendship, and of mutual interest. I am further particularly instructed, my Lord, to make His Majesty's Government sensible, that, in requiring the recall of Mr. Jackson, the United States wish not to be understood as in any degree obstructing communications, which may lead to a friendly accommodation; but that, on the contrary, they sincerely retain the desire, which they have constantly professed, to facilitate so happy an event, and that nothing will be more agreeable to them than to find the Minister who has rendered himself so justly obnoxious, replaced by another, who, with a different character, may carry with him all the authorities and instructions requisite for the complete success of his mission; or, if the attainment of this object, through my agency, should be considered more expeditious or otherwise preferable, that it will be a course entirely satisfactory to the United States.

These instructions, which I lay before your Lordship without disguise, require no comment.

Before I conclude this letter, it may be proper very shortly to advert to two communications, received by Mr. Secretary Smith from Mr. Oakley, after the correspondence with Mr. Jackson had ceased.

The first of these communications (of which I am not able to ascertain the date) requested a document, having the effect of a special passport or safeguard, for Mr. Jackson and his family, during their further stay in the United States. This application was regarded as somewhat singular; but the document, of which the necessity was not perceived, was nevertheless furnished. The reasons assigned for the application excited some surprise. I have troubled your Lordship, in conversation, with a few remarks from my instructions, upon one of those reasons, which I will take the liberty to repeat. The paper in question states that Mr. Jackson "had already been once most grossly insulted by the inhabitants of Hampton, in the unprovoked language of abuse held by them to several officers bearing the King's uniform, when those officers were themselves assaulted and put in imminent danger."

I am given to understand, my Lord, that the insult here alluded to was for the first time brought under the notice of the American Government by this paper; that it had, indeed been among the rumors of the day, that some unbecoming scene had taken place at Hampton or Norfolk, between some officers belonging to the Africaine frigate and some of the inhabitants, and that it took its rise in the indiscretion of the former; that, no attention to the circumstance having been called for, and no inquiry having been made, the truth of the case is unknown; but that it never was supposed that Mr. Jackson himself, who was on board the frigate, had been personally insulted, nor is it yet understood in what way he supposes that he was so. I am authorized to add, that any complaint or representation on the subject would instantly have received every proper attention.

The other communication—of which the substance was soon afterwards published to the American people in the form of a circular letter from Mr. Jackson to the British Consuls in the United States—seems to have been intended as a justification of his conduct, in that part of his correspondence which had given umbrage to the American Government. This paper (bearing date the 13th November) is not very explicit; but it would appear to be calculated to give rather a new form to the statements, which Mr. Jackson had suffered the Government of the United States to view in another light, until it had no choice but to act upon the obvious and natural interpretation of them sanctioned by himself.

It was never objected to Mr. Jackson, (as this paper seems to suggest,) that he had stated that the three propositions in Mr. Erskine's original instructions were submitted to Mr. Smith by that gentleman; or that he had stated it as made known to him by Mr. Canning, that the instruction to Mr. Erskine, containing those three conditions, was the only one from which his authority was derived, for the conclusion of an arrangement on the matter to which it related.

The objection was, that he had ascribed to the American Government a knowledge that the propositions submitted to its consideration by Mr. Erskine were indispensable conditions, and that he did so even after that knowledge had been distinctly disclaimed, and he had been made to perceive that a repetition of the allegation could not be suffered.

I willingly leave your Lordship to judge whether Mr. Jackson's correspondence will bear any other construction than it in fact received; and whether, supposing it to have been erroneously construed, his letter of the 4th November should not have corrected the mistake, instead of confirming and establishing it.

As an explanation, this paper was even worse than nothing. It had not the appearance of an attempt to rectify misapprehension. It sought to put the American Government in the wrong, by assuming that what had given so much umbrage ought not to have given any. It imported reproach rather than explanation. It kept out of sight the real offence, and, introducing a new and insufficient one in its place, seemed to disclose no other wish than to withdraw from the Government of the United States the ground upon which it had proceeded. Its apparent purpose, in a word, was to fix a charge of injustice upon the past—not to produce a beneficial effect upon the future. In this view, and in this only, it was perfectly consistent that it should announce Mr. Jackson's determination to retire to New York.

The time when this paper was presented will not have escaped your Lordship's observation. It followed the demand, already mentioned, of a safeguard for "Mr. Jackson, his family, and the gentlemen attached to his mission"—a demand which cannot be regarded—especially if we look to the inducements to which it was referred, as either conciliatory or respectful. It followed, too, the letter of the 4th November, which, had explanation been intended, ought undoubtedly to have contained it; but which, in lieu of it, contained fresh matter of provocation. It was itself followed by the publication of its own substance in another garb. On the very day of its date, when Mr. Jackson, if he meant it as an explanation, could not be justified in concluding that it would not be satisfactory, it was moulded by him into the circular address to which I have before alluded; and immediate steps appear to have been taken to give to it, in that shape, the utmost publicity. I have no wish, my Lord, to make any strong remarks upon that proceeding. It will be admitted that it was a great irregularity; and that, if Mr. Jackson had been particularly anxious to close every avenue to reconciliation between the American Government and himself, he could not have fallen upon a better expedient.

I have now only to add, my Lord, the expression of my own most ardent wish, that out of the incident which has produced this letter, an occasion may be made to arise, which, improved as it ought to be, and I trust will be, by our respective Governments, may conduct them to a cordial and lasting friendship. Thus to endeavor to bring good out of evil, would be worthy of the rulers of two nations that are only in their natural position when they are engaged in offices of mutual kindness, and largely contributing to the prosperity and happiness of each other.

I have the honor to be, with the highest consideration, my Lord, your Lordship's most obedient, humble servant,

WILLIAM PINKNEY.

The MARQUIS OF WELLESLEY.

Lord Wellesley to Mr. Pinkney.

FOREIGN OFFICE, March 14, 1810.

SIR: The letter which I had the honor to receive from you, under date of the 2d of January, together with the additional paragraph received on the 24th of January, has been laid before the King.

The several conferences which I have held with you respecting the transactions to which your letter refers, have, I trust, satisfied you that it is the sincere desire of His Majesty's Government, on the present occasion, to avoid any discussion which might obstruct the renewal of amicable intercourse between the two countries.

The correspondence between Mr. Jackson and Mr. Smith has been submitted to His Majesty's consideration.

His Majesty has commanded me to express his concern that the official communication between His Majesty's Minister in America and the Government of the United States should have been interrupted before it was possible for his Majesty, by any interposition of his authority, to manifest his invariable disposition to maintain the relations of amity with the United States.

I am commanded by His Majesty to inform you, that I have received from Mr. Jackson the most positive assurances that it was not his purpose to give offence to the Government of the United States by any expression contained in his letters, or by any part of his conduct.

The expressions and conduct of His Majesty's Minister in America having, however, appeared to the Government of the United States to be exceptionable, the usual course in such cases would have been to convey, in the first instance, to His Majesty, a formal complaint against his Minister, and to desire such redress as might be deemed suitable to the nature of the alleged offence.

This course of proceeding would have enabled His Majesty to have made such arrangements, or to have offered such seasonable explanations, as might have precluded the inconvenience which must always arise from the suspension of official communication between friendly Powers.

His Majesty, however, is always disposed to pay the utmost attention to the wishes and sentiments of States in amity with him; and he has, therefore, been pleased to direct the return of Mr. Jackson to England.

But His Majesty has not marked with any expression of his displeasure the conduct of Mr. Jackson, whose integrity, zeal, and ability, have long been distinguished in His Majesty's service, and who does not appear, on the present occasion, to have committed any intentional offence against the Government of the United States.

I am commanded to inform you that Mr. Jackson is ordered to deliver over the charge of His Majesty's affairs in America to a person properly qualified to carry on the ordinary intercourse between the two Governments, which His Majesty is sincerely desirous of cultivating on the most friendly terms.

As an additional testimony of this disposition, I am authorized to assure you that His Majesty is ready to receive, with sentiments of undiminished amity and good will, any communication which the Government of the United States may deem beneficial to the mutual interests of both countries, through any channel of negotiation which may appear advantageous to that Government.

I request you will accept the assurances of the high consideration with which I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient and humble servant,
WELLESLEY.

Mr. Pinkney to Lord Wellesley.

GREAT CUMBERLAND PLACE,

March 17, 1810.

MY LORD: I have had the honor to receive your Lordship's letter of the 14th instant, in reply to mine of the 2d January, and will lose no time in transmitting it to my Government.

I have the honor to be, &c.

WILLIAM PINKNEY.

LORD WELLESLEY, &c.

Extract—Mr. Pinkney to Mr. Smith.

LONDON, March 27, 1810.

I have the honor to enclose a copy of Lord Wellesley's reply to my letter of the 7th instant, respecting the British blockades of France before the Berlin decree.

I do not think it of such a nature as to justify an expectation that General Armstrong will be able to make any use of it at Paris, but I shall nevertheless convey to him the substance of it without delay.

[Referred to in Mr. Pinkney's letter of March 27.]

Lord Wellesley to Mr. Pinkney.

FOREIGN OFFICE, March 26, 1810.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 7th instant, requesting a further explanation of my letter of the 2d, concerning the blockades of France instituted by Great Britain during the present war, before the 1st day of January, 1807.

The blockade notified by Great Britain in May, 1806, has never been formally withdrawn. It cannot, therefore, be accurately stated that the restrictions which it established rest altogether on the Order of Council of the 7th January, 1807; they are comprehended under the more extensive restrictions of that order. No other blockade of the ports of France was instituted by Great Britain between the 16th May, 1806, and the 7th of January, 1807, excepting the blockade of Venice, instituted on the 27th July, 1806, which is still in force.

I beg you to accept the assurances of high consideration with which I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient, humble servant,

WELLESLEY.

Mr. Pinkney to General Armstrong.

LONDON, April 6, 1810.

DEAR SIR: I do not know whether the statement contained in my letter of the 27th of last month will enable you to obtain the recall of the Berlin decree. Certainly, the inference from that statement is, that the blockade of 1806 is virtue ally at an end, being merged and comprehended in an Order in Council issued after the date of the edict of Berlin. I am, however, about to try to obtain a formal revocation of that blockade, and of that of Venice, or at least a precise declaration that they are not in force. As it will not be possible to obtain either the one or the other very soon, if indeed they can be obtained at all, I will not detain Mr. Lee, but will send you another messenger (Mr. Craig, of Philadelphia) in the course of three or four weeks, with the result of my endeavors. In the meantime, such use can be made of my communication of the 27th ultimo as you may deem advisable. I have the honor to be, &c.

Relations with Great Britain.

WILLIAM PINKNEY.

Mr. Pinkney to Mr. Smith.

LONDON, April 8, 1810.

SIR: In a short letter of the 2d instant, by Mr. John Wallace, in the British packet, I had the honor to acknowledge the receipt, on the 31st of last month, by Dr. Logan, of your letters of the 20th January and the 16th February, and to inform you that I had, in consequence, an appointment to meet Lord Wellesley on the 3d.

At the interview which took place in pursuance of that appointment, I explained to Lord Wellesley the nature of the powers now confided to me, and, as far as was necessary, the subjects to which they related. The result of the conversation which ensued was an understanding that we should begin with an attempt to settle the affair of the Chesapeake; and, that attempt being successful, that we should proceed to consider next the subject of the Orders in Council; and lastly, the commercial and other concerns embraced by the commission of 1806, to Mr. Monroe and myself.

In conformity with this understanding, it was agreed that I should immediately follow up the conference with a note, stating my authority to adjust with the British Government the case of the Chesapeake; and I have accordingly prepared and sent to Lord Wellesley the letter of which a copy is enclosed. I have not since heard from his Lordship, to whom, of course, it now belongs to make proposals.

It will not, I trust, be thought that my letter, which is simply an official notification, in civil terms, of my power to receive and act upon such overtures as this Government may choose to make, goes too far. I have the honor to be &c.

WILLIAM PINKNEY.

P. S.—April 9. I have just received from Lord Wellesley a note, of which a copy is enclosed, inviting me to a conference on Thursday next. (the 12th), doubtless on the affair of the Chesapeake.

I have the honor to be, &c.

W. P.

Mr. Pinkney to Lord Wellesley.

CUMBERLAND PLACE, (without date.)

MY LORD: I have the honor to state to your Lordship, in conformity with my verbal explanations in a recent conference, that I am authorized to adjust with His Majesty's Government the case of the attack on the American frigate Chesapeake, in the month of June, 1807, by the British ship the Leopard.

It will give me sincere pleasure to communicate with your Lordship on this interesting subject, in such manner as shall be thought best calculated to lead to a fair and honorable arrangement of it, preparatory to the restoration of kindness and beneficial intercourse between the two countries. I have the honor to be, &c.

WILLIAM PINKNEY.

Lord Wellesley to Mr. Pinkney.

FOREIGN OFFICE, April 9, 1810.

The Marquis Wellesley presents his compliments to Mr. Pinkney, and will be happy to have the honor of seeing him at the Foreign Office on Thursday next, at 2 p. m., if that hour should suit his convenience.

Mr. Pinkney to Mr. Smith.

LONDON, April 9, 1810.

SIR: I have, upon full reflection, thought it necessary to prepare a letter to Lord Wellesley, reciting the French Minister's official statement to General Armstrong of the conditions on which the Berlin decree would be recalled, and inquiring whether there exists any objection on the part of the British Government to a revocation (or to a precise declaration that they are no longer in force) of the blockade of May, 1806, and of that of Venice, especially the former. As the answer to this letter (upon which I wish to converse with Lord Wellesley before I deliver it) will not probably be very prompt, I have, in the mean time, sent Mr. Lee to Paris, with two letters to General Armstrong, of which copies are enclosed. I have the honor to be, &c.

WILLIAM PINKNEY.

Mr. Pinkney to General Armstrong.

LONDON, April 6, 1810.

DEAR SIR: I do not know whether the statement contained in my letter of the 27th of last month will enable you to obtain the recall of the Berlin decree. Certainly the inference from that statement is, that the blockade of 1806 is virtually at an end, being merged and comprehended in an Order in Council, issued after the date of the edict of Berlin. I am, however, about to try to obtain a formal revocation of that blockade, and of that of Venice, or at least a precise declaration that they are not in force. As it will not be possible to obtain either the one or the other very soon (if, indeed, they can be obtained at all) I will not detain Mr. Lee, but will send you another messenger (Mr. Craig, of Philadelphia) in the course of three or four weeks, with the result of my endeavors.

In the meantime such use can be made of my communication of the 27th ultimo as you may deem advisable. I have the honor to be, &c.

WILLIAM PINKNEY.

Relations with Great Britain.

Mr. Pinkney to Mr. Smith.

LONDON, May 2, 1810.

SIR: I had the honor to inform you, in my letter of the 9th of last month, that I had, upon full reflection, thought it necessary to prepare a letter to Lord Wellesley, reciting the French Minister's official statement to General Armstrong of the conditions on which the Berlin decree would be recalled, and inquiring whether there exists any objection on the part of the British Government to a revocation, or to a precise declaration that they are no longer in force, of the blockade of May, 1806, and that of Venice, especially the former.

I have now the honor to transmit a copy of the letter which, in pursuance of that determination, I have just sent to Lord Wellesley. I am not able to say what will be the nature of the answer to it; but if it should be satisfactory, I will lose no time in communicating it to General Armstrong. I have the honor to be, &c.

WILLIAM PINKNEY.

[Referred to in Mr. Pinkney's letter of May 2, 1810.]

Mr. Pinkney to Lord Wellesley.

GREAT CUMBERLAND PLACE,
April 30, 1810.

MY LORD: The French Minister for Foreign Affairs has stated, in an official note to General Armstrong, the Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States at Paris, that "the only condition required for the revocation by the French Government of the decree of Berlin, will be the previous revocation by the British Government of her blockades of France, or part of France (such as that from the Elbe to Brest, &c.) of a date anterior to the date of the aforesaid decree."

I had supposed that the blockades of France, instituted by Great Britain before the date of the Berlin decree, were already withdrawn, virtually, though not formally, by reason of the restrictions which they established having been provided for and comprehended in certain Orders in Council issued after the date of that decree; and your Lordship's letter to me of the 26th of last month certainly seems to confirm that supposition with regard to the blockade of May, 1806, although it proves it to be erroneous with regard to the only other blockade which falls within the description of the French Minister's communication, namely, the blockade of Venice established in July of the same year.

As I am anxious to neglect nothing which may have a tendency to produce the repeal of the Berlin decree, and of such other decrees and orders as the Government of the United States has from time to time complained of, I beg to inquire of your Lordship, with a view to the terms of the above-mentioned note to General Armstrong, whether there exists any objection on the part of His Majesty's Government to a revocation, or to a declaration that they are no longer in force, of the blockades in question, especially that of May, 1806. I have the honor to be, &c.

WILLIAM PINKNEY.

Marquis WELLESLEY, &amp;c.

Mr. Pinkney to Mr. Smith.

LONDON, May 3, 1810.

SIR: I enclose a copy of a letter which I am about to send to Lord Wellesley, concerning the forgery in England of American ships' papers, for the purpose of giving to English vessels the character of American bottoms.

In conformity with your letter of the 3d of November last, which came to hand on the 10th of January, I mentioned the subject to Lord Wellesley as soon as I thought it expedient to do so. He gave no opinion upon it; but when I observed that it would perhaps be better to lay the matter before him at once in writing, he expressed his approbation of that course. As there is nothing in the subject itself, or in your letter, to forbid it, I shall send him my paper to-day or to-morrow. I have the honor to be, &c.

WILLIAM PINKNEY.

[Enclosed in Mr. Pinkney's letter of May 3, 1810.]

Mr. Pinkney to Lord Wellesley.

GREAT CUMBERLAND PLACE,
May 3, 1810.

MY LORD: I have the honor to call your Lordship's attention, in pursuance of the instructions of my Government, to a practice which has, for some time past, prevailed in this country, of forging American ships' papers for the purpose of giving to English vessels the character of American bottoms.

It appears, from various sources of information, that these fabrications are carried to a great extent, particularly in London, and that the fraudulent papers are purchased as a regular article of traffic, and used in numerous instances, so as to bring into suspicion the genuine documents on which the safety of American commerce depends, and to subject that commerce to serious vexation and loss.

I am confident, my Lord, that it is only necessary to suggest to His Majesty's Government the existence of these abuses, so injurious to the United States, and so pernicious in their general tendency, to induce it to cause immediate inquiry to be made, with a view to an efficacious remedy. I have, therefore, only to add, that I am in possession of some papers which throw considerable light on the subject, and which (with such other information as I have obtained or may obtain) I shall be happy to communicate to your Lordship whenever your Lordship thinks proper.

I have the honor to be, &amp;c.

WILLIAM PINKNEY.

Mr. Pinkney to Mr. Smith.

LONDON, May 18, 1810.

SIR: I have the honor to enclose a copy of a communication, made to me on the 14th instant, by Lord Wellesley, concerning a partial relaxation of the blockade, notified some time ago, of the coast and ports of Spain, between Gijon and the French territory. I have the honor to be, &c.

WILLIAM PINKNEY.

Relations with Great Britain.

[Referred to in Mr. Pinkney's letter of May 18.]

Lord Wellesley to Mr. Pinkney.

FOREIGN OFFICE, May 14, 1810.

The undersigned, His Majesty's principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, has received His Majesty's commands to inform Mr. Pinkney, that the King has judged it expedient to signify his orders to the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty to give the necessary directions to the officers employed in the blockade of the coast and ports of Spain, from Gijon to the French territory, that they permit, notwithstanding the said blockade, Spanish or neutral vessels laden with cargoes, the produce of Spain only, to sail from any port included in the limits of said blockade, subject, nevertheless, (as to the ports to which they trade,) to the restrictions of His Majesty's Orders in Council of the 26th of April, 1809, and of the 7th of January, 1807.

The undersigned requests Mr. Pinkney to accept assurances of his high consideration.

WELLESLEY.

Mr. Smith, Secretary of State, to Mr. Pinkney.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, May 22, 1810.

SIR: Your despatch of the 27th of March, by the British packet, was received on the 17th of this month.

The President has read with surprise and regret the answer of Lord Wellesley to your letter of the 2d January, and also his reply to your note requiring explanations with respect to the blockade of France. The one indicates an apparent indifference as to the character of the diplomatic intercourse between the two countries, and the other evinces an inflexible determination to persevere in their system of blockade.

The provision made for the diplomatic agency which is to succeed that of Mr. Jackson, manifests a dissatisfaction at the step necessarily taken here with regard to that Minister, and at the same time a diminution of the respect heretofore attached to the diplomatic relations between the two countries. However persevering the President may be in the conciliatory disposition which has constantly governed him, he cannot be inattentive to such an apparent departure from it on the other side, nor to the duty imposed on him by the rules of equality and reciprocity applicable in such cases. It will be very agreeable to him to find that the provision in question is intended merely to afford time for a satisfactory choice of a Plenipotentiary, successor to Mr. Jackson, and that the mode of carrying it into effect may be equally unexceptionable. But while, from the language of the Marquis Wellesley, with respect to the designation of a Chargé d'Affaires, and from the silence as to any other successor to the recalled Minister, it is left to be inferred that the former alone is in contemplation, it becomes proper to ascertain what are the real views of the British Government on the occasion; and, should they be such as they are inferred to be, to meet them by a correspondent change in the diplomatic establishment of the United States at London. The President relies on your discretion for obtaining the requisite knowledge of this subject in a manner that will do justice to the friendly policy which the United States wish to be reciprocal in every instance between the two nations. But in the event of its appearing that the substitution of a Chargé d'Affaires for a Minister Plenipotentiary is to be of a continuance not required or explained by the occasion, and consequently justifying the inference drawn from the letter of Lord Wellesley, the respect which the United States owe to themselves will require that you return to the United States, according to the permission hereby given by the President, leaving charged with the business of the Legation such person as you may deem most fit for the trust. With this view, a commission, as required by a statute of the last session, is herewith enclosed, with a blank for a secretary of Legation. But this step you will not consider yourself as instructed to take in case you should have commenced, with a prospect of a satisfactory result, the negotiation authorized by my letter of the 20th January.

In a letter of the fourth of this month I transmitted to you a copy of the act of Congress at their last session concerning the commercial intercourse between the United States, and Great Britain and France. You will herewith receive another copy of the same act. In the fourth section of this statute you will perceive a new modification of the policy of the United States, and you will let it be understood by the British Government that this provision will be duly carried into effect on the part of the United States.

A satisfactory adjustment of the affair of the Chesapeake is very desirable. The views of the President upon this delicate subject, you may collect, not only from the instructions heretofore given to you, but from the sentiments that had been manifested on the part of this Government in the discussion with Mr. Rose, and from the terms and conditions contained in the arrangement made with Mr. Erskine. And conformably with these views, thus to be collected, you will consider yourself hereby instructed to negotiate and conclude an arrangement with the British Government in relation to the attack on the frigate Chesapeake.

I have the honor to be, &c.

R. SMITH.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Pinkney to Mr. Smith.

LONDON, June 13, 1810.

I have not yet obtained from Lord Wellesley an answer to my letter of the 30th of April, concerning the British blockades of France before the date of the Berlin decree. In a short conference on Sunday last, the 10th instant, I pressed for a prompt and favorable reply, and shall perhaps receive it in the course of a few days. I had requested an interview on this subject on the 18th of last month, in consequence of a letter brought by Mr. Lee from General Armstrong, dated the 2d of May; but the state of Lord Wel-lesley's health prevented its taking place sooner than the 10th instant.

I have sent Mr. Craig (a young gentleman from Philadelphia) as a messenger to General Armstrong. He carries a newspaper copy of the late act of Congress respecting commercial intercourse.

I have prepared an official letter to you on the affair of the Chesapeake; but, as Mr. Erving leaves town for Liverpool in the morning, there is not time to copy it. It shall be forwarded, however, by Mr. Morier, who is about to sail in the British frigate Venus for New York; or sent to Liverpool to the care of Mr. Maury. In the mean time, it will be sufficient to state to you that I am expecting every day Lord Wellesley's written overture in that affair, and that, in our conferences, which resulted in an understanding that he would make such an overture, no objection was made by him to an engagement to restore the men to the ship from which they were forcibly taken, without the offensive reservation prescribed to Mr. Rose and Mr. Erskine, and contained in Mr. Jackson's project; to offer a suitable provision, without any reservation, for the families of the sufferers, as a part of the terms of satisfaction; to forbear all reference, in the papers leading to or containing the arrangement, to the President's proclamation, or to anything connected with it; to adopt in those papers a style and manner not only respectful but kind to our Government; to recite in them (as in Mr. Erskine's letter to you in April, 1809) that Admiral Berkeley had been promptly disavowed, and, as a mark of His Britannic Majesty's displeasure, recalled from an important command. I have met, on this occasion, with nothing of a discouraging nature, except on the impracticable point of the trial and punishment of the offending officer. On that point it is impossible to prevail; but there will be no objection to my declaring, in a reply to the overture, the expectation of the American Government, that the officer shall be tried and punished, or to a rejoinder, (if I wish it,) on the part of Lord Wellesley, suggesting, in a friendly way, the reasons for not fulfilling that expectation.

Mr. Pinkney to Mr. Smith.

LONDON, June 26, 1810.

SIR: Lord Wellesley's answer to my letter of the 30th of April, concerning the British blockades of France anterior to the Berlin decree being still delayed, I have sent him the letter of the 23d instant, of which a copy is now transmitted.

I have the honor to be, &c.

WILLIAM PINKNEY.

[Enclosed in Mr. Pinkney's letter of June 26, 1810.]

Mr. Pinkney to Lord Wellesley.

GREAT CUMBERLAND PLACE,

June 23, 1810.

MY LORD: I beg to recall your Lordship's attention to the subject of the letter which I had the honor to address to you on the 30th of April last, concerning the British blockades of France anterior to the Berlin decree.

My Government expects from me a communication on that subject; and your Lordship will, I am sure, take pleasure in enabling me, with as little delay as possible, to fulfil that expectation in a satisfactory manner.

I feel confident that, after the declaration of France, which I had the honor to state to your Lordship in that letter, and to mention in conference before and since its date, there will be no difficulty on the part of His Majesty's Government in revoking these blockades, or declaring that they are no longer in existence.

I have the honor to be, &c.

WILLIAM PINKNEY.

Mr. Pinkney to Mr. Smith.

LONDON, July 1, 1810.

SIR: I have this day had the honor to receive your letter of the 23d [22d] of May, by Mr. Parish, and have sent a note to Lord Wellesley, requesting an interview; he is out of town, but will return to night or in the morning. The instructions contained in your letter concerning the inequality, supposed to be intended by this Government in the state of our diplomatic relations, shall be executed with the discretion which undoubtedly they require; and I am persuaded that the result will be perfectly satisfactory to the President. In the mean time, I think I can undertake to assure you that no change has taken place in the opinion of Lord Wellesley, as announced in my private letter to you of 4th January, that a Minister Plenipotentiary of rank should be sent to the United States. Certainly, no idea has been entertained here of a permanent or long-continued Chargé d'Affaires. It could only be intended to send one in the first instance; and I have reason to be confident that, for some time past, it has been in agitation to appoint a Minister Plenipotentiary without delay; that Lord Wellesley has, in fact, thought of and mentioned a person; and that Mr. Morier's departure has been put off in consequence.

In the case of the Chesapeake, I have already stated to you that I think there will be no difficulty, if the further punishment of Berkeley is not made on our part a sine qua non. Your instructions are very clear, that this is not to be peremptorily insisted on.

I have nothing to add to my communication of the 26th ultimo, concerning the British blockades of France before the Berlin decree, except that I mean to press Lord Wellesley on that subject at our next interview, as I did at our last. I shall not fail, at the same time, to draw his attention to the Orders in Council and the intercourse act.

I need scarcely say that, if events should make it proper for me, in obedience to the President's commands, to return to America, (leaving a Chargé d'Affaires.) I shall lose no time in doing so. I have the honor to be, &c.

WILLIAM PINKNEY.

ROBERT SMITH, Esq., &c.

Mr. Smith to Mr. Pinkney.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE.

July 2, 1810.

SIR: Your several letters of the 8th and 9th of April, and the 2d and 3d of May, have been received.

Whilst it was not known, on the one hand, how far the French Government would adhere to the apparent import of the condition, as first communicated, on which the Berlin decree would be revoked, and, on the other hand, what explanations would be given by the British Government with respect to its blockades prior to that decree, the course deemed proper to be taken was that pointed out in my letter to you of the 11th of November, and in that to General Armstrong, of the 1st of December. The precise and formal declaration since made by the French Government, that the condition was limited to the blockades of France, or parts of France, of a date prior to the date of the Berlin decree, and the acknowledgment of the British Government of the existence of such blockades, particularly that of May, 1806, with a failure to revoke it, or even to admit the constructive extinguishment of it, held out in your letter to the Marquis Wellesley, give to the subject a new aspect and a decided character.

As the British Government had constantly alleged that the Berlin decree was the original aggression on our neutral commerce, that her Orders in Council were but a retaliation on that decree, and had, moreover, on that ground, asserted an obligation on the United States to take effectual measures against the decree as a preliminary to a repeal of the orders, nothing could be more reasonable than to expect that the condition, in the shape last presented, would be readily accepted. The President is therefore equally disappointed and dissatisfied at the abortiveness of your correspondence with Lord Wellesley on this important subject. He entirely approves the determination you took to resume it with a view to the special and immediate obligation lying on the British Government to cancel the illegal blockades; and you are instructed, in case the answer to your letter of the 30th of April should not be satisfactory, to represent to the British Government, in terms temperate but explicit, that the United States consider themselves authorized by strict and unquestionable right, as well as supported by the principles heretofore applied by Great Britain to the case, in claiming and expecting a revocation of the illegal blockades of France of a date prior to that of the Berlin decree, as preparatory to a further demand of the revocation of that decree.

It ought not to be presumed that the British Government, in reply to such a representation, will contend that a blockade like that of May, 1806, from the Elbe to Brest, a coast not less than one thousand miles, proclaimed four years since, without having been at any time attempted to be duly executed by the application of a naval force, is a blockade conformable to the law of nations, and consistent with neutral rights. Such a pretext is completely barred, not only by the unanimous authorities both of writers and of treaties on this point, not excepting even British treaties; but by the rule of blockade communicated by that Government to this in the year 1804, in which it is laid down, that orders had been given not to consider any blockade of those islands (Martinique and Guadaloupe) as existing, unless in respect of particular ports which may be actually invested, and then not to capture vessels bound to such ports unless they shall previously have been warned not to enter them, and that they (the Lords of the Admiralty) had also sent the necessary directions on the subject to the Judges of the Vice-Admiralty Courts in the West Indies and America. In this communication it is expressly stated that the rule to the British courts and cruisers was furnished in consequence of the representations made by the Government of the United States against blockades, not unlike that now in question, and with the express view of redressing the grievance complained of. Nor ought it to be presumed that the British Government will finally resort to the plea that her naval force, although unapplied, is adequate to the enforcement of the blockade of May, 1806; and that this forms a legal distinction between that and the Berlin decree of November following. Were it admitted that an adequate force existed, and was applicable to such a purpose, the absurdity of confounding the power to do a thing with actually doing of it speaks for itself. In the present case the absurdity is peculiarly striking. A port blockaded by sea, without a ship near it, being a contradiction in terms, as well as a perversion of law and of common sense.

From the language of Lord Wellesley's two letters it is possible he may endeavor to evade the measure required by subtle comments on the posture given to the blockade of May, 1806, by the succeeding orders of 1807. But even here he is met by the case of the blockade of Copenhagen and the other ports of Zealand in the year 1808; at a time when these, with all Danish ports, were embraced by those very orders of 1807; a proof that, however the orders and blockades may be regarded as in some respects the same, they are regarded in others as having a distinct operation, and may, consequently, co-exist, being absolutely merged in or superseded the one by the other.

In the difficulty which the British Government must feel in finding a gloss for the extravagant principle of her paper blockades, it may perhaps wish to infer an acquiescence on the part of this Government, from the silence under which they have, in some instances, passed. Should a disposition to draw such an inference show itself, you will be able to meet it by an appeal, not only to the successful remonstrance in the letter to Mr. Thornton above cited, but to the answer given to Mr. Merry of June, 1806, to the notification of a blockade in the year 1806, as a precise and authentic record of the light in which such blockades and the notification of them were viewed by the United States. Copies of the answer have been heretofore forwarded, and another is now enclosed as an additional precaution against mis-carriage.

Whatever may be the answer to the representation and requisition which you are instructed to make, you will transmit it without delay to this Department. Should it be of a satisfactory nature, you will hasten to forward it also to the diplomatic functionary of the United States at Paris, who will be instructed to make a proper use of it for obtaining a repeal of the French decree of Berlin, and to proceed concurrently with you in bringing about successive removals by the two Governments of all their predatory edicts. I avail myself of this occasion to state to you, that it is deemed of great importance that our Ministers at foreign Courts, and especially at Paris and London, should be kept, the one by the other informed of the state of our affairs at each. I have the honor to be, &c.

R. SMITH.

WILLIAM PINKNEY, Esq. &c.

[Referred to in the letter of Mr. Pinkney, Sept. 21, 1810.]
Mr. Madison to Mr. Thornton, Chargé des Affaires of His Britannic Majesty.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,

October 27, 1803.

SIR: The letters, of which copies are enclosed, were received last evening. One of them is from the British Consul General at New York; the other, a copy enclosed therein, of a letter to him from Commodore Hood, Commander-in-Chief of His Britannic Majesty's ships of war on the West India station. The letter bears date of the 25th of July last, and requests that the American Government, and agents of neutral nations, might be made acquainted that the islands of Martinique and Guadaloupe are, and have been, blockaded from the 17th of June preceding, by detachments from the squadron under his command, in order that there may be no plea for attempting to enter the ports of the islands.

It will no doubt, occur to you, sir, that such a communication would have been more properly made through another channel, than directly from the Consulate at New York. The importance and urgency of the subject, however, supersede the consideration of forms, and I lose no time in communicating to you the observations which the President deems it to require.

It will not escape your attention, that Commodore Hood's letter is dated no less than three months before it could have the effect of a notification; and that, besides this remarkable delay, the alleged blockade is computed from a date more than one month prior to that of the letter itself. But those circumstances, however important they may be, do not constitute the main objection to the proceeding of the British commander. His letter, instead of stating that a particular port or ports were blockaded by a force actually before them, declares, generally, two entire and considerable islands to be in a state of blockade. It can never be admitted that the trade of a neutral nation, in articles not contraband, can be legally obstructed to any place not actually blockaded, or that any notification or proclamation can be of force, unless accompanied with an actual blockade. The law of nations is, perhaps, more clear on no other point than that of a siege or blockade, such as will justify a belligerent nation in restraining the trade of neutrals. Every term used in defining the case, imports the presence and position of a force rendering access to the prohibited place manifestly difficult and dangerous. Every jurist of reputation who treats with precision this branch of the law of nations, refers to an actual and particular blockade. Not a single treaty can be found which undertakes to define a blockade, in which the definition does not exclude a general or nominal blockade, by limiting it to the case of a sufficient force, so disposed as to amount to an actual and particular blockade. To a number of such treaties Great Britain is a party. Not to multiply references on the subject, I confine myself to the fourth article of the convention of June, 1801, between Great Britain and Russia, which having been entered into for the avowed purpose "of settling an invariable determination of their principles, upon the rights of neutrality," must necessarily be considered as a solemn recognition of an existing and general principle and right, not as a stipulation of any new principle or right limited to the parties themselves. The article is in the words following, viz: "That in order to determine what characterizes a blockaded port, that denomination is given only to a port where there is, by the dispositions of the Power which attacks it with ships stationary or sufficiently near, an evident danger of entering." It cannot be necessary to dwell on the inconsistency of the kind of blockade declared by Commodore Hood, with the principle laid down concerning the rights of neutrality, or on the consequences of the principle on which a blockade of whole islands, by a few ships, is founded, to the commerce and interests of neutral nations. If the islands of Martinique and Guadaloupe, the latter not less than two hundred and fifty, and the former nearly one hundred and fifty miles in circumference, and each containing a variety of ports, can be blockaded by detachments from a commodore's squadron, it is evident that a very inconsiderable portion of the British fleet may blockade all the maritime countries with which she is at war. In a word, such a principle completely sacrifices the rights of neutral commerce to the pleasure or the policy of the parties at war. But it deserves to be particularly remarked, that a power to proclaim general blockades, or any blockade not formed by the real presence of a sufficient force, to be exercised by officers, at a distance from the control of their Government, and deeply interested in enlarging the field of captures which they are to share, offers a temptation that must often aggravate the evils incident to the principle itself. You will infer, sir, from these observations, the serious light in which the President regards the proceeding, which is the subject of them, and will perceive the grounds on which the injuries accruing from it to our commerce, will constitute just claims of indemnification from the British Government. To diminish the extent of these injuries as much as possible, and to guard the good understanding and friendly relations of every sort, which are so desirable to both nations, against the tendency of such measures, will, I venture to assure myself, be sufficient motives with you to employ the interpositions with Commodore Hood which you may judge best adapted to the nature of the case.

I have the honor to be, &c.

JAMES MADISON.

EDWARD THORNTON, Esq.

Mr. Smith to Mr. Pinkney.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,

July 5, 1810.

SIR: Your last communications having afforded so little ground for expecting that the British Government will have yielded to the call on it to originate the annulment of the belligerent edicts against our lawful commerce, by cancelling the spurious blockade of May, 1806, (the first in the series,) it became a duty particularly incumbent upon us to press the other experiment held out in the late act of Congress, another copy of which is herewith sent. You will accordingly make that act, and the disposition of the President to give it effect, the subject of a formal communication.

The British Government ought not to be insensible of the tendency of superadding to a refusal of the course proposed by France for mutually abolishing the predatory edicts, a refusal held out by Congress; and it ought to find, in that consideration, a sufficient inducement to a prompt and cordial concurrence. The British Government must be conscious, also, of its having repeatedly stated that the acquiescence by the United States in the decrees of France was the only justification of its orders against our neutral commerce. The sincerity and consistency of Great Britain being now brought to the test, an opportunity is afforded to evince the existence of both. It may be added, that the form in which it is prescribed is as conciliatory as the proposal itself is unexceptionable.

As the act of Congress repealing the late restrictions on the commerce of the United States with two belligerents must be unequal in its operation, in case Great Britain should continue to interrupt it with France, inasmuch as France is unable to interrupt it materially with her, the British Government may feel a temptation to decline a course which might put an end to this advantage. But if the unworthiness and unfriendliness of such a purpose should not divert her from it, she ought not to overlook either the opportunity afforded her enemy of retorting the inequality, by a previous compliance with the act of Congress, or the necessity to which the United States may be driven by such abuse of their amicable advances, to resume, under new impressions, the subject of their foreign relations.

If the British Government should be disposed to meet, in a favorable manner, the arrangement tendered, and should ask for explanations as to the extent of the repeal of the French decrees, which will be required, your answer will be as obvious as it must be satisfactory. The repeal must embrace every part of the French decrees which violate the neutral rights guaranteed to us by the law of nations. Whatever parts of the decrees may not have this effect, as we have no right as a neutral nation to demand a recall of them, Great Britain can have no pretext, as a belligerent nation, to urge the demand. If there be parts of the decrees liable to objections of another kind, it lies with the United States alone to decide on the mode of proceeding with respect to them.

In explaining the extent of the repeal, which on the British side, is required, you will be guided by the same principle. You will accordingly let it be distinctly understood, that it must necessarily include an annulment of the blockade, of May, 1806, which has been avowed to be comprehended in, and identified with, the Orders in Council, and which is palpably at variance with the law of nations. This is the explanation which will be given to the French Government on this point by our Minister at Paris, in case it should there be required.

But there are plain and powerful reasons why the British Government ought to revoke every other blockade resting on proclamations, or diplomatic notifications, and not on the actual application of a naval force adequate to a real blockade.

1st. This comprehensive redress is equally due from the British Government to its professed respect for the law of nations, and to the just claims of a friendly Power.

2d. Without this enlightened precaution, it is probable, and may indeed be inferred from the letter of the Duke of Cadore to General Armstrong, that the French Government will draw Great Britain and the United States to issue on the legality of such blockades, by acceding to the act of Congress, with a condition that a repeal of the blockades shall accompany a repeal of the Orders in Council, alleging that the orders and blockades, differing little, if at all, otherwise than in name, a repeal of the former, leaving in operation the latter, would be a mere illusion.

3d. If it were even to happen that a mutual repeal of the orders and decrees could be brought about without involving the subject of blockades, and with a continuance of the blockades in operation, how could the United States be expected to forbear an immediate call for their annulment? or how long would it probably be before an appeal by France to the neutral law of impartiality would bring up the same question between the United States and Great Britain? And from whatever circumstances the issue on it may arise, the impossibility of maintaining the British side, with even a color of right or consistency, may be seen in the view taken of the subject in the correspondence with Mr. Thornton and Mr. Merry, already in your hands.

If the British Government should accede to the overture contained in the act of Congress, by repealing or so modifying its edicts as that they will cease to violate our neutral rights, you will transmit the repeal, properly authenticated, to General Armstrong, and, if necessary, by a special messenger, and you will hasten to transmit it also to this Department. With great respect, &c.

R. SMITH.

WILLIAM PINKNEY, Esq.

Mr. Smith to Mr. Pinkney.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
July 17, 1810.

SIR: You will herewith receive duplicates of my letters to you of the 13th, 16th, and 30th June, and 2d and 5th of July.

This despatch you will receive from Lieutenant Spence of the Navy, who is to proceed from New York in the sloop of war the Hornet. This public vessel has been ordered to England and to France, not only for the purpose of transmitting despatches to you, and to our functionary at Paris, but for the further purpose of affording you, as well as him, a safe opportunity of conveying to this Department, before the next meeting of Congress, full information of the ultimate policy, in relation to the United States, of the Governments of England and France. And with a view to insure her return to the United States in due season, her commanding officer has received orders not to remain in any port of Europe after the 1st day of October next. With respect, therefore, to the time you will detain Mr. Spence in London, you will be influenced by the information which you may receive from him as to the orders he may have from the commanding officer of the Hornet. I have the honor to be, &c.

R. SMITH.

WILLIAM PINKNEY, Esq.

Mr. Pinkney to Mr. Smith,

LONDON, July 23, 1810.

SIR: I followed up the conversation with Lord Wellesley, mentioned in my letter of the 6th instant, with a short note, of which a copy is enclosed, requesting information concerning the intention of this Government to send a Minister Plenipotentiary, without delay, to the United States, as the successor of Mr. Jackson.

Reflection seems to have suggested to Lord Wellesley some objections, which did not occur in the course of our conference, to giving this information in an official manner.

I was aware of this on Saturday last, but was not willing to forego a written communication on a matter which had taken a character of some delicacy and importance.

Lord Wellesley has endeavored to avoid his own difficulty and mine, by sending me the letter (marked "private") of which I have now the honor to transmit a copy.

As this letter is in conformity with his verbal assurances in conferences, and appears to leave no reasonable doubt upon the point to which it relates, I do not suppose that I can properly undertake to question its sufficiency, either by pressing for a more formal communication, or by taking the step which your instructions of the 23d of May, in certain circumstances, prescribe to me.

I still believe that the affair of the Chesapeake will very soon be brought to a conclusion.

I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt (on the 21st instant, by Mr. Henry Izard,) of your letters of 13th and 16th of last month; and I take this opportunity to thank you for the private letter of the 5th ultimo, received at the same time. I have the honor to be, &c.

WILLIAM PINKNEY.

Hon. ROBERT SMITH, &c.

[Enclosed in Mr. Pinkney's despatch of July 23.]

Mr. Pinkney to Lord Wellesley.

GREAT CUMBERLAND PLACE, July 7, 1810.

MY LORD: In pursuance of the conversation which I had the honor to hold with your Lordship on the 6th instant, I take the liberty to request information, which I am sure will be readily given, concerning the intention of His Majesty's Government to send a Minister Plenipotentiary to the United States, as the successor of Mr. Jackson.

I have no doubt that it is intended to send such a successor without delay, as one of the means of restoring and maintaining the friendly relations of the two countries; but I shall, nevertheless, be glad to be authorized by your Lordship to make a communication to that effect to my Government. I have the honor to be, &c.

WILLIAM PINKNEY.

The MARQUIS WELLESLEY, &c.

[Referred to in Mr. Pinkney's despatch of July 23.]

Lord Wellesley to Mr. Pinkney.

APSLEY HOUSE, July 22, 1810.

SIR: I think it may be difficult to enter upon the subject of your last note, (respecting the diplomatic rank of our Minister in America,) in any official form.

But I have no difficulty in assuring you, that it is my intention immediately to recommend the appointment of an Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary from the King to the United States.

I have the honor to be, &c.

WELLESLEY.

WILLIAM PINKNEY, Esq., &c.

Mr. Pinkney to Mr. Smith.

LONDON, August 14, 1810.

SIR: As Lord Wellesley still withheld his long-expected answer to my note of the 30th of April, respecting the British blockades anterior to the Berlin decree, and his written overture in the case of the Chesapeake, I sent him on the 8th instant a letter, of which a copy is enclosed. No importunity had before been spared which it became me to use.

I need not trouble you with comments on the obvious unwillingness of this Government to touch the first mentioned subject, or anything connected with its principles and practice respecting blockades, or with the system of the Orders in Council. Justice and policy both invite it to give the declaration which I have required; and certainly nothing has been omitted on my part to induce it to take that course. I fear, however, that the declaration will be declined, unless, indeed, Lord Wellesley should continue to evade my application, by returning no answer to it—a new practice, I think, which, little to be commended as it is, must, I presume, if persisted in here, be reciprocated in America.

It is truly surprising that, in the case of the Chesapeake, there should be the same backwardness. I can conjecture no motive for this hesitation to propose, in writing, terms arranged in conference between Lord Wellesley and myself, in an affair which it is the manifest interest of England to settle as soon as possible. It is now almost six weeks since Lord Wellesley last assured me (as he had before more than once assured me) that he would put me in possession of his formal overture in this case immediately. He knows that you have been made officially acquainted with that assurance; for I thought it advisable to submit to his perusal before it was transmitted (for the purpose principally of avoiding misunderstandings) my short letter to you of the 6th of last month, which states, that “in the business of the Chesapeake, he will write to me in a few days;” and further, that in that business “I do not expect any difficulty.”

There can be no misconception as to the terms to be offered; for, besides that they were stated with great precision in the conference alluded to in my letter to you of the 6th ultimo, as well as in several antecedent interviews, I wrote Lord Wellesley, the day after that conference, a private note, of which a copy is now transmitted, enclosing a memorandum in pencil of the terms which (exclusive of any further mark of displeasure to Admiral Berkeley, very decidedly discouraged by Lord Wellesley) “had been spoken of in our different conversations as fit to be proposed.” I do not find that I retained any copy of the memorandum in pencil; but the terms (agreeing in substance with those to which I informed you, in my letter of the 13th of June last, Lord Wellesley had no objection,) were to this effect:

1st. The overture to contain such a recital, or statement, as is found in Mr. Erskine's letter to you of the 17th April, 1809, of the prompt disavowal by His Britannic Majesty of the unauthorized act of his naval officer, whose recall, as a mark of the King's displeasure, from a highly important and honorable command, immediately ensued.

2d. To offer without any reservation the restoration of the men to the ships from which they were forcibly taken.

3d. To offer without any reservation, and as part of the terms of the international adjustment, a suitable pecuniary provision for the families of the persons slain in the attack, and for the wounded survivors.

It was moreover understood, that the paper proffering these terms would not contain the allusions which have heretofore occasioned embarrassment; that the whole affair would be made to take the most friendly character; and that I should be at liberty to express in my reply to the overture, if I thought fit, the expectation of my Government as to the further punishment of Admiral Berkeley.

I ought to add that, in all my conversations with Lord Wellesley on the case of the Chesapeake, he has shown not only a disposition but a wish to accommodate it, and that I am, therefore, the more astonished at the delay which has taken place.

In a few days I intend to renew my efforts to a conclusion, and to obtain an answer of some sort to my letter of the 30th of April. I am sufficiently inclined to present a strong paper upon both subjects; but in the actual posture of affairs, and in the absence of such instructions from you as would countenance such a step, I think it my duty to forbear a little longer.

It is not impossible that Lord Wellesley's backwardness to close the case of the Chesapeake with me, may arise from a desire that it should be adjusted in America through the new Minister. If this were so, however, he could have no inducement to conceal it from me, since he is aware that I have always entertained the same desire.

When I see him I will advert to this. I am not yet able to say positively who the new Minister will be. Lord ——— and some others are spoken of. Lord Wellesley has given me no other written information on the subject than is contained in his letter of the 22d ultimo, already communicated to you. His verbal information has been of the same effect, with this addition, that he retained his opinion (mentioned in my unofficial letter to you of the 4th of January last,) that the Minister to America ought to be a man of rank. As far as may be prudent, I shall not fail to do all that is in my power to expedite the appointment.

The letter from General Armstrong, to which my letter of the 8th instant to Lord Wellesley alludes, is dated the 24th of July; and expresses his wish that the declaration of the British Government concerning the blockades may be obtained and forwarded without delay.

I have the honor, &c.

WILLIAM PINKNEY.

Mr. Pinkney to Mr. Smith.

LONDON, August 18, 1810.

SIR: I enclose the “Times” newspaper of this morning, containing a copy of a French decree of the 8th instant, and of a letter of the same date from the French Minister for Foreign Affairs to General Armstrong. The last is a most important paper, of which I hope to receive, without delay, an official communication.

I have the honor to be, &c.

WILLIAM PINKNEY.

Relations with Great Britain.

Mr. Pinkney to Mr. Smith.

LONDON, August 21, 1810.

SIR: I have just received a communication from General Armstrong, dated the 6th instant, announcing the absolute revocation of the Berlin and Milan decrees, and have, in consequence, sent a note to Lord Wellesley, requesting to see him: Lord Wellesley is out of town, but will, it is said, return to-night or to-morrow morning.

General Armstrong has not transmitted any copy of the official notice mentioned in his letter; but, I presume, it is the same with that published in the "Monitor" of the 9th, of which I am in possession, and with which the quotation in General Armstrong's letter agrees.

I do not know whether his construction of that document will be thought here to be liable to any objections. I think it impossible, however, that, upon any interpretation of it, this Government can hesitate to repeal its Orders in Council.

A copy of General Armstrong's letter to me is enclosed: I have the honor to be, &c.

WILLIAM PINKNEY.

[Enclosed in the preceding letter.]

Copy of General Armstrong's letter to Mr. Pinkney.

PARIS, August 6, 1810.

SIR: I have the honor to inform you that His Majesty, the Emperor and King, has been pleased to revoke his decrees of Berlin and Milan. Of this interesting fact I had this morning a written and official notice in the following words, viz: "Je suis autorisé à vous déclarer, monsieur, que les décrets de Berlin et de Milan sont révoqués, et qu'à dater du 1er Novembre ils cesseront d'avoir leur effet."*

Sincerely hoping that you may be able to turn this circumstance to some useful account, I forward it per triplicate.

I am, sir, with great respect, &c.

[*TRANSLATION.]

I am authorized to declare to you, sir, that the decrees of Berlin and Milan are revoked, and that after the 1st of November they will cease to have effect.

[This note was received at the Department of State on the 11th of November.]

[Referred to in Mr. Pinkney's despatch, Aug. 21, 1810.]
General Armstrong to Mr. Pinkney.

PARIS, August 7, 1810.

SIR: I hazarded a line or two yesterday, by the way of Morlaix, merely to inform you that the Imperial decrees of Berlin and Milan were at last given up. I now send you, by a more direct conveyance, a copy of the Duke of Cadore's letter to me of the 5th instant.

I am, sir, with great respect, &c.

JOHN ARMSTRONG.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Pinkney to Mr. Smith.

LONDON, Friday, August 24, 1810.

I transmit a copy of my answer, formed upon your recent instructions, to Lord Wellesley's notification of the blockade of Corfu. Is it not worthy of reflection, whether an attempt to blockade an entire sea like the Adriatic should not be protested against, whatever may be the force employed in closing the passage to it?

[Referred to in Mr. Pinkney's despatch of August 24.]
From Mr. Pinkney to Lord Wellesley.

GREAT CUMBERLAND PLACE,

August 21, 1810.

MY LORD: I have had the honor to receive your official note of the 18th instant, communicating the resolution of the British Government to establish a blockade of the canal of Corfu, and shall not fail to transmit a copy of it, with as little delay as possible, to the Secretary of State of the United States.

In the mean time I take the liberty, in pursuance of the sentiments of the President heretofore signified to me, to observe to your Lordship that, as a blockade essentially implies a force on the spot for the purpose, and as the notification required in the case must be a warning to neutral traders of the fact that a blockade exists, the communication which your Lordship has made to me derives its title to the acknowledgment of the United States from the supposition that it was meant as a friendly premonition, which, though imposing of itself no legal restraint on neutrals, nor inducing any penal consequences, might usefully influence the course of their mercantile expeditions. In this sense the communication will be received by the President, as a mark of that friendly attention which ought, in all cases, to be reciprocally maintained; and in this sense the President will be the more disposed to regard the communication, as a different one would contradict the definition of a blockade, and of the requisite notification thereof, contained in the orders of the British Government to Commodore Hood and the Judges of the Vice Admiralty Courts, as communicated to the American Government by Mr. Merry, on the 12th of April, 1804.

I have the honor to be, &c.

WM. PINKNEY.

THE MARQUIS OF WELLESLEY, &amp;c.

[Referred to in Mr. Pinkney's letter of Sept. 3, 1810.]

Mr. Pinkney to Lord Wellesley.

GREAT CUMBERLAND PLACE,

August 25, 1810.

MY LORD: I have the honor to state to your Lordship that I have received from General Armstrong, Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States at Paris, a letter, bearing date the 6th instant, in which he informs me that the Government of France has revoked the decrees of Berlin and Milan, and that he has received a written and official notice of that fact in the following words: "Je suis autorisé à vous déclarer, que les décrets de Berlin et de Milan sont révoqués, et qu'à dater du 1er Novembre ils cesseront d'avoir leur effet."

I take for granted that the revocation of the British Orders in Council of January and November, 1807, and April, 1809, and of all other orders dependent upon, analogous to, or in execution of them, will follow of course; and I shall hope to be enabled by your Lordship, with as little delay as possible, to announce to my Government that such revocation has taken place.

I have the honor to be, &c.

WM. PINKNEY.

The MARQUIS WELLESLEY, &c.

Mr. Pinkney to Mr. Smith.

LONDON, August 29, 1810.

SIR: I dined yesterday with Lord Wellesley, and found that he had only returned to town in the morning. He still complained of indisposition, but it certainly could not be considered as unfitting him for business. In a short conversation before dinner, he told me that my note respecting the Berlin and Milan decrees should be mentioned to his colleagues to-day; and that I should have an immediate answer; that the affair of the Chesapeake "would be settled to my satisfaction;" that he believed he should recommend to the King the appointment of a Minister Plenipotentiary to the United States either this week or the next; that he had two persons in his eye, (both men of high rank,) but that he could not with propriety name them to me at present. As far as the opportunity permitted, I urged promptitude on all these subjects as indispensable, and expressed my confidence that they would be disposed of in season for the approaching meeting of Congress.

You perceive that, notwithstanding past promises, nothing has yet been done, and that there is no security that we shall have anything but promises. I am truly disgusted with this; and would, if I followed my own inclination, put a speedy end to it. It is better, however, to do nothing of an irritating nature, until this Government has had full time to act upon my note of the 25th. Even if it should decline to repeal the Orders in Council, (which I am told is quite possible,) a moderate course on my part will have the recommendation of putting it more clearly in the wrong.

If it should decline to repeal, the President may be assured that I will not fail to present such a paper as conduct so extraordinary will demand; and, if further delays are effected, that I shall remonstrate in very decided terms.

I have the honor to be, &c.

WM. PINKNEY.

HON. ROBERT SMITH.

Lord Wellesley to Mr. Pinkney.

FOREIGN OFFICE, August 31, 1810.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter under date the 25th instant.

On the 23d of February, 1808, His Majesty's Minister in America declared to the Government of the United States "His Majesty's earnest desire to see the commerce of the world restored to that freedom which is necessary for its prosperity, and his readiness to abandon the system which had been forced upon him, whenever the enemy should retract the principles which had rendered it necessary."

I am commanded by His Majesty to repeat that declaration, and to assure you that whenever the repeal of the French decrees shall have actually taken effect, and the commerce of neutral nations shall have been restored to the condition in which it stood previously to the promulgation of those decrees, His Majesty will feel the highest satisfaction in relinquishing a system which the conduct of the enemy compelled him to adopt.

I have the honor to be, &c.

WELLESLEY.

WM. PINKNEY, Esq.

Mr. Pinkney to Mr. Smith.

LONDON, September 3, 1810.

SIR: Lord Wellesley sent me his answer yesterday to my note of the 25th ultimo, respecting the Berlin and Milan decrees. I hasten to transmit a copy of it. A copy shall be sent without delay to General Armstrong.

I have the honor to be, &c.

WM. PINKNEY.

Mr. Pinkney to Mr. Armstrong.

LONDON, September 3, 1810.

SIR: I received yesterday from Lord Wellesley, an answer, dated the 31st of last month, to my note of the 25th, in which I communicated to him the purport of your letter to me of the 6th, respecting the Berlin and Milan decrees; and I hasten to put you in possession (by a special messenger) of a copy of each of those papers, to be used according to your discretion.

It is extremely desirable that I should have, without loss of time, the benefit of such reflections upon this answer as you may be disposed to favor me with, and of such information, calculated to regulate my course with regard to it, as your local position may enable you to furnish.

Your letters of the 6th and 7th ultimo concur in representing, (with perfect propriety, I think,) that the revocation of the Berlin and Milan decrees is to take effect absolutely after the 1st of November, and I have so put it to the British Government. You will let me know if any error (which I do not in the least suspect) has been discovered in this representation, or if it is necessary that the subject should be brought before this Government in any other form than that which, looking to your representation, I have chosen.

You will perceive that the pledge contained in Lord Wellesley's answer is referred to the period when the repeal of the French edicts shall have actually taken effect, and the commerce of neutral nations shall have been restored to the condition in which those edicts found it. In case there is nothing equivocal in these last expressions, the pledge is, I presume, sufficient for the present, if the recall of the French decrees does not depend on a condition precedent, as some have supposed. If, on the other hand, it is understood that, before the French repeal is to take effect, namely, before the 1st or 2d of November, Great Britain must revoke her Orders in Council, so that the orders shall cease to operate at the same moment with the decrees; or, if it is understood that the British blockades, to which France objects, (that of May, 1806, for example,) must be recalled, or declared not to be in force, before the same period; then, undoubtedly, the pledge is nothing. If the pledge is sufficient, we have only to let the matter rest until November. If it is insufficient, I cannot be too soon employed in taking a new course.

I ought to mention, however, that I am now preparing a note to Lord Wellesley, to be presented in a few days, concerning the blockades. This step is proper, and, I think, indispensable, whether the revocation of the decrees of France depends upon those blockades being put out of the way or not.

Begging you to let me hear from you as soon as convenient, I am, sir, with great respect and consideration, &c.

WM. PINKNEY.

Mr. Pinkney to Mr. Smith.

LONDON, September 4, 1810.

SIR: I have just received your letters by Lieutenant Spence. Their dates are as follows: 17th July, 1810; 5th July, (original and duplicate); 2d July, (original and duplicate); 30th June, (original and duplicate); 16th June, (duplicate, the original had been received before); 13th June, (duplicate, the original had already been received.)

I have only time to add, that the repeal of the French decrees (as communicated to me by General Armstrong,) and the reply of Lord Wellesley of the 31st ult., to my communication on that subject, do not appear to me to take away the necessity of executing the instructions contained in your letters of the 2d and 5th of July, relative to the British blockades, although they may affect the manner of executing those instructions. The note, which I intend to present on this occasion, will be ready in a day or two, and shall be sent in immediately. I have the honor to be, &c.

WM. PINKNEY.

P. S. Lord Wellesley sent me a message yesterday, through Mr. Hamilton, that, if I still wished to see him on the subject of my late communication, he would receive me to-day. I replied that I had no wish to see him on that subject, but that it might be necessary to write him a note upon it hereafter. I mean to confine myself as much as possible to written intercourse with Lord Wellesley.

WM. PINKNEY.

Mr. Pinkney to Mr. Smith.

LONDON, September 7, 1810.

SIR: It has been supposed here, that the notification of a blockade of the "Canal of Corfu," on the 18th of last month, was intended to close the Adriatic; and the English newspapers, as you will have perceived, so represented it. In my letter to you of the 20th ult., communicating a copy of that notification, I have adopted this construction, which now appears to be erroneous. The "canal," to which the notification is now understood to apply, is the narrow passage to the eastward of Corfu.

I have the honor to be, &c.

WM. PINKNEY.

ROBERT SMITH, Esq., &c.

Mr. Pinkney to Mr. Smith.

LONDON, September 15, 1810.

SIR: I send, enclosed, a copy of a second letter which I have written to Lord Wellesley, respecting the stoppage of American vessels attempting to pass the Sound, together with a copy of the protest of the master of the American ship Alert, mentioned in that letter, which is well entitled to your attention. I have the honor to be, &c.

WM. PINKNEY.

[Referred to in Mr. Pinkney's letter of Sept. 15, 1810.]

Mr. Pinkney to Lord Wellesley.

GREAT CUMBERLAND PLACE,
September 15, 1810.

MY LORD: In my note of the 1st instant, I had the honor to inform your Lordship, that it had been stated to me, in a letter from Gottenburg, that, in consequence of some misconception of the effect of the order for establishing a blockade of Elsinore in May last, American vessels had recently been prevented from passing the Sound by the English naval force in that quarter; and I requested, that, if this statement was correct, such explanations might be transmitted to the British Commander, as might, at least, confine the blockade in question to the port against which it had been professedly instituted.

As I have not received any answer to that note, and, consequently, do not know whether any order has been given to remove the interruption which it mentions, I feel it to be necessary to lay before your Lordship the enclosed original protest of the master of the American ship Alert, which appears to establish the existence of that interruption in a form as exceptionable as it could possibly assume.

Whatever may be the ground upon which Sir James Saumarez has thought fit to issue his orders to close the passage of the Sound to American vessels, returning in the prosecution of a lawful trade to the United States, or proceeding in a contrary direction, your Lordship will, I am persuaded, think with me, that my Government has a fair claim to be made acquainted, either through me, or through such other channel as your Lordship may deem more proper, with the intentions of the British Government on the subject.

Before I conclude this letter, I must call your Lordship's attention to the particular circumstances of the case which has mainly produced it, and to the redress which those circumstances plainly require.

The Alert has been seized and sent to England by the Africa for salvage. The peril from which she was saved—if she was saved from any peril—was created by the injustice of the capturing vessel, in turning her from the regular course of her homeward voyage.

That the commander of the Africa, or those under whom he acted, should be responsible to the utmost for the loss occasioned by that injustice, seems to be perfectly reasonable; but it is difficult to imagine in what way he can expect to derive from it a right to inflame the loss for his own advantage. I trust that the attempt will be repressed in a suitable manner, and that, in place of salvage to be paid by the injured neutral, compensation will, in some mode or other, be awarded to him for the damages he has been made to sustain.

The impressment, on board the Alert, of four American seamen by the Africa, cannot be passed unnoticed. This abuse could not fail to be interesting under any circumstances; but, on this occasion, (supposing the enclosed narrative to be true,) it is not only characterized by an utter disregard of the rights of the American Government, and by the oppression of its citizens, but is practised under a show of friendly protection, and aggravated by every practical wrong which could well be associated with it.

I have the honor to be, &c.

WM. PINKNEY.

Mr. Pinkney to Lord Wellesley.

GREAT CUMBERLAND PLACE,
September 21, 1810.

MY LORD: On the 30th of April last, I had the honor to address a note to your Lordship, in which, upon the inducements which it stated, I took the liberty to inquire whether there was any objection, on the part of His Majesty's Government, to a revocation, or to a declaration that they were no longer in force, of the British blockades of France, of a date anterior to the Berlin decree.

In a second note, of the 23d of June, I had the honor to recall your Lordship's attention to that inquiry, and to add that my Government expected from me a communication upon it. And on the 8th of August, it was again brought to your Lordship's recollection in the same mode. It was, moreover, mentioned in several conversations after the delivery of my first note, which had, in fact, been preceded by verbal explanations on my part, as well as by an abortive correspondence in writing, to which some of those explanations were preparatory.

If I had been so fortunate as to obtain for my hitherto unanswered inquiry, the notice which I had flattered myself it might receive, and to which I certainly thought it was recommended by the plainest considerations of policy and justice, it would not, perhaps, have been necessary for me to trouble your Lordship with this letter, the purpose of which is in very few words to remind His Majesty's Government, in pursuance of my instructions, of the sentiments and expectations of the Government of the United States, respecting such blockades as that which my inquiry principally regarded.

Those sentiments and expectations are so well explained in two letters, from Mr. Secretary Madison, of the 27th of October, 1803, to Mr. Thornton, and of the 3d of June, 1806, to Mr. Merry, that very little more is required, in the execution of my instructions on this occasion, than that I should refer your Lordship to the copies of those letters, which are herewith transmitted.

Your Lordship will perceive that the strong and conclusive objections, in law and reason, to be found in those papers, (especially in the first, which was occasioned by a communication from the British Consul at New York, of a notice from Cominodore Hood, in July, 1803, that the islands of Martinique and Gaudaloupe were, and for some time had been, blockaded,) apply to several blockades which Great Britain has lately pretended to establish; but in a particular manner to that of May, 1806, (from the Elbe to Brest, inclusive) to that in the spring of 1808, of the whole island of Zealand, and to that, in March, 1809, of the isles of Mauritius and Bourbon.

The Government of the United States can discover no just foundation for these and other similar attempts to blockade entire coasts, by notifications with which the fact has no correspondence. It views them as unwarrantable prohibitions of intercourse rather than regular blockades, and as resembling, in all their essential qualities, the extraordinary decrees and orders, which, for the last four years, have nearly obliterated every trace of the public law of the world, and discouraged by menaces of hostile interruption, and pursued with seizure and confiscation the fairest and most innocent trade of neutral merchants.

It may now be hoped that those decrees and orders are about to disappear forever; and I think I may presume that, as my Government expects, no blockade like that of May, 1806, will survive them.

Your Lordship has informed me, in a recent note, that it is "His Majesty's earnest desire to see the commerce of the world restored to that freedom which is necessary for its prosperity." And I cannot suppose that this freedom is understood to be consistent with vast constructive blockades, which may be so expanded at pleasure, as, without the aid of any new device, to oppress and annihilate every trade but that which England thinks fit to license. It is not, I am sure, to such freedom that your Lordship can be thought to allude.

I am the more inclined to be confident on this point, because I have now before me a well-known official exposition, conceived in terms the most exact, of the British doctrine of blockade, as it stood in 1804, contained in the reply of Mr. Merry, His Majesty's Minister in America, to the very able remonstrance above mentioned from Mr. Madison to Mr. Thornton.

Relations with Great Britain.

In that reply (of the 12th of April, 1804,) it is formally announced to the Government of the United States, "by His Majesty's command, signified to Mr. Merry by the principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, that, for redressing the grievance complained of" by the American Government, orders had been sent to Commodore Hood (and the necessary directions given to the Vice-Admiralty Courts in the West Indies and America) "not to consider any blockade of the islands of Martinique and Gaudaloupe as existing, unless in respect of particular ports which might be actually invested; and then not to capture vessels bound to such ports, unless they should previously have been warned not to enter them."

It is natural to conclude; that, though the "grievance," which this frank communication condemns, has been since so often repeated, as almost to make us lose sight of the rule in the multitude of its violations, your Lordship could not speak of the restoration of the just freedom of commerce, as an event desired by Great Britain, without some reference to the neglected doctrine of this paper, and without some idea of reviving it.

With regard to the blockade of May, 1806, I regret that I have failed to obtain an admission, apparently warranted by facts, and invited by circumstances, that it is not in force.

Your Lordship's answers to my letters of the 15th of February and 7th of March last, appear to justify the opinion that this blockade sunk into the Orders in Council of 1807, with which it was perfectly congenial. It can scarcely be said, that, since the promulgation of those orders, there has been even a show of maintaining it, as an actual blockade, by a stationary force, adequate or inadequate, distributed with that view along the immense line of coast which it affected to embrace. And if it has not been constantly so maintained, nor even attempted to be maintained, as an actual blockade, but has yielded its functions since 1807 to Orders in Council, neither being, nor professing to be, actual blockades, it may, I imagine, be very safely asserted that it exists no longer.

But as this conclusion has not been adopted, but has rather been resisted by your Lordship, it is my duty, in transmitting the enclosed copy of an act of the Congress of the United States, passed on the 1st of May, 1810, entitled "An act concerning the commercial intercourse between the United States and Great Britain and France, and their dependencies, and for other purposes," to state to your Lordship that an annulment of the blockade of May, 1806, is considered by the President to be as indispensable, in the view of that act, as the revocation of the British Orders in Council. I have the honor to be, &c.

WM. PINKNEY.

Mr. Pinkney to Mr. Smith.

LONDON, September 28, 1810.

SIR; I have already sent you a copy of Lord Wellesley's reply to that part of my letter of the 15th instant which particularly respected the case of the Alert. The amount of that reply was, that Government could not interfere, and that the case must be left to the Court of Admiralty.

I now transmit his answer to that part of my letter which regarded the effect of the blockade of Elsinore, (as it was interpreted by Sir James Saumarez,) on the passage of the Sound; from which it appears that it is not yet intended to close that passage.

No notice has been taken of the residue of my letter concerning the four American seamen taken from the Alert.

As I have transmitted you a copy of Lord Wellesley's reply to my application for the release of the Mary, from which it was to be inferred that she would be immediately released, I ought now to mention that, so far from being released, she is to be forthwith proceeded against as prize. These things require a large stock of patience.

I have the honor to be, &c.

WM. PINKNEY.

ROBT. SMITH, Esq. &c.

[Referred to and enclosed in the preceding.]

Lord Wellesley to Mr. Pinkney.

FOREIGN OFFICE, Sept. 26, 1810.

The Marquis Wellesley has the honor to acquaint Mr. Pinkney, in answer to that part of his letter of the 15th instant, relating to an alleged misconception of the Order in Council for the blockade of Elsinore, that it is the intention of His Majesty's Government that that blockade should be strictly confined to the port of Elsinore, and that it does not affect any vessels professedly bound up the Sound, unless it should appear from their papers that they are bound to Elsinore.

The Marquis Wellesley begs to renew to Mr. Pinkney the assurance of his high consideration.

WM. PINKNEY, Esq. &c.

Mr. Pinkney to Mr. Smith.

LONDON, Oct. 3, 1810.

SIR: Lord Wellesley's communication concerning the passage of the Sound was supposed, by a merchant here to whom I showed it, to be ambiguous, by reason of the expressions "bound up the Sound," &c.

The ambiguity has, however, been removed (if, indeed, there was any) by a note which I have just received from the Foreign Office in answer to one from me.

It says that "no vessel will be subject to the restrictions of the blockade of Elsinore but such as may be going to that port, in whatever direction they may be passing the Sound." It says further, that "the equivogue in the original communication was certainly not intentional." I have the honor to be, &c.

WM. PINKNEY.

Mr. Smith, Secretary of State, to Mr. Pinkney.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,

October 19, 1810.

SIR: Your despatch of the 24th of August, enclosing a newspaper statement of a letter from the Duke of Cadore to General Armstrong, notifying a revocation of the Berlin and Milan decrees, has been received. It ought not to be doubted that this step of the French Government will be followed by a repeal on the part of the British Government of its Orders in Council. And if a termination of the crisis between Great Britain and the United States be really intended, the repeal ought to include the system of paper blockades, which differ in name only from the retaliatory system comprised in the Orders in Council. From the complexion of the British prints, not to mention other considerations, the paper blockades may, however, not be abandoned. There is hence a prospect that the United States may be brought to issue with Great Britain on the legality of such blockades. In such case, as it cannot be expected that the United States, founded as they are in law and in right, can acquiesce in the validity of the British practice, it lies with the British Government to remove the difficulty. In addition to the considerations heretofore stated to you in former letters, you may bring to the view of the British Government the retrospective operation of those diplomatic notifications of blockades which consider a notice to the Minister as a notice to his Government, and to the merchants who are at a distance of three thousand miles. It will recur to your recollection that the present Ministry, in the debates of Parliament, in opposition to the authors of the orders of January, 1807, denied that they were warranted by the law of nations. The analogy between these orders and the blockade of May, 1806, in so far as both relate to a trade between enemy ports, furnishes an appeal to the consistency of those now in office, and an answer to the attempts by them to vindicate the legality of that blockade. It is remarkable, also, that this blockade is founded on "the new and extraordinary means resorted to by the enemy for the purpose of distressing the commerce of British subjects." What are those means? In what respect do they violate our neutral rights? Are they still in operation? It is believed that true answers to these questions will enforce the obligation of yielding to our demands on this subject. You may, also, refer the British Government to the characteristic definition of a blockaded port, as set forth in their treaty with Russia of June, 1801, the preamble of which declares that one of its objects was to settle "an invariable determination of their principles upon the right of neutrality."

Should the British Government unexpectedly resort to the pretext of an acquiescence, on the part of the United States, in their practice, it may be remarked that, prior to, as well as during, the present Administration, this Government has invariably protested against such pretensions; and, in addition to other instances heretofore communicated to you, I herewith transmit to you an extract of a letter to the Department of State of July 15, 1799, from Mr. King our Minister at London, and also such part of Mr. Marshall's letter to him of the 20th September, 1800, as relates to the subject of blockades. And it may, moreover, be urged, that the principle now contended for by the United States was maintained against others, as well as Great Britain, as appears from the accompanying copy of the letter to our Minister at Madrid in the year, 1801. To this principle the United States also adhered, when a belligerent, as in the case of the blockade of Tripoli, as will be seen by the annexed letters from the Navy Department. You will press on the justice, friendship, and policy of Great Britain such a course of proceeding as will obviate the dilemma resulting to the United States from a refusal to put an end to the paper blockades as well as the Orders in Council.

The necessity of revoking the blockade of Copenhagen, as notified to you in May, 1808, will not escape your attention. Its continuance may embarrass us with Denmark, if not with France. Your answer as to the Corfu blockade is approved; and should the answer to it render a reply necessary, the President directs you to remonstrate against such a blockade; availing yourself, as far as they may be applicable, of the ideas in the letter to Mr. Charles Pinckney of October, 1801, and particularly of the proof it affords of our early remonstrance against the principle of such blockades.

No communication having yet been made by General Armstrong of a letter to him from the Duke of Cadore, declaring that the Berlin and Milan decrees will cease to be in force from the 1st day of November next, I can at this time only inform you, that if the proceedings of the French Government, when officially received, should correspond with the printed letter of the Duke of Cadore, enclosed in your despatch, you will let the British Government understand that on the 1st day of November the President will issue his proclamation, conformably to the act of Congress, and that the non-intercourse law will consequently be revived against Great Britain. And if the British Government should not, with the early notice received of the repeal of the French decrees, have revoked all its orders which violate our neutral rights, it should not be overlooked that Congress, at their approaching session, may be induced not to wait for the expiration of the three months (which were allowed on the supposition that the first notice might pass through the United States) before they give effect to the renewal of the non-intercourse. This consideration ought to have its weight in dissuading the British Government from the policy, in every respect misjudged, of procrastinating the repeal of its illegal edicts.

If the British Government be sincerely disposed to come to a good understanding, and to cultivate a friendly intercourse with the United States, it cannot but be sensible of the necessity, in addition to a compliance with the act of Congress, of concluding, at this time, a general arrangement of the topics between the two countries; and, above all, such a one as will, upon equitable terms, effectually put a stop to the insufferable vexations to which our seamen have been, and yet are exposed, from the British practice of impressment; a practice which has so strong a bearing on our neutrality, and to which no nation can submit consistently with its independence. To this very interesting subject you will therefore recall the attention of the British Government, and you will accordingly consider yourself hereby authorized to discuss and adjust the same separately, conformably to the instructions in my letter to you of the 20th January last; on the condition, however, contained in that letter, namely, that the requisite atonement shall have been previously made in the case of the outrage on the Chesapeake. But as in this case every admissible advance has been exhausted on the part of the United States, it will be improper to renew the subject to the British Government, with which it must lie to come forward with the requisite satisfaction to the United States. You will, therefore, merely evince a disposition to meet in a conciliatory form any overtures that may be made on the part of the British Government.

The British Government, having so long omitted to fulfil the just expectations of the United States in relation to a successor to Mr. Jackson, notwithstanding the reiterated assurances to you of such an intention, has no claims to further indulgence. On the receipt of this letter, therefore, should the appointment of a Plenipotentiary successor not have been made and communicated to you, you will let your purpose be known of returning to the United States, unless, indeed, the British Government should have unequivocally manifested a disposition to revoke their Order in Council conformably to the act of Congress of May last, and our affairs with them should have accordingly taken so unfavorable a turn as to justify, in your judgment, a further suspension of it.

I have the honor to be, &c.

R. SMITH.

Extract of a letter from Mr. King, Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States at London, to Mr. Pickering, Secretary of State, dated

LONDON, July 15, 1799.

Seven or eight of our vessels, laden with valuable cargoes, have been lately captured, and are still detained for adjudication. These vessels were met in their voyage to and from the Dutch ports declared to be blockaded. Several notes* have passed between Lord Grenville and me upon this subject, with the view, on my part, of establishing a more limited and reasonable interpretation of the law of blockade than is attempted to be enforced by the English Government. Nearly one hundred Danish, Russian, and other neutral ships, have, within a few months, been in like manner intercepted, going to and returning from the United Provinces. Many of them, as well as some of ours, arrived in the Texel in the course of the last Winter, the severity of which obliged the English fleet to return to their ports, leaving a few frigates only to make short cruises off the Texel, as the season would allow.

My object has been to prove that, in this situation of the investing fleet, there can be no effective blockade, which, in my opinion, cannot be said to exist without a competent force stationed and present at or near the entrance of the blockaded port.

Extract of a letter from Mr. King to Lord Grenville, dated

DOWNING STREET,

LONDON, May 23, 1799.

It seems scarcely necessary to observe, that the presence of a competent force is essential to constitute a blockade; and, although it is usual for the belligerent to give notice to neutral nations when he institutes a blockade, it is not customary to give any notice of its discontinuance; and that, consequently, the presence of the blockading force is the natural criterion by which the neutral is enabled to ascertain the existence of the blockade, in like manner as the actual investment of a besieged place is the only evidence by which we decide whether the siege is continued or raised. A siege may be commenced, raised, recommenced, and raised again; but its existence at any precise time must always depend upon the fact of the presence of an investing army. This interpretation of the law of blockade is of peculiar importance to nations situated at a great distance from each other, and between whom a considerable length of time is necessary to send and receive information.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Marshall, Secretary of State, to Mr. King, dated

SEPTEMBER 20, 1800.

The right to confiscate vessels bound to a blockaded port has been unreasonably extended to cases not coming within the rule as heretofore adopted.

On principle, it might well be questioned whether this rule can be applied to a place not completely invested by land as well as by sea. If we examine the reasoning on which is founded the right to intercept and confiscate supplies designed for a blockaded town, it will be difficult to resist the conviction that its extension to towns invested by sea only is an unjustifiable encroachment on the rights of neutrals. But it is not of this departure from principle (a departure which has received some sanction from practice) that we mean to complain. It is, that ports, not effectually blockaded by a force capable of completely investing them, have yet been declared in a state of blockade, and vessels attempting to enter therein have been seized, and, on that account, confiscated.

This is a vexation proceeding directly from the Government, and which may be carried, if not resisted, to a very injurious extent. Our merchants have greatly complained of it, with respect to Cadiz and the ports of Holland.

If the effectiveness of the blockade be dispensed with, then every port of all the belligerent Powers may, at all times, be declared in that state, and the commerce of neutrals be thereby subjected to *See the note from Mr. King to Lord Grenville, immediately following.

Relations with Great Britain.

universal capture. But if this principle be strictly adhered to, the capacity to blockade will be limited by the naval force of the belligerent, and, of consequence, the mischief to neutral commerce cannot be very extensive. It is, therefore, of the last importance to neutrals, that this principle be maintained unimpaired.

I observe that you have pressed this reasoning on the British Minister; who replies, that an occasional absence of a fleet from a blockaded port ought not to change the state of the place.

Whatever force this observation may be entitled to where that occasional absence has been produced by accident, as a storm, which for a moment blows off the fleet and forces it from its station, which station it immediately resumes, I am persuaded that where a part of the fleet is applied, though only for a time, to other objects, or comes into port, the very principle requiring an effective blockade, which is, that the mischief can then only be co-extensive with the naval force of the belligerent, requires that, during such temporary absence, the commerce of neutrals to the place should be free.

[Referred to in the letter of the Secretary of State, of October 19, 1810.]

Extract of a letter from Mr. Madison to Mr. Charles Pinckney, dated

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
October 25, 1801.

The pretext for the seizure of our vessels seems at present to be, that Gibraltar has been proclaimed in a state of blockade, and that the vessels are bound to that port. Should the proceeding be avowed by the Spanish Government, and defended on that ground, you will be able to reply:

1. That the proclamation was made as far back as the 15th of February, 1800, and has not since been renewed; that it was immediately protested against by the American and other neutral Ministers at Madrid, and not warranted by the real state of Gibraltar; and that no violations of neutral commerce having followed the proclamation, it was reasonably concluded to have been rather a menace against the enemies of Spain than a measure to be carried into execution against her friends.

2. That the state of Gibraltar is not, and never can be, admitted by the United States to be that of a real blockade. In this doctrine they are supported by the law of nations, as laid down in the most approved commentators; by every treaty which has undertaken to define a blockade, particularly those of latest date* among the maritime nations of Europe; and by the sanction of Spain herself, as a party to the armed neutrality, in the year 1791. The spirit of articles fifteen and sixteen of the treaty between the United States and Spain may also be appealed to as favoring a liberal construction of the rights of the parties in such cases. In fact, the idea of an investment, a siege, or a blockade, as collected from the authorities referred to, necessarily results from the force of those terms; and, though it has been sometimes grossly violated or evaded by powerful nations in pursuit of favorite objects, it has invariably kept its place in the code of public law, and cannot be shown to have been expressly renounced in a single stipulation between particular nations.

3. That the situation of the naval force at Algeziras, in relation to Gibraltar, has not the shadow of likeness to a blockade, as truly and legally defined. This force can neither be said to invest, besiege, or blockade the garrison, nor to guard the entrance into the port. On the contrary, the gunboats infesting our commerce have their stations in another harbor, separated from that of Gibraltar by a considerable bay; and are so far from beleaguering their enemy at that place, and rendering the entrance into it dangerous to others, that they are, and ever since the proclamation of a blockade have been, for the most part, kept at a distance by a superior naval force, which makes it dangerous to themselves to approach the spot.

4. That the principle on which the blockade of Gibraltar is asserted is the more inadmissible, as it may be extended to every other place in passing to which vessels must sail within the view and reach of the armed boats belonging to Algeziras. If, because a neutral vessel bound to Gibraltar can be annoyed and put in danger by way-laying cruisers, which neither occupy the entrance into the harbor, nor dare approach it, and by reason of that danger is liable to capture, every part of the Mediterranean coasts and islands, to which neutral vessels must pass through the same danger, may with equal reason be proclaimed in a state of blockade, and the neutral vessels bound thereto made equally liable to capture; or, if the armed vessels from Algeziras alone should be insufficient to create this danger in passing into the Mediterranean, other Spanish vessels, co-operating from other stations, might produce the effect, and thereby not only blockade any particular port, or the ports of any particular nation, but blockade at once a whole sea, surrounded by many nations. Like blockades might be proclaimed by any particular nation, enabled by its naval superiority to distribute its ships at the mouth of the same, or any similar sea, or across channels or arms of the sea, so as to make it dangerous for the commerce of other nations to pass to its destination. These monstrous consequences condemn the principle from which they flow, and ought to unite against it every nation, Spain among the rest, which has an interest in the rights of the sea. Of this, Spain herself appears to have been sensible in the year 1780, when she yielded to Russia ample satisfaction for the seizures of her vessels, made under the pretext of a general blockade of the Mediterranean, and followed it with her accession to the definition of a blockade contained in the armed neutrality.

5. That the United States have the stronger ground for remonstrating against the annoyance of her vessels on their way to Gibraltar, inasmuch as, with very few exceptions, their object is not to trade there for the accommodation of the garrison, but merely to seek advice or convoy for their own accommodation in the ulterior objects of their voyage. In disturbing their course to Gibraltar, therefore, no real detriment results to the enemy of Spain, whilst a heavy one is committed on her friends. To this consideration it may be added, that the real object of a blockade is to subject the enemy to privations, which may co-operate with external force in compelling them to surrender—an object which cannot be alleged in a case where it is well known that Great Britain can and does, at all times, by her command of the sea, secure to the garrison at Gibraltar every supply which it wants.

* The late treaties between Russia and Sweden, and between Russia and Great Britain.

6. It is observable, that the blockade of Gibraltar is rested by the proclamation on two considerations: one, that it is necessary to prevent illicit traffic, by means of neutral vessels, between Spanish subjects and the garrison there; the other, that it is a just reprisal on Great Britain for the proceedings of her naval armaments against Cadiz and St. Lucar. The first can surely have no weight with neutrals, but on a supposition, never to be allowed, that the resort to Gibraltar, under actual circumstances, is an indulgence from Spain, not a right of their own; the other consideration, without examining the analogy between the cases referred to and that of Gibraltar, is equally without weight with the United States, against whom no right can accrue to Spain from its complaints against Great Britain, unless it could be shown that the United States were in an unlawful collusion with the latter—a charge which they well know that Spain is too just and too candid to insinuate. It cannot even be said that the United States have acquiesced in the depredations committed by Great Britain, under whatever pretexts, on their lawful commerce. Had this, indeed, been the case, the acquiescence ought to be regarded as a sacrifice made by prudence to a love of peace, of which all nations furnish occasional examples, and as involving a question between the United States and Great Britain, of which no other nation could take advantage against the former. But it may be truly affirmed, that no such acquiescence has taken place. The United States have sought redress for injuries from Great Britain, as well as from other nations. They have sought it by the means which appeared to themselves, the only rightful judges, to be best suited to their object; and it is equally certain that redress has in some measure been obtained, and that the pursuit of complete redress is by no means abandoned.

7. Were it admitted that the circumstances of Gibraltar, in February, 1800, the date of the Spanish proclamation, amounted to a real blockade, and that the proclamation was therefore obligatory on neutrals; and were it also admitted that the present circumstances of that place amount to a real blockade, (neither of which can be admitted,) still the conduct of the Algeiras cruisers is altogether illegal and unwarrantable. It is illegal and unwarrantable, because the force of the proclamation must have expired whenever the blockade was actually raised, as must have been unquestionably the case since the date of the proclamation; particularly and notoriously, when the port of Algeiras itself was lately entered and attacked by a British fleet; and because, on a renewal of the blockade, either a new proclamation ought to have issued, or the vessels making for Gibraltar ought to have been premonished of their danger, and permitted to change their course as they might think proper. Among the abuses committed under the pretext of war, none seem to have been carried to greater extravagance, or to threaten greater mischief to neutral commerce, than the attempts to substitute fictitious blockades by proclamation, for real blockades formed according to the law of nations; and, consequently, none against which it is more necessary for neutral nations to remonstrate effectually, before the innovations acquire maturity and authority, from repetitions on one side, and silent acquiescence on the other.

Mr. Smith, Secretary of the Navy, to Commodore Preble.

NAVY DEPARTMENT, Feb. 4, 1804.

SIR: Your letter of the 12th November, enclosing your circular notification of the blockade of the port of Tripoli, I have received.

Sensible, as you must be, that it is the interest, as well as the disposition, of the United States to maintain the rights of neutral nations, you will, I trust, cautiously avoid whatever may appear to you to be incompatible with those rights. It is, however, deemed necessary, and I am charged by the President to state to you what, in his opinion, characterizes a blockade. I have, therefore, to inform you, that the trade of a neutral, in articles not contraband, cannot be rightfully obstructed to any port not actually blockaded by a force so disposed before it, as to create an evident danger of entering it. Whenever, therefore, you shall have thus formed a blockade of the port of Tripoli, you will have a right to prevent any vessel from entering it, and to capture for adjudication any vessel that shall attempt to enter the same, with a knowledge of the existence of the blockade. You will, however, not take as prize any vessel attempting to enter the port of Tripoli without such knowledge; but in every case of an attempt to enter, without a previous knowledge of the existence of the blockade, you will give the commanding officer of such vessel notice of such blockade, and forewarn him from entering; and if, after such a notification, such vessel should again attempt to enter the same port, you will be justifiable in sending her into port for adjudication. You will, sir, hence perceive, that you are to consider your circular communication to the neutral Powers, not as an evidence that every person attempting to enter has previous knowledge of the blockade, but merely as a friendly notification to them of the blockade, in order that they might make the necessary arrangements for the discontinuance of all commerce with such blockaded port. I have the honor to be, &c.

ROBERT SMITH.

Extracts—Mr. Smith to Mr. Pinkney.

NOVEMBER 2, 1810.

With the duplicate of my letter to you of the 19th ultimo, I now send to you a copy of the President's proclamation, founded on the repeal of the Berlin and Milan decrees. Enclosed you will also receive a copy of my letter to General Armstrong of this day, which will afford you a view of the reservations and understanding under which this proclamation has been issued.

To the copy of the proclamation herewith transmitted, in relation to West Florida, and to my letter to General Armstrong, touching the same, I refer you for information, as to the views of this Government in taking possession of that country, and as to the considerations which had constrained the President, at this juncture, to resort to this measure.

This despatch will be delivered to you by one of the officers of the United States' frigate Essex, who will have orders to return to his ship as soon as he shall have received such letters as you may deem it necessary to transmit to this Department

Mr. Pinkney to Mr. Smith.

LONDON, November 5, 1810.

SIR: I have presented a second note, of which a copy is enclosed, to Lord Wellesley, on the subject of the Orders in Council, under an impression that the state of the King's health (for which I beg to refer you to the paper herewith transmitted) did not render it improper, and that, if it was not improper on that account, it was indispensable on every other.

The day had gone by when the Berlin and Milan decrees were to cease to operate, according to the communication made by the Government of France to the American Minister at Paris, and published in the official journal of that Government; and yet no step whatever had been taken, or apparently thought of, towards the revocation of the British orders. I had received no explanation of the reasons of this backwardness, and no such assurance, looking to the future, as could justify an opinion that it would not continue. Lord Wellesley's letter of the 31st of August, which I had left unanswered till after the 1st of November, that I might stand on the strongest possible ground when I did answer it, made no profession of being a present measure, and (though, from obvious motives, I have not so represented it in my note to him of the 3d instant,) was vague and equivocal as a prospective pledge. It defined nothing, and was so far from warranting any specific expectation, that it seemed rather to take away the very little of precision which belonged to former declarations on the same point. It was highly important to the commerce of the United States, that this ambiguity should be cleared away, with all practicable expedition, and, if it could not be removed, that no presumption should be afforded of a disposition, on the part of the United States, to acquiesce in it. My note to Lord Wellesley was written and delivered upon those inducements.

In the King's actual situation, the Orders in Council can scarcely be formally recalled, even if the Cabinet are so inclined; but it does not follow that something may not be done (though I have no reason to think that anything will be done) which may be productive of immediate advantage, and, at any rate, prepare the way for the desired repeal.

I have the honor to be, &c.

WILLIAM PINKNEY.

P. S. This letter is written in great haste, that I may send it to Liverpool by this evening's mail.

[Referred to in Mr. Pinkney's despatch of Nov. 5.]

Mr Pinkney to Lord Wellesley.

GREAT CUMBERLAND PLACE,

November 3, 1810.

MY LORD: In my note of the 25th August, I had the honor to state to your Lordship that I had received, from the Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States at Paris, a letter, dated the 6th of that month, in which he informed me that he had received from the French Government a written and official notice that it had revoked the decrees of Berlin and Milan, and that, after the 1st of November, those decrees would cease to have any effect; and I expressed my confidence that the revocation of the British Orders in Council of January and November, 1807, and April, 1809, and of all other orders dependent upon, analogous to, or in execution of them, would follow of course.

Your Lordship's reply, of the 31st of August, to that note, repeated a declaration of the British Minister in America, made, as it appears, to the Government of the United States in February, 1808, of "His Majesty's earnest desire to see the commerce of the world restored to that freedom which is necessary for its prosperity, and his readiness to abandon the system which had been forced upon him, whenever the enemy should retract the principles which had rendered it necessary;" and added an official assurance that "whenever the repeal of the French decrees, should have actually taken effect, and the commerce of the neutral nations should have been restored to the condition in which it stood previously to the promulgation of those decrees, His Majesty would feel the highest satisfaction in relinquishing a system which the conduct of the enemy compelled him to adopt."

Without departing in any degree from my first opinion, that the United States had a right to expect, upon every principle of justice, that the prospective revocation of the French decrees would be immediately followed by at least a like revocation of the orders of England, I must remind your Lordship, that the day has now passed when the repeal of the Berlin and Milan edicts, as communicated to your Lordship in the note above-mentioned, and published to the whole world by the Government of France in the Moniteur of the 9th of September, was, by the terms of it to take effect. That it has taken effect cannot be doubted, and it can as little be questioned that, according to the repeated pledges given by the British Government on this point, (to say nothing of various other powerful considerations,) the prompt relinquishment of the system to which your Lordship's reply to my note of the 25th of August alludes, is indispensable.

I need scarcely mention how important it is to the trade of the United States, that the Government of Great Britain should lose no time in disclosing, with frankness and precision, its intentions on this head. Intelligence of the French repeal has reached America, and commercial expeditions have, doubtless, been founded upon it. It will have been taken for granted that the British obstructions to those expeditions, having thus lost the support, which, however, insufficient in itself, was the only one that could ever be claimed for them, have been withdrawn; and that the seas are once more restored to the dominion of law and justice.

I persuade myself that this confidence will be substantially justified by the event, and that to the speedy recall of such Orders in Council as were subsequent in date to the decrees of France, will be added the annulment of the antecedent order, to which my late letter respecting blockades particularly relates. But if, notwithstanding the circumstances which invite to such a course, the British Government shall have determined not to remove those obstructions with all practicable promptitude, I trust that my Government will be apprized, with as little delay as possible, of a determination so unexpected, and of such vital concern to its rights and interests; and that the reasons upon which that determination may have been formed will not be withheld from it.

I have the honor to be, &c.

WILLIAM PINKNEY.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Pinkney to Mr. Smith.

LONDON, November 7, 1810.

I enclose a duplicate of my letter of the 5th instant, in which was transmitted a copy of my note to Lord Wellesley of the 3d, concerning the Orders in Council.

I have little more to say, in addition to what is contained in that letter, than that it is my intention, in case Lord Wellesley gives me an unfavorable answer to it, to enter at large into the whole subject in my rejoinder; and, in case he delays improperly his reply, to take as strong notice of that impropriety as I can.

As soon as the King recovers, I mean to mention again the subject of a Minister Plenipotentiary to the United States, (which Lord Wellesley, notwithstanding his written and verbal pledges, seems to have quite forgotten,) and if satisfactory assurances are not renewed and acted upon, to announce my determination to return to America, and to leave a Chargé d'Affaires; in the choice of whom, however, I shall have considerable difficulty, unless you should furnish me in season with the expected Secretary of Legation. I presume that, in taking this course, I shall fulfil the wishes of the President, and I can assure you, with great truth, that I shall consult by it my own inclinations.

Mr Pinkney to Mr. Smith.

LONDON, November 14, 1810.

SIR: I have finally determined not to mention again to Lord Wellesley (as I had thoughts of doing) the subject of a Plenipotentiary successor to Mr. Jackson. I think, upon reflection, (and shall act accordingly,) that I ought, after what has passed, to leave him, without further inquiry or notice on my part, to shape his course upon it; and that, if an appointment should not be made as soon as the King's health (which would seem to be improving) will permit, I ought at once to send in an official note, announcing my resolution to return to America, and to leave some suitable person as a Chargé d'Affaires.

My letter of the 23d of July informed you that, after Lord Wellesley's written assurance of the 22d of that month, (which was in conformity, as far as it went, with his assurances in conversation,) "that it was his intention immediately to recommend the appointment of an Envoy Extraordinary and a Minister Plenipotentiary from the King to the United States," I did not think myself authorized to take the step which the instructions contained in your letter of the 23d of May, in certain circumstances, prescribed.

My opinion was, that whether the prospect, which then existed, of bringing to a conclusion the affair of the Chesapeake, were taken into the account or not, it was my obvious duty to remain at my post, most irksome as it was every day becoming, until it should incontestably appear that those assurances were not to be relied upon.

Before a sufficient time had elapsed to warrant so harsh a conclusion, I received from Lord Wellesley, on the 28th of August, a further casual intimation (reported to you in my letter of the 29th of the same month) that his recommendation of a Minister would, as he believed, be made in the course of that week or the next.

In the meantime the repeal, by the Government of France, of the Berlin and Milan decrees had produced a posture of affairs which, whatever might be Lord Wellesley's forgetfulness of his own declarations, or the inattention of his Government to what he might advise in consequence of them, rendered my stay in England for two or three months longer indispensable.

In fine, the effect of that consideration had not ceased, when the illness of the King made it impossible that I should depart.

Upon the King's recovery, I shall have every motive for bringing this matter to an issue, and none for the least hesitation or reserve upon it. Several months will have been allowed for the performance of an act which might have been completed in as many weeks.

I shall have done everything in my power on the subjects connected with the revocation of the French edicts. And the British Government will be in a situation to admit of such proceedings on its own part, and on mine, as the occasion will require.

From Lord Wellesley's intimation to me on the 28th of August, (mentioned above,) it is perfectly clear that he had not then executed the intention so positively announced in his note of the 22d of July. Five or six weeks had passed, and that which he had both said and written he meant to do immediately, he was not yet sure that he meant to do within another fortnight. The presumption seems, nevertheless, to be quite unnatural, that Lord Wellesley continued, up to the commencement of the King's malady, to be negligent of a pledge, which he chose to rest not merely on his official but his personal character—a pledge, of which he knew I could neither question the sufficiency nor doubt the sincerity, and by which, as he also knew, my conduct on an extremely delicate point of duty was wholly determined.

On the other hand, if Lord Wellesley has been mindful of his pledge, and has recommended a Minister in compliance with it, how has it happened (how can it have happened) that this recommendation has not been followed by an appointment?

In the midst of all this doubt, which Lord Wellesley might dissipate if he pleased, by an explanation apparently necessary for his own sake, there is, I believe, no uncertainty as to the course which, in the actual state of my instructions, (or on the score of general propriety,) I ought to pursue; especially as I must infer from your silence since the arrival of Mr. Morier at Washington, (if I had no other reason for that inference,) that no such communication was made, either by or through that gentleman to you, as ought, in the judgment of the President, to have any influence upon my conduct on this occasion.

I have the honor to be, &c.

WILLIAM PINKNEY.

P. S. November 15. I hear nothing from Lord Wellesley, and not much from any other quarter, concerning the Orders in Council. I have not lately sought any interview with him on that or any other occasion. It is impossible for me to look back upon the past, and to place much value upon conferences.

I am particularly anxious to get from Lord Wellesley, in case the British Government persists in declining to repeal the orders, a distinct statement in writing of the motives of its conduct.

Thus far I have taken for granted the manifest and incontrovertible justice of our expectations; believing that there could, in the first instance, be no sufficient inducement for anticipating difficulties and objections in so plain a case; that, if any existed, they ought to be, and would be, avowed; and that, when avowed, I could meet them with more advantage than while they were only conjectured. Should, however, a studious ambiguity continue to be preserved on a subject, which now touches more nearly than ever (in my opinion vitally) the character and rights of our country, I shall very soon think myself called upon to suppose for this Government reasons which it will not declare, and to examine them with fulness and freedom in a letter to Lord Wellesley. It is unnecessary, in the mean time, to trouble you with the view which that letter will contain. I have not lately received anything from France which enables me to put the repeal of the French decrees in a stronger light than could otherwise be done. Mr. Russell has written me two letters; the first dated the 26th of September, and received on the 3d of October; the other dated the 10th of October, and received the 13th of November. This last enclosed a letter to me from General Armstrong of the 29th of September. He had written me a short note from Paris, dated the 13th of September, (but not received till long afterwards,) which enclosed a copy of the French Minister's letter to him of the 12th of that month, already received from Mr. Russell in his letter of the 26th of September.

Such use as could be made of these different communications I have made. Of course it could be very little. A Moniteur of the 9th of September, containing the Duke of Cadore's letter of the 5th of August to General Armstrong, (which I got through a private channel,) is much more likely to be of service (if anything can be of service) here, where that journal is considered as equivalent to the London Gazette; and I have accordingly referred to it in my note to Lord Wellesley of the 3d instant.

Mr. Smith to Mr. Pinkney.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,

November 15, 1810.

SIR: From a review of the conduct of the British Government in relation to a Plenipotentiary successor to Mr. Jackson, as presented in your several communications, including even those brought by the Hornet, at which date and on which inviting occasion the subject does not appear to have been within the attention of the Government, the President thinks it improper that the United States should continue to be represented at London by a Minister Plenipotentiary. In case, therefore, no appointment of a successor to Mr. Jackson of that grade should have taken place at the receipt of this letter, you will consider your functions as suspended, and you will accordingly take your leave of absence, charging a fit person with the affairs of the Legation.

Considering the season at which this instruction may have its effect, and the possibility of a satisfactory change in the posture of our relations with Great Britain, the time of your return to the United States is left to your discretion and convenience. I have the honor, &c.

Relations with Great Britain.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Pinkney to the Secretary of State.

LONDON, Nov. 19, 1810.

My third letter to Lord Wellesley concerning the French decrees and the British Orders in Council, will be presented much sooner than I had at first intended. I shall, I think, present it in a few days. Upon the other subject of my letter to you of the 14th instant, I need not add anything to what is there said upon it.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Pinkney to the Secretary of State.

LONDON, Nov. 21, 1810.

An American vessel (the Fox) has, within a few days past, been brought into Plymouth as prize to a King's ship (the Amethyst) for an imputed attempt to go to Cherbourg, in France, in violation of the unrepealed British orders. I have requested that the case may be represented in proper form to me, and I mean to use it as the best ground for my intended letter to Lord Wellesley.

Extract of a letter from William Pinkney, Esq., Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States in London, to the Secretary of State.

LONDON, Dec. 14, 1810.

On the 4th instant I received from Lord Wellesley a note, of which a copy (marked No. 1) is enclosed, respecting the repeal of the French decrees. The conference to which it invited me took place on the 5th; and in the course of it I explained to him at considerable length my view of that subject, and of the points immediately connected with it. Lord Wellesley heard me in his usual manner, but confined himself to such general remarks and professions as I need not repeat to you. He proposed that our conference should be renewed on the 7th, and engaged in the mean time to report to his colleagues what I had said, and at our next interview to make me acquainted with the result.

He introduced, of his own accord, the two subjects of a Minister Plenipotentiary and the Chesapeake.

On the first, he professed to entertain the same disposition and intention as heretofore; and declared that the delay which had taken place arose altogether from some obstacles of a personal nature to obtaining the services of the person whom he particularly wished to send to America; that he hoped these obstacles would soon be removed; that he had another person in view if it should be otherwise; that he had not supposed that delay could be considered as of any moment by my Government, after the assurance contained in his note to me in July last; that these temporary inequalities were common, and, when not meant to be offensive, were never held to be so, &c.

On the second, he informed me that he had not sent me a paper which he had prepared upon it, because he thought it would be well that the new Minister should carry out the adjustment, and, consequently, that it should be postponed until he was appointed. He repeated that we should have no difficulties upon it. I give you these verbal explanations as I received them.

On the 6th instant I received from Lord Wellesley another note, of which a copy (marked No. 2) is enclosed, requesting me to recapitulate in writing my verbal communication of the 5th. With this request I complied, as you will perceive by the enclosed copy (marked No. 3) of my letter to him of the 10th.

I could have no motive for going to him on the 7th, and had therefore no interview with him on that day.

As the case of the Fox was rather pressing, and I was not sure that I could prepare my letter on the general subject in season, I sent in a separate note upon it on the 8th. A copy of that note (marked No. 4) is enclosed. I have no reply to it, and did not expect one; but I understand that the cause has been, and will be, postponed.

A newspaper copy of the President's proclamation of the 2d of November arrived in London on the 11th instant, and produced a good deal of sensation. It gave me pleasure to find my letter to Lord Wellesley so supported. I hope soon to receive an official communication of it.

What will be done here on the affair of the Orders in Council, &c., I cannot yet say. The general impression seems to be that they will do nothing. My letter to Lord Wellesley was written (as my verbal communication had been given) under a persuasion that they will do nothing if they can help it. A very firm tone ought now to be assumed with this Government.

No. 1.

FOREIGN OFFICE, Dec. 4, 1810.

SIR: After the most accurate inquiry, I have not been able to obtain any authentic intelligence of the actual repeal of the French decrees, to which your notes of the 25th of August and 3d of November refer, or of the restoration of the commerce of neutral nations to the condition in which it stood previously to the promulgation of those decrees.

If you should be in possession of any such information, I should be happy to receive it from you, and for that purpose I request to have the honor of a conference with you at this office tomorrow, at two o'clock.

I have the honor to be, &c.

WELLESLEY.

FOREIGN OFFICE, Dec. 6, 1810.

SIR: The importance of the verbal communication which I had the honor of receiving from you yesterday induces me to request that you will have the goodness to commit the substance of it to writing at the earliest time which may suit your convenience.

As soon as I shall have received such a written statement from you, I shall be anxious to return an official reply in the same form.

Under these circumstances, it may, perhaps, be unnecessary that you should take the trouble of calling at this office to-morrow.

If, however, you should be desirous of seeing me, I shall have the honor of receiving you between two and three o'clock.

I have the honor to be, &c.

WM. PINKNEY, Esq.

No. 4.

Mr. Pinkney to Lord Wellesley.

GREAT CUMBERLAND PLACE.

December 8, 1810.

MY LORD: I have the honor to represent to you that an American vessel, (the Fox), proceeding with an American cargo, from a port of the United States to Cherbourg, in France, in the confidence that the repeal of the decrees of Berlin and Milan had, in conformity with repeated pledges and the obvious demands of justice, been followed by the revocation of the British Orders in Council, has been captured since the first of last month, by an English frigate, for an alleged breach of these orders, and brought into Plymouth, and since proceeded against in the High Court of Admiralty as prize of war.

It is my duty to require that this vessel and her cargo may be restored as speedily as possible to their rightful owner, that she may be left at full liberty to resume the lawful voyage in which she was engaged, and that effectual measures may be adopted, with as little delay as circumstances will permit, for the prevention of similar interruptions in future.

I understand that the captors, in this case, are likely to be urgent for condemnation; and that the Orders in Council will, if unrepealed, be considered by the court as imposing upon it a necessity to pronounce such a sentence. I am further informed that the cause may be heard, if the captors press it, on, or very soon after, Tuesday next. I trust, however, that the necessary steps will be taken by the British Government for preventing the signal injustice and the many embarrassments that could not fail to result from such an adjudication.

I have the honor to be, &c.

WM. PINKNEY.

No. 3.

Copy of a letter from Mr. Pinkney to Lord Wellesley.

GREAT CUMBERLAND PLACE,

December 10, 1810.

MY LORD: In compliance with the request contained in your note of the 6th instant, I proceed to recapitulate in this letter (with some variations, however,) the statements and remarks which I had the honor to make in our conference of the 5th, respecting the revocation of the French decrees, as connected with a change of system here, on the subject of neutral rights.

Your Lordship need not be told that I should be happy to offer, at a much earlier moment, every explanation in my power on matters of such high concern to the rights and commerce of my country, and the future character of its foreign relations, if I had been made to understand that explanation was desired.

My written communications of August and November were concise, but they were not intended to be insufficient. They furnished evidence which I thought conclusive, and abstained from labored commentary, because I deemed it superfluous. I had taken up an opinion, which I abandoned reluctantly and late, that the British Government would be eager to follow the example of France in recalling, as it had professed to do in promulgating, that extraordinary system of maritime annoyance which, in 1807, presented to neutral trade in almost all its directions the hopeless alternative of inactivity or confiscation; which considered it as a subject to be regulated, like the trade of the United Kingdom, by the statutes of the British Parliament; and undertook to bend and fashion it by every variety of expedient to all the purposes and even the caprices of Great Britain. I had no idea that the remnant of that system, productive of no conceivable advantage to England, and deservedly odious, for its theory and destructive effects to others, could survive the public declaration of France that the edicts of Berlin and Milan were revoked. Instructed at length, by your Lordship's continued silence, and alarmed for the property of my fellow-citizens, now more than ever exposed, by an erroneous confidence, to the ruinous operation of the British orders, I was preparing to support my general representations by detailed remonstrance, when I received the honor of your note of the 4th instant. In the conference which ensued, I troubled your Lordship with a verbal communication, of which the following is nearly the substance:

The doubts which appear to stand in the way of the recall of the British Orders in Council, (under which denomination I include certain orders of blockade of a kindred principle and spirit,) must refer to the manner, or the terms, or the practical effect of the alleged repeal of the decrees of France.

That the manner of the proceeding is satisfactory to the British Government cannot be questioned; since it is precisely that in which its own numerous orders for establishing, modifying, or removing blockades, and other maritime obstructions, are usually proclaimed to neutral States and merchants.

The French repeal was officially notified on the 5th of August, to the Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States at Paris, by the French Minister for Foreign Affairs, as I had the honor to inform your Lordship in my letter of the 25th of the same month, which not only gave the import, but (as the enclosed copy will show) adopted the words of General Armstrong's statement to me of the tenor and effect of that notice.

On the 9th of August the notification to General

Relations with Great Britain.

Armstrong was published in the Moniteur, the official journal of the French Government, as the act of that Government; and thus became a formal declaration, and a public pledge to all who had an interest in the matter of it.

It would be a waste of time to particularize the numerous instances of analogous practice in England, by which this course is countenanced; but a recent example happens to be before me, and may therefore be mentioned. The partial recall, or modification of the English blockade of the ports and places of Spain from Gijon to the French territory, (itself known to my Government only through a circular notification to me, recited afterwards in the London Gazette,) was declared to the American and other Governments in exactly the same mode.

I think it demonstrable that the terms in which the French revocation was announced are just as free from well-founded objection as the manner.

Your Lordship's view of them is entirely unknown to me; but I am not ignorant that there are those in this country who, professing to have examined them with care, and having certainly examined them with jealousy, maintain that the revocation, on the 1st of November, was made to depend, by the obvious meaning of those terms, upon a condition precedent which has not been fulfilled, namely, the revocation by Great Britain of her Orders in Council, including such blockading orders as France complains of as illegal.

If this were even admitted to be so, I am yet to learn upon what grounds of justice the British Government could decline to meet, by a similar act on its part, an advance, thus made to it by its adversary in the face of the world, towards a co-operation in the great work of restoring the liberty of the ocean; so far, at least, as respects the Orders in Council of 1807 and 1809, and such blockades as resemble them. It is not necessary, however, to take this view of the question; for the French revocation turns on no condition precedent, is absolute, precise, and unequivocal.

What construction of the document which declares that revocation might be made by determined suspicion and distrust, I have no wish and am not bound to inquire. Such interpreters would not be satisfied by any form of words, and would be likely to draw the same conclusion from perfect explicitness and studied obscurity. It is enough for me that the fair, and natural, and necessary import of the paper affords no color for the interpretation I am about to examine.

The French declaration "that the decrees of Berlin and Milan are revoked, and that, from the 1st of November they will cease to have any effect," is precision itself. But they are followed by these words; "Bien entendu qu'en conséquence de cette déclaration les Anglais révoqueront leurs arrêts du conseil, et renonceront aux nouveaux principes de blocus qu'ils ont voulu établir, ou bien que les Etats Unis, conformément à l'acte que vous venez communiquer, feront respecter leurs droits par les Anglais."

If these words state any condition they state two; the first depending upon Great Britain, the last, upon the United States; and as they are put in the disjunctive, it would be extravagant to hold that the non-performance of one of them is equivalent to the non-performance of both. I shall take for granted, therefore, that the argument against my construction of the Duke of Cadore's letter must be moulded into a new form. It must deal with two conditions instead of one, and considering them equally as conditions precedent to be performed (disjunctively) before the day limited for the operative commencement of the French repeal, must maintain that, if neither of them should be performed before that day, the decrees were not to be revoked; and, consequently, that, as neither of them has been so performed, the decrees are still in force.

If this hypothesis of previous conditions, thus reduced to the only shape it can assume, be proved to be unsound, my construction is at once established; since it is only upon that hypothesis that any doubt can be raised, against the exact and perspicuous assurance that the decrees were actually repealed, and that the repeal would become effectual on the 1st of November. This hypothesis is proved to be unsound, by the following consideration:

It has clearly no foundation in the phraseology of the paper, which does not contain a syllable to put any condition before the repeal. The repeal is represented as a step already taken, to have effect on a day specified. Certain consequences are, indeed, declared to be expected from this proceeding; but no day is given, either expressly or by implication, within which they are to happen. It is not said, "bien entendu que les Anglais auront révoqué," &c. but "que les Anglais révoqueront," &c. indefinitely as to time.

The notion of conditions precedent is, therefore, to say the least of it, perfectly gratuitous. But it is also absurd. It drives us to the conclusion, that a palpable and notorious impossibility was intended to be prescribed as a condition, in a paper which they, who think it was meant to deceive, must admit was meant to be plausible.

It was a palpable and notorious impossibility, that the United States should, before the 1st of November, execute any condition, no matter what the nature of it, the performance of which was to follow the ascertained failure of a condition to be executed by Great Britain at any time before the same 1st of November. That the act expected from the United States was to be consequent upon the failure of the other, is apparent. It is also apparent, that upon any interpretation which would make the act of Great Britain a condition precedent to the French repeal, and consequently, precedent to the 1st November, (when the repeal was, if ever, to take effect,) that condition could not be said to have failed before the whole period, from the 5th of August to the 1st of November, had elapsed. But if Great Britain had the whole time within which to elect the course which she would pursue, what opportunity would be left to the United States, (equally bound, upon this idea of conditions precedent, to act their part within the same period,) to become acquainted with that election, and to decide upon and take their own course in consequence; to say nothing of the transmission of such intelligence of it to Europe, as would be indispensable to the efficacy of the conditional revocation?

This general view would alone be sufficient to discredit the arbitrary construction under consideration. But it will be more completely exposed by an explanation of the nature of the act, which the latter professes to expect from the United States, in case Great Britain should omit to revoke. This act is the revival of the non-intercourse law against England, France remaining exempt from it, as well as from the provisions of the subsequent law, commonly called the non-intercourse act. Now, if it is too plain, upon the face of the last mentioned law (to which the letter expressly refers) to escape the most negligent and unskilful observer, that this revival could not, by any industry or chance, be accomplished before the time fixed for the cessation of the French decrees, or even for a considerable time afterwards, it certainly cannot be allowable to assume, that the revival was required by the letter (whatever was the object of the writer or his Government) to precede the session. And if this was not required, it is incontrovertible that the cessation would, by the terms of the letter, take place on the appointed day, whether any of the events disjunctively specified had intervened or not.

The first step towards a revival of the non-intercourse against England would be the proclamation of the President that France had so revoked or modified her edicts, as that they ceased to violate the neutral commerce of the United States. But the letter of Monsieur Champagny left the decrees as it found them up to the first of November, and, consequently, up to that day it could not, for anything contained in that letter, be said that the rights of American commerce were no longer infringed by them. A prospective proclamation, that they would cease to violate those rights, might, perhaps, be issued; but it could scarcely have any substantial operation, either in favor of France or to the prejudice of England, until the epoch to which it looked had arrived.

Let it be admitted, however, that all physical and legal obstacles to the issuing, before the 1st of November, of a proclamation, to take effect immediately, were out of the way; how would such a proceeding fulfil, of itself, the expectation that the United States would, before the 1st of November, "cause their rights to be respected by the English," in the mode pointed out in the letter, namely, by the enforcement of the non-intercourse law? The proclamation would work no direct or immediate consequence against England. Three months from its date must pass away before the non-intercourse law could revive against her; and when it did so, the revival would not be the effect of the proclamation, but of the continued adherence of England to her obnoxious system. Thus, even if a proclamation, effectual from its date, had been issued by the President on the day when the French declaration of repeal came to the hands of the American Minister at Paris, the intercourse between the United States and Great Britain would, on the 1st of November, have remained in the same condition in which it was found in August. As all this was well understood by the Government of France, the conclusion is, that its Minister, professing too to have the American law before him, and to expect only what was conformable with that law, did not intend to require the revival of the non-intercourse against England as a condition to be performed before the 1st of November.

It is worthy of remark, as introductory to another view of this subject, that even they who conclude that the repeal of the French decrees has failed, are not backward to ascribe to the French declaration a purpose utterly inconsistent with that conclusion. They suppose the purpose to have been to affect the existing relations between America and England, by the only means which the declaration states, the act of non-intercourse. And it is certain that unless England should abandon particular parts of her system, this was the result avowedly in view, and meant to be accomplished. But there could be no hope of such a result without a previous effectual relinquishment of the French decrees. A case could not otherwise be made to exist (as the Duke of Cadore was aware) for such an operation of the American law. To put the law before the revocation of the edicts was impossible. With the law in his hand, it would have been miraculous ignorance not to know that it was the exact reverse of this which his paper must propose. He would derive this knowledge, not from that particular law only, but from the whole tenor and spirit of American proceedings, in that painful and anomalous dilemma, in which Great Britain and France, agreeing in nothing else, had recently combined to place the maritime interests of America. He would collect from those proceedings that, while those conflicting Powers continued to rival each other in their aggressions upon neutral rights, the Government of the United States would oppose itself impartially to both. The French declaration, then, had either no meaning at all, or it meant to announce to General Armstrong a positive revocation of the French edicts.

I should only fatigue your Lordship by pursuing further a point so plain and simple. I will, therefore, merely add to what I have already said on this branch of the subject, that the strong and unqualified communication from General Armstrong to me, mentioned in the commencement of this letter, and corroborated by subsequent communications (one of which I now lay before you) may, perhaps, without any great effort of courtesy, be allowed to contain that "authentic intelligence" which your Lordship is in search of. He could scarcely have been free from doubt, if the occasion was calculated to suggest it; and if he had really doubted, would hardly have spoken to me with the confidence of conviction.

It only remains to speak of the practical effect of the French repeal. And here your Lordship must suffer me to remind you that the orders of England in 1807, did not wait for the practical effect of the Berlin decree, nor linger until the obscurity, in which the meaning of that decree was supposed to be involved, should be cleared away by time or explanation. They came promptly after the decree itself, while it was not only ambiguous but inoperative, and raised upon an idle prohibition, and yet a more idle declaration, which France had not attempted to enforce, and was notoriously incapable of enforcing, a vast scheme of oppression upon the seas, more destructive of all the acknowledged rights of peaceful States than history can parallel. This retaliation, as it was called, was so rapid, that it was felt before the injury was said to have provoked it; and yet, that injury, such as it was, was preceded by the practical assertion, on the part of Great Britain, of new and alarming principles of public law, in the notification of the blockade of May, 1806, and in the judicial decisions of the year before. To uphold the retaliatory orders, everything was presumed with a surprising facility. Not only was an impotent, unexecuted, and equivocal menace presumed to be an active scourge of the commerce of neutral nations, but the acquiescence of those nations was presumed, against the plainest evidence of facts.

The alacrity with which all this was done can never be remembered without regret and astonishment; but our regret and astonishment must increase, if, after four years have been given to the pernicious innovation which these presumptions were to introduce and support, something like the same alacrity should not be displayed in seizing an honorable opportunity of discarding it forever.

It is not unnatural to imagine that it will be discarded with pleasure, when it is considered, that, having never been effectual as an instrument of hostility, it cannot now lay claim to those other recommendations for which it may have heretofore been prized. The Orders in Council (of November) have passed through some important changes; but they have been steady, as long as it was possible, to the purpose which first impressed them with a character not to be mistaken.

In their original plan, they comprehended not only France and such allied or dependent Powers as had adopted the edict of Berlin, but such other nations as had merely excluded from their ports the commercial flag of England. This prodigious expansion of the system was far beyond any intelligible standard of retaliation; but it soon appeared that neutrals might be permitted to traffic, under certain restrictions, with all these different nations, provided they would submit with a dependence truly colonial, to carry on their trade through British ports, and to pay such duties as the British Government should think fit to impose, and such charges as British agents and other British subjects might be content to make.

The United States abstained from this traffic, in which they could not embark without dishonor; and in 1809 the system shrunk to narrower dimensions, and took the appearance of an absolute prohibition of all commercial intercourse with France, Holland, and the kingdom of Italy.

The prohibition was absolute in appearance, but not in fact. It had lost something of former exuberance, but nothing of former pliancy, and, in the event, was seen to yield to the demands of one trade while it prevented every other.

Controlled and relaxed and managed by licenses, it did not, after a brief exhibition of Imperial sternness, affect to "distress the enemy" by the occlusion of his ports, when the commerce of England could advantageously find its way to them. At length, however, this convenience seems to be enjoyed no longer, and the Orders in Council may apparently be now considered (if, indeed, they ought not always to have been considered) as affecting England with a loss as heavy as that which they inflict on those whose rights they violate. In such circumstances, if it be too much to except the credulity of 1807, it may yet be hoped, that the evidence of the practical effect of the French repeal need not be very strong to be satisfactory. It is, however, as strong as the nature of such a case will admit, as a few observations will show.

On such an occasion it is no paradox to say, that the want of evidence is itself evidence. That certain decrees are not in force, is proved by the absence of such facts as would appear if they were in force. Every motive which can be conjectured to have led to the repeal of the edicts invites to the full execution of that repeal, and no motive can be imagined for a different course. These considerations are alone conclusive.

But further, it is known that American vessels bound confessedly to England, have, before the 1st of November, been visited by French privateers, and suffered to pass, upon the foundation of the prospective repeal of the decree of Berlin, and the proximity of the day when it would become an actual one.

If there are not even stronger facts to show that the decree of Milan is also withdrawn, your Lordship can be at no loss for the reason. It cannot be proved that an American vessel is practically held by France; nor to be denationalized by British visitation, because your cruisers visit only to capture, and compel the vessel visited to terminate her voyage, not in France, but in England. You will not ask for the issue of an experiment which yourselves intercept, nor complain that you have not received evidence, which is not obtained, because you have rendered it impossible. The vessel which formed the subject of my note of the 8th instant, and another more recently seized as prize, would, if they had been suffered, as they ought, to resume their voyages, after having been stopped and examined by English cruisers, have furnished on that point unanswerable proof; and I have reason to know that precise offers have been made to the British Government to put to a practical test the disposition of France in this respect, and that those offers have been refused. Your cruisers, however, have not been able to visit all American vessels bound to France and it is understood that such as have arrived have been received with friendship.

I cannot quit this last question without entering my protest against the pretension of the British Government to postpone the justice which it owes to my Government and country, for this tardy investigation of consequences. I am not able to comprehend upon what the pretension rests, nor to what limits the investigation can be subjected. If it were even admitted that France was more emphatically bound to repeal her almost nominal decrees than Great Britain to repeal substantial orders, (which will not be admitted,) what more can reasonably be required by the latter than has been done by the former? The decrees are officially declared by the Government of France to be repealed. They were ineffectual as a material prejudice to England before the declaration, and must be ineffectual since. There is, therefore, nothing of substance for this dilatory inquiry, which, if once begun, may be protracted without end, or at least till the hour for just and prudent decision has passed. But, if there were room to apprehend that the repealed decrees might have some operation in case the Orders in Council were withdrawn, still, as there is no sudden and formidable peril to which Great Britain could be exposed by that operation, there can be no reason for declining to act at once upon the declaration of France, and to leave it to the future to try its sincerity, if that sincerity be suspected.

I have thus disclosed to your Lordship, with that frankness which the times demand, my view of a subject deeply interesting to our respective countries. The part which Great Britain may act on this occasion cannot fail to have important and lasting consequences, and I can only wish that they may be good.

By giving up her Orders in Council and the blockades, to which my letter of the 21st of September relates, she has nothing to lose in character or strength. By adhering to them, she will not only be unjust to others, but unjust to herself.

I have the honor to be, &c.

WM. PINKNEY.

The MARQUIS WELLESLEY.

Mr. Pinkney to the Secretary of State.

LONDON, December 22, 1810.

SIR: I received on the 20th instant, from Liverpool, your letter of the 19th of October, the only one yet received of a date subsequent to the 17th of July.

My letter of the 14th of November will show that I had myself resolved upon the course of proceeding which the last paragraph of your letter indicates. I now wait only for the restoration of the capacity of the Government.

I presume that my note to Lord Wellesley of the 21st of September will be considered as having anticipated such parts of your letter as relate to blockades. No answer of any sort has been given to that note, but I will not fail to take the first occasion to reinforce it, by enlarging on the considerations to which you allude. In my opinion the subject cannot be too much pressed, nor the importance of it exaggerated. If such blockades are to continue, we shall have got rid of the orders of 1807 and 1809 in vain.

You will perceive that, in my note above-mentioned, I undertook to mention the blockade of the whole island of Zealand, as one of those paper blockades to which the United States objected; that, in my note of the 25th of August, that blockade was comprehended under the general description of such orders as were "analogous to" the Orders in Council of 1807 and 1809; and that in my late note (of the 10th instant,) I have urged the revocation of all the blockades to which my note of the 21st of September related.

I had no instructions to warrant me in representing any other blockade than that of May, 1806, as indispensable in the view of our laws concerning commercial intercourse with Great Britain and France. I have endeavored, however, so to shape my different notes to Lord Wellesley, as that, when taken together, they may be considered to embrace the whole of the paper blockades, for every purpose, or only for particular purposes, as future instructions or convenience might require.

Upon the subject of impressments, I need not say anything, as the affair of the Chesapeake has not been adjusted. For other matters, I refer you to the newspapers.

I have the honor to be, &c.

WM. PINKNEY.

M. Champagny stated that the order given, in relation to our ships, &c., in Spain, was a regular consequence of the system declared in his letter of the 22d August last, and which had been promulgated throughout the United States. "It is obvious," he added, "that His Majesty cannot permit to his allies a commerce which he denies to himself. This would be at once to defeat his system and oppress his subjects, by demanding from them great and useless sacrifices; for, if the system be not strictly observed everywhere, it cannot anywhere produce the effects expected from it. Still," he said, "the property is only sequestered, and becomes a subject of the present negotiation." As our remonstrances have been sufficiently frequent and free, as this was a meeting merely of conciliation, and as the closing remark of the Minister indicated rather the policy of looking forward to our rights than backward on our wrongs, I thought it most prudent to suppress the obvious answers which might have been given to his observations, and which, under other circumstances, should not have been omitted. I accordingly contented myself with expressing a hope that our future intercourse should be a competition only of good offices.

In conformity to the suggestions contained in your letter of the 1st of December, 1809, I demanded whether, if Great Britain revoked her blockades of a date anterior to the decree, commonly called the Berlin decree, His Majesty the Emperor would consent to revoke the said decree? To which the Minister answered, that "the only condition, required for the revocation by His Majesty of the decree of Berlin, will be a previous revocation by the British Government of her blockade of France, or part of France, (such as that from the Elbe to Brest,) of a date anterior to that of the aforesaid decree; and that, if the British Government would then recall the Orders in Council which had occasioned the decree of Milan, that decrees should also be annulled." Our interview closed here, and we have had no meeting, either accidental or by rendezvous, since.

Extract of a letter from the same to the same.

PARIS, February 17, 1810.

The note from M. Champagny, a copy of which is enclosed, was received yesterday.

This goes by the way of England, and may not be much later in reaching you than my despatch of the 28th ultimo, which took the same road.

[Enclosed in the preceding despatch.]

PARIS, February 14, 1810.

The undersigned has rendered an account to His Majesty, the Emperor and King, of the conversation he has had with Mr. Armstrong, Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States of America. His Majesty authorizes him to give the following answer.

His Majesty should consider his decrees of Berlin and Milan as violating the principles of eternal justice, if they were not the compelled consequence of the British Orders in Council, and, above all, of those of November, 1807. When England has proclaimed her sovereignty universal, by the pretension of subjecting the universe to a tax on navigation, and by extending the jurisdiction of her Parliament over the industry of the world, His Majesty thought that it was the duty of all independent nations to defend their sovereignty, and to declare as denationalized (denationalisés) those vessels which should range themselves under the domination of England, by recognising the sovereignty which she arrogated over them.

His Majesty distinguishes the search (la visite) from the recognition (reconnaissance) of the vessel. The recognition has no other end than to ascertain the reality of the flag. The search is an anterior inquest held, although the verity of the flag be ascertained, and of which the result is either the impressment of individuals, or the confiscation of merchandise, or the application of arbitrary laws or regulations.

His Majesty could place no reliance on the proceedings of the United States, who, having no ground of complaint against France, comprised her in their acts of exclusion, and, since the month of May, have forbidden the entrance of their ports to French vessels, under the penalty of confiscation. As soon as His Majesty was informed of this measure, he considered himself bound to order reprisals on American vessels, not only in his territory, but likewise in the countries which are under his influence. In the ports of Holland, of Spain, of Italy, and of Naples, American vessels have been seized, because the Americans have seized French vessels. The Americans cannot hesitate as to the part which they are to take; they ought either to tear to pieces the act of their independence, and to become again, as before the Revolution, the subjects of England, or to take such measures as that their commerce and industry should not be tarified (tarifés) by the English, which renders them more dependent than Jamaica, which, at least, has its Assembly of Representatives and its privileges. Men, without just political views, (sans politique), without honor, without energy, may allege that payment of the tribute, imposed by England, may be submitted to because it is light; but why will they not perceive that the English will no sooner have obtained the admission of the principle, than they will raise the tariff in such way, that the burden, at first light, becoming insupportable, it will then be necessary to fight for interest, after having refused to fight for honor?

The undersigned avows, with frankness, that France has everything to gain from receiving well the Americans in her ports. Her commercial relations with neutrals are advantageous to her. She is, in no way, jealous of their prosperity. Great, powerful, and rich, she is satisfied when, by her own commerce or by that of neutrals, her exportations give to her agriculture and her fabrics the proper development.

It is now thirty years since the United States of America founded, in the bosom of the new world, an independent country at the price of the blood of so many immortal men who perished on the field of battle, to throw off the leaden yoke of the English monarch. These generous men were far from supposing, when they thus sacrificed their blood for the independence of America, that there would so soon be a question whether there should be imposed upon it a yoke more heavy than that which they had thrown off, by subjecting its industry to a tariff of British legislation, and to the Orders in Council of 1807.

If, then, the Minister of America can enter into an engagement that the American vessels will not submit to the Orders in Council of England of November, 1807, nor to any decree of blockade, unless this blockade should be real, the undersigned is authorized to conclude every species of convention tending to renew the Treaty of Commerce with America, and in which all the measures proper to consolidate the commerce and the prosperity of the Americans shall be provided for.

The undersigned has considered it his duty to answer the verbal overtures of the American Minister by a written note, that the President of the United States may the better know the friendly intentions of France towards the United States, and her favorable dispositions to American commerce.

The undersigned prays Mr. Armstrong to accept the assurances of his high consideration.

CHAMPAGNY, Duc de Cadore.

Mr. Armstrong to Mr. Smith.

PARIS, February 18, 1810.

SIR: I wrote a few lines to you yesterday, announcing the receipt and transmission of a copy of the Duke of Cadore's note to me of the 14th instant.

After much serious reflection, I have thought it best to forbear all notice, at present, of the errors, as well of fact as of argument, which may be found in the introductory part of this note, to take the Minister at his word, to enter at once upon the proposed negotiation, and, for this purpose, to offer to him a project for renewing the convention of 1800.

This mode will have the advantage of trying the sincerity of the overtures made by him, and, perhaps, of drawing from him the precise terms on which his master will accommodate. If these be such as we ought to accept, we shall have a treaty in which neither our rights nor our wrongs will be forgotten; if otherwise, there will be enough both of time and occasion to do justice to their policy and our own by a free examination of each.

With great respect, &c.

JOHN ARMSTRONG.

Hon. ROBERT SMITH, &c.

Extract—General Armstrong to Mr. Smith.

PARIS, March 10, 1810.

I have at length received a verbal message in answer to my note of the 21st ultimo. It was from the Minister of Foreign Relations, and in the following words: "His Majesty has decided to sell the American property seized in Spain but the money arising therefrom shall remain in depot." This message has given occasion to a letter from me [annexed] in a temper somewhat different from that of the 18th February.

[Referred to in Mr. Armstrong's despatch of March, 10, 1810.]

General Armstrong to the Duke of Cadore.

PARIS, March 10, 1810.

SIR: I had yesterday the honor of receiving a verbal message from your Excellency, stating that His Majesty had decided that the American property seized in the ports of Spain should be sold, but that the money arising therefrom should remain in depot.

On receiving this information, two questions suggested themselves:

1st. Whether this decision was, or was not, extended to ships as well as to cargoes? and,

2d. Whether the money arising from the sales which might be made under it, would, or would not, be subject to the issue of the pending negotiation?

The gentleman charged with the delivery of your message not having been instructed to answer these questions, it becomes my duty to present them to your Excellency, and to request a solution of them. Nor is it less a duty on my part to examine the ground on which His Majesty has been pleased to take this decision, which I understand to be that of reprisal, suggested for the first time in the note you did me the honor to write to me on the 14th ultimo. In the fourth paragraph of this note, it is said, that His Majesty could not have calculated on the measures taken by the United States, who, having no grounds of complaint against France, have comprised her in their acts of exclusion, and since the month of May last, have prohibited the entry into their ports of French vessels, by subjecting them to confiscation." It is true that the United States have, since the 20th of May last, forbidden the entry of French vessels into their harbors. And it is also true, that the penalty of confiscation attaches to the violation of this law. But in what respect does this offend France? Will she refuse to use the right of regulating commerce within our own ports? Or will she deny that the law in question is a regulation merely municipal? Examine it both as to object and means. What does it more than forbid American ships from going into the ports of France, and French ships from coming into those of the United States? And why this prohibition? To avoid injury and insult; to escape that lawlessness, which is declared to be a "forced consequence of the decrees of the British Council." If, then, its object be purely defensive, what are its means? Simply a law, previously and generally promulgated, operating solely within the territory of the United States, and punishing alike the infractors of it, whether citizens of the said States, or others. And what is this but the exercise of a right, common to all nations, of excluding, at their will, foreign commerce, and of enforcing that exclusion? Can this be deemed a wrong to France? Can this be regarded as a legitimate cause of reprisal on the part of a Power who makes it the first duty of nations to defend their sovereignty, and who even denationalize the ships of those who will not subscribe to the opinion?

But it has been said that "the United States have nothing to complain of against France." Was the capture and condemnation of a ship driven on the shores of France by stress of weather and the perils of the sea, nothing? Was the seizure and sequestration of many cargoes brought to France in ships violating no law and admitted to regular entry at the imperial custom-houses, nothing? Was the violation of our maritime rights, consecrated as they have been by the solemn forms of a public treaty, nothing? In a word, was it nothing that our ships were burnt on the high seas without other offence than that of belonging to the United States, or other apology than was to be found in the enhanced safety of the perpetrators? Surely, if it be the duty of the United States to resent theoretical usurpations of the British orders of November, 1807, it cannot be less their duty to complain of the daily and practical outrages on the part of France. It is indeed true, that were the people of the United States destitute of policy, of honor, and of energy, (as has been insinuated,) they might have adopted a system of discrimination between the two great belligerents. They might have drawn imaginary lines between the first and second aggressor. They might have resented in the one a conduct to which they tamely submitted in the other, and, in this way, have patched up a compromise between honor and interest, equally mean and disgraceful. But such was not the course they pursued: and it is, perhaps, a necessary consequence of the justice of their measures, that they are at this day an independent nation. But I will not press this part of my subject. It would be affrontful to your Excellency, (knowing, as you do, that there are not less than one hundred American ships within His Majesty's possession, or that of his allies,) to multiply proofs that the United States have grounds of complaint against France.

My attention is necessarily called to another part of the same paragraph, which immediately follows the quotation already made. "As soon," says your Excellency, "as His Majesty was informed of this measure, (the non-intercourse law,) it became his duty to retaliate upon the American vessels, not only within his own territories, but also within the countries under his influence. In the ports of Holland, Spain, Italy, and Naples, the American vessels have been seized, because the Americans had seized French vessels."

These remarks divide themselves into the following heads:

1st. The right of His Majesty to seize and confiscate American vessels within his own territories.

2d. The right to do so within the territories of his allies? and

3d. The reason of that right, viz: because Americans had seized French vessels.

The first of these subjects has been already examined, and the second must be decided like the first, since His Majesty's rights within the limits of his ally cannot be greater than within his own. If, then, it has been shown that the non-intercourse law was merely defensive in its object, that it was but intended to guard against that state of violence which unhappily prevailed, that it was restricted in its operation to the territory of the United States, and that it was duly promulgated there and in Europe before execution, it will be almost unnecessary to repeat, that a law of such description cannot authorize a measure of reprisal, equally sudden and silent in its enactment and application, founded on no previous wrong, productive of no previous complaint, and operating beyond the limits of His Majesty's territories, and within those of sovereigns who had even invited the commerce of the United States to their ports.

It is, therefore, the third subject only, the reason of the right, which remains to be examined; and with regard to it I may observe, that, if the alleged fact which forms this reason be unfounded, the reason itself fails, and the right with it. In this view of the business, I may be permitted to inquire, when and where any seizure of a French vessel has taken place under the non-intercourse law? and at the same time to express my firm persuasion that no such seizure has been made—a persuasion founded alike on the silence of the Government and of the journals of the country, and still more on the positive declaration of several well-informed and respectable persons, who have left America as late as the 26th December last. My conclusion, therefore, is, that no French vessel having violated the law, no seizure of such vessel has occurred, and that the report which has reached Paris is probably founded on a circumstance altogether unconnected with the non-intercourse law or its operation.

Though far from wishing to prolong this letter, I cannot close it without remarking the great and sudden change wrought in His Majesty's sentiments with regard to the defensive system adopted by the United States.

The law which is now believed to furnish the ground for reprisal, was communicated to His Majesty in June or July last, and certainly did not then excite any suspicion of feeling unfriendly to the American Government. Far from this, its communication was immediately followed by overtures of accommodation, which, though productive of no positive arrangement, did not make matters worse than they found them.

On the 22d of August last I was honored with a full exposition of the views and principles that had governed, and which should continue to govern, His Majesty's policy in relation to the United States, and in this we do not find the slightest trace of complaint against the provisions of the law in question.

At a period later than the 22d of August, an

Relations with France.

American ship, destined to a port of Spain, was captured by a French privateer. An appeal was made to His Majesty's Minister of War, who, having submitted the case, received orders to liberate all American vessels destined to Spanish ports which had not violated the imperial decrees. Another American ship, at a point of time still later than the capture of the preceding, was brought into the port of Bayonne; but, having violated no law of His Majesty, was acquitted by his Council of Prizes; and lastly, in the long conversation I had the honor of holding with your Excellency, on the 25th of January, no idea of reprisal was maintained by you, nor suspected by me; but, on the contrary, in speaking of the seizure of American property in Spain, you expressly declared that it was not a confiscation.

Can proofs be more conclusive; that from the first promulgation of the law down to the 25th of January last, nothing in the nature of reprisal was contemplated by His Majesty?

What circumstance may have since occurred to produce a change in his opinion, I know not; but the confidence I feel in the open and loyal policy of His Majesty altogether excludes the idea that the rule was merely found for the occasion, and made to justify seizures not otherwise justifiable.

I pray your Excellency to accept, &c.

Extracts—Mr. Armstrong to Mr. Smith.

PARIS, April 4, 1810.

After seven weeks' detention in England, the John Adams has at length got back to France. She arrived in the roads of Havre on the 28th ultimo.

I informed M. Champagny, first, that Mr. Pinkney had not been able to send by this conveyance the result of his application to the British Government concerning the blockades of France prior to the Berlin decree; but that he hoped to be able to send it in a few days by another conveyance; and, secondly, that if he (M. Champagny) had anything to communicate which would have the effect of changing the present relations of the two countries, and which he wished to be early known to the Government of the United States, he would do well to let me know it within twenty-four hours, as the messenger would leave Paris within that time. To this message I received from him the following answer: "That for some days past nothing in the nature of business, and unconnected with the marriage of the Emperor, could be transacted; and that for some days to come the same cause of delay would continue to operate; that my letters were still before the Emperor, and that he would seize the first moment to get some decision in relation to them." Thus, you see, everything is yet in air.

General Armstrong to Mr. Smith.

PARIS, April 16, 1810.

SIR: The John Adams being yet detained, I am able to inform you that on the 11th instant the Emperor directed the sale of all the American vessels taken in the ports of Spain, and that the money arising therefrom should be placed in his caisse privé. He has also refused to give up the Hero, and has ordered that the case be brought before the Council of Prizes, where condemnation necessarily awaits it. I send a copy of a note upon which this last order was taken, and another relating to our business in Naples; and am, with very high consideration, your most obedient and very humble servant.

JOHN ARMSTRONG.

Hon. Mr. SMITH, &c.

Copy of Mr. Pinkney's letter to General Armstrong, dated

LONDON, March 23, 1810.

DEAR SIR: Although I have detained the corvette much longer than I wished, I am not able to send you the result of my application to this Government concerning the British blockades of France prior to the Berlin decree. I expect to receive it in a very few days, and will immediately forward it to you by Mr. Lee, by the way of Morlaix, for it seems that the French Government will not permit a messenger to land at any other port.

I have the honor to be, &c.

WILLIAM PINKNEY.

His Ex'cy General ARMSTRONG.

Extracts—Mr. Armstrong to Mr. Smith.

PARIS, May 3, 1810.

Mr. Lee arrived here some days ago with two letters from Mr. Pinkney, copies of which, with my answers, are enclosed.

I need scarcely observe how impossible it is for me to make this or any similar statement the groundwork of a new demand for a repeal of the Berlin decree.

[Referred to in Mr. Armstrong's letter of May 3, 1810.]

Mr. Pinkney to Mr. Armstrong.

LONDON, March 27, 1810.

SIR: I had the honor to receive, by Mr. Powell, your letter of the 25th of January. In pursuance of my instructions, I have addressed a letter to the Marquis Wellesley, His Britannic Majesty's principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, inquiring whether any, and, if any, what blockades of France instituted by Great Britain during the present war before the 1st of January, 1807, are understood by this Government to be in force? Lord Wellesley's reply to that letter not being so explicit as I wished, I have written a second letter requesting explanation. In his Lordship's answer to my second letter, I am informed that the blockade notified by Great Britain in May, 1806, (from the Elbe to Brest,) has never been formally withdrawn, but that the restrictions which that blockade established are comprehended under the more extensive restrictions of the Order in Council of the 7th of January, 1807, and that no other blockade of the ports of France was instituted by

Relations with France.

Great Britain between the 16th of May, 1806, and the 7th of January, 1807, excepting the blockade of Venice, instituted on the 27th of July, 1806, which is still in force.

I have the honor to be, &c.

WILLIAM PINKNEY.

His Ex'cy General ARMSTRONG, &c.

Mr. Pinkney to General Armstrong.

LONDON, April 6, 1810.

Sir: I do not know whether the statement contained in my letter of the 27th of last month will enable you to obtain a recall of the Berlin decree. Certainly the inference from that statement is, that the blockade of 1806 is virtually at an end, being merged and comprehended in an Order in Council issued after the date of the edict of Berlin. I am, however, about to try to obtain a formal revocation of that blockade, (and of that of Venice,) or at least a precise declaration that they are not in force. As it will not be possible to obtain either the one or the other very soon, (if, indeed, they can be obtained at all,) I will not detain Mr. Lee, but I will send you another messenger, (Mr. Craig, of Philadelphia,) in the course of three or four weeks, with the result of my endeavors. In the meantime, such use can be made of my communication of the 7th ultimo as you may deem advisable.

I have the honor to be, &c.

[Referred to in Mr. Armstrong's despatch, May 3, 1810.]

Extract of a letter from General Armstrong to Mr. Pinkney, dated

PARIS, May 2, 1810.

I have received your three letters of the 3d and 27th of March, and 6th of April. Accept my thanks for your friendly attention with regard to the passport, and express to Lord Wellesley the sense I have of his Lordship's politeness, and the pleasure it would give me to make this acknowledgment in person. The doubt with which you begin your letter of the 6th instant is well founded. The explanation you have received is not such as will enable me to demand the performance of the Emperor's promise (communicated to you in my letter of the 25th of January last,) since it (the explanation) not only admits that the British order of blockade of May, 1806, is not formally withdrawn, but that that of the 27th of July, of the same year, is still in force. An argument in the face of these admissions, and founded merely on the operation of an order of ulterior date, and more extensive restriction, must not be hazarded, as it would be not merely useless, but productive of mischief.

Extract—Mr. Armstrong to Mr. Smith.

PARIS, May 24, 1810.

Some circumstances have occurred since the date of my despatch by Mr. Ronaldson, which, from their importance, make a speedy conveyance necessary. These I shall detail as briefly as possible.

1st. On the 14th instant, was published here in the official and other journals, a decree of the Emperor, dated at Rambouillet, on the 23d of March last, directing the seizure and sale of all American vessels which had entered the ports of the Empire, or of its dependencies, since the 20th of May last, &c.

2d. Four commisssoners have been sent to Amsterdam, with orders to take possession of the American property to be found there agreeably to the tenth article of the late treaty between France and Holland; and

3d. Several of our ships and cargoes, with regard to which compromises have been made under the sanction of the Council of Prizes, have been seized again, to satisfy the provisions of the new decree.

[Referred to in Mr. Armstrong's despatch of May 24.]

Translation of a decree issued by the Emperor of the French, at Rambouillet, March 23, 1810.

NAPOLEON, &c.

Considering that the Government of the United States, by an act dated 1st March, 1809, which forbids the entrance of the ports, harbors, and rivers of the said States to all French vessels, orders, 1st. That after the 20th of May following, vessels under the French flag, which shall arrive in the United States, shall be seized and confiscated, as well as their cargoes; 2d. That after the same epoch, no merchandise or produce, the growth or manufacture of France or her colonies, can be imported into the said United States from any port or place whatsoever, under the penalty of seizure, confiscation, and a fine of three times the value of the merchandise; 3d. That American vessels cannot go to any port of France, of her colonies, or dependencies: We have decreed, and do decree, what follows:

ART. 1st. All vessels navigating under the flag of the United States, or possessed in whole or in part, by any citizen or subject of that Power, which, counting from the 20th of May, 1809, have entered or shall enter into the ports of our Empire, of our colonies, or of the countries occupied by our arms, shall be seized, and the product of the sales shall be deposited in the surplus fund (caisse d'amortissement.)

There shall be excepted from this regulation the vessels which shall be charged with despatches, or with commissions of the Government of the said States, and who shall not have either cargoes or merchandise on board.

Our Grand Judge, Minister of Justice, and our Minister of Finance, are charged with the execution of our present decree.

NAPOLEON.

The Secretary of State to General Armstrong.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, June 5, 1810.

Sir: Your letters of the 17th, 18th, and 21st of February, and 10th, 15th, 21st, and 24th of March, with their several enclosures, were received on the 21st of May.

As the "John Adams" is daily expected, and as your further communications by her will better enable me to adapt to the actual state of our affairs with the French Government the observations proper to be made in relation to their seizure of our property, and to the letter of the Duke of Cadore of the 14th of February, it is by the President deemed expedient not to make, at this time, any such animadversions. I cannot, however, forbear informing you that a high indignation is felt by the President, as well as by the public, at this act of violence on our property, and at the outrage, both in the language and in the matter of the letter of the Duke of Cadore, so justly portrayed in your note to him of the 10th of March.

The particular object of this letter is to add to my despatches of the 4th and 22d of May another chance of hastening into your hands a copy of the act of Congress of the last session, concerning the commercial intercourse between the United States and Great Britain and France.

In the fourth section of this act, you will perceive a new modification of the authority given to the President. If there be sincerity in the language held at different times by the French Government, and especially in the late overture, to proceed to amicable and just arrangements in case of our refusal to submit to the British Orders in Council, no pretext can be found for longer declining to put an end to the decrees of which the United States have so justly complained. By putting in force, agreeably to the terms of this statute, the non intercourse against Great Britain, the very species of resistance would be made which France has been constantly representing as most efficacious. It may be added, that the form in which the law now presents the overture is as well calculated as the overture itself to gain a favorable attention, inasmuch as it may be regarded by the belligerent first accepting it as a promise to itself, and a threat only to its adversary.

If, however, the arrangement contemplated by the law should be acceptable to the French Government, you will understand it to be the purpose of the President not to proceed in giving it effect, in case the late seizure of the property of the citizens of the United States has been followed by an absolute confiscation, and restoration be finally refused. The only ground short of a preliminary restoration of the property, on which the contemplated arrangement can be made, will be an understanding that the confiscation is reversible, and that it will become immediately the subject of discussion, with a reasonable prospect of justice to our injured citizens.

I have the honor to be, &c.

R. SMITH.

General JOHN ARMSTRONG, &c.

Mr. Smith, Secretary of State, to Gen. Armstrong.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, July 2, 1810.

SIR: The enclosed is a copy of a letter of instruction to Mr. Pinkney, bearing the same date with this letter. You will thence perceive, that if the answer to the British Government to the representation and requisition which our Minister at London may make should be of a satisfactory nature, it will be transmitted to you without delay.

In that case, you will make a proper use of it for obtaining a repeal of the Berlin decree, and you will proceed, concurrently with Mr. Pinkney, in bringing about successive removals by the two Governments of all their predatory edicts.

I avail myself of this occasion to state to you, that it is deemed of great importance that our Ministers at foreign Courts, and especially at Paris and London, should be kept, the one by the other, informed of the state of our affairs at each.

I have the honor to be, &c.

R. SMITH.

General JOHN ARMSTRONG, &c.

Mr. Smith, Secretary of State, to Gen. Armstrong.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, July 5, 1810.

SIR: The arrival of the John Adams brought your letters of the 1st, 4th, 7th, and 16th April.

From that of the 16th April, it appears that the seizures of the American property lately made had been followed up by its actual sale, and that the proceeds had been deposited in the Emperor's caisse privé. You have presented in such just colors the enormity of this outrage, that I have only to signify to you that the President entirely approves the step that has been taken by you, and that he does not doubt that it will be followed by you, or the person who may succeed you, with such further interpositions as may be deemed advisable. He instructs you particularly to make the French Government sensible of the deep impression made here by so signal an aggression on the principles of justice and good faith, and to demand every reparation of which the case is susceptible. If it be not the purpose of the French Government to remove every idea of friendly adjustment with the United States, it would seem impossible but that a reconsideration of this violent proceeding must lead to a redress of it, as a preliminary to a general accommodation of the differences between the two countries.

At the date of the last communication from Mr. Pinkney, he had not obtained from the British Government an acceptance of the condition on which the French Government was willing to concur in putting an end to all the edicts of both against our neutral commerce. If he should afterward have succeeded, you will, of course, on receiving information of the fact, immediately claim from the French Government the fulfillment of its promise; and by transmitting the result to Mr. Pinkney, you will co-operate with him in completing the removal of all the illegal obstructions to our commerce.

Among the documents now sent is another copy of the act of Congress repealing the non-intercourse law, but authorizing a renewal of it against Great Britain in case France shall repeal her edicts, and Great Britain refuse to follow the example, and vice versa. You have been already informed that the President is ready to exercise the power vested in him for such a purpose, as soon as the occasion shall arise. Should the other experiment, in the hands of Mr. Pinkney, have failed, you will make the act of Congress, and the disposition of the President, the subject of a formal communication to the French Government; and it is not easy to conceive any ground, even specious, on which the overture, specified in the act, can be declined.

If the non-intercourse law, in any of its modifications, was objectionable to the Emperor of the French, that law no longer exists.

If he be ready, as has been declared in the letter of the Duke of Cadore of February 14th, to do justice to the United States in the case of a pledge on their part not to submit to the British edicts, the opportunity for making good the declaration is now afforded. Instead of submission, the President is ready, by renewing the non-intercourse against Great Britain to oppose to her Orders in Council a measure, which is of a character that ought to satisfy any reasonable expectation.

If it should be necessary for you to meet the question, whether the non-intercourse will be renewed against Great Britain in case she should not comprehend in the repeal of her edicts her blockades, which are not consistent with the law of nations, you may, should it be found necessary, let it be understood that a repeal of the illegal blockades, of a date prior to the Berlin decree, namely, that of May, 1806, will be included in the condition required of Great Britain; that particular blockade having been avowed to be comprehended in, and of course identified with, the Orders in Council. With respect to blockades, of a subsequent date or not, against France, you will press the reasonableness of leaving them, together with future blockades, not warranted by public law, to be proceeded against by the United States in the manner they may choose to adopt.

As has been heretofore stated to you, a satisfactory provision for restoring the property lately surprised and seized, by the order or at the instance of the French Government, must be combined with a repeal of the French edicts, with a view to a non-intercourse with Great Britain; such a provision being an indispensable evidence of the just purpose of France toward the United States. And you will, moreover, be careful, in arranging such a provision for that particular case of spoiliations, not to weaken the ground on which a redress of others may be justly pursued.

If the act of Congress, which has legalized a free trade with both the belligerents, without guarding against British interruptions of it with France, while France cannot materially interrupt it with Great Britain, be complained of, as leaving the trade on the worst possible footing for France, and on the best possible one for Great Britain, the French Government may be reminded of the other feature of the act, which puts it in their own power to obtain either an interruption of our trade with Great Britain, or a recall of her interruption of it with France.

Among the considerations which belong to this subject, it may be remarked, that it might have been reasonably expected by the United States that a repeal of the French decrees would have resulted from the British Order in Council of April, 1809. This order expressly revoked the preceding orders of November, 1807, heretofore urged by France in justification of her decrees, and was not only different in its extent and in its details, but was essentially different in its policy.

The policy of the orders of 1807 was, by cutting off all commercial supplies, to retort on her enemies the distress which the French decree was intended to inflict on Great Britain.

The policy of the order of April, 1809, if not avowedly, was most certainly to prevent such supplies, by shutting out those only which might flow from neutral sources, in order thereby to favor a surreptitious monopoly to British traders. In order to counteract this policy, it was the manifest interest of France to have favored the rival and cheaper supplies through neutrals; instead of which, she has co-operated with the monopolizing views of Great Britain, by rigorous exclusion of neutrals from her ports. She has, in fact, reversed the operation, originally professed by her decree. Instead of annoying her enemy at the expense of a friend, she annoys a friend for the benefit of her enemy.

If the French Government should accede to the overture contained in the act of Congress, by repealing or so modifying its decrees as that they will cease to violate our neutral rights, you will, if necessary, transmit the repeal, properly authenticated, to Mr. Pinkney, by a special messenger, and you will hasten and insure the receipt of it here, by engaging a vessel, if no equivalent conveyance should offer, to bring it directly from France, and by sending several copies to Mr. Pinkney, to be forwarded from British ports.

I have the honor to be, &c.

R. SMITH.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, July 17, 1810.

SIR: You will herewith receive duplicates of my letters to you of the 20th June, and 2d and 5th of July.

This despatch you will receive from Lieutenant Miller of the Navy, who is to proceed from New York in the sloop of war the Hornet. This public vessel has been ordered to England, and to France, not only for the purpose of transmitting despatches to you and to our Minister in London, but for the further purpose of affording you, as well as him, a safe opportunity of conveying to this Department, before the next meeting of Congress, full information of the ultimate policy, in relation to the United States, of the Governments of England and France. And, with a view to insure her return to the United States in due season, her commanding officer has received orders not to remain in any port of Europe after the 1st day of October next. With respect, therefore, to the time you will detain Mr. Miller in Paris, you will be influenced by the information which you may receive from him as to the orders he may have from the commanding officer of the Hornet.

Relations with France.

I have the honor to be, &c.

R. SMITH.

General JOHN ARMSTRONG, &c.

Extracts—Mr. Armstrong to Mr. Smith.

PARIS, August 5, 1810.

I had this morning the honor of receiving the enclosed note from the Duke of Cadore, informing me that the Imperial decrees of Berlin and Milan are revoked. I shall communicate this fact as promptly as possible to Mr. Pinkney.

I shall obtain a specific revocation of the decree of the 23d of March last; but it ought to be known to you that this decree has had no operation since my first unofficial communication of the law of the 1st of May.

[Referred to in Mr. Armstrong's letter of August 5.]

The Duke of Cadore to General Armstrong.

PARIS, August 5, 1810.

SIR: I have laid before His Majesty, the Emperor and King, the act of Congress of the 1st of May, taken from the Gazette of the United States, which you have sent to me.

His Majesty could have wished that this act, and all the other acts of the Government of the United States, which interest France, had always been officially made known to him. In general, he has only had a knowledge of them indirectly, and after a long interval of time. There have resulted from this delay serious inconveniences, which would not have existed if these acts had been promptly and officially communicated.

The Emperor had applauded the general embargo laid by the United States on all their vessels, because that measure, if it has been prejudicial to France, had in it at least nothing offensive to her honor. It has caused her to lose her colonies of Martinique, Guadeloupe, and Cayenne; the Emperor has not complained of it. He has made this sacrifice to the principle which had determined the Americans to lay the embargo, inspiring them with the noble resolution of interdicting to themselves the ocean, rather than to submit to the laws of those who wished to make themselves the tyrants (les dominateurs) of it.

The act of 1st March has raised the embargo, and substituted for it a measure the most injurious to the interests of France.

This act, of which the Emperor knew nothing until very lately, interdicted to American vessels the commerce of France, at the time it authorized that to Spain, Naples, and Holland, that is to say, to the countries under French influence, and denounced confiscation against all French vessels which should enter the ports of America. Repression was a right, and commanded by the dignity of France, a circumstance on which it was impossible to make a compromise (de transiger.) The sequestration of all the American vessels in France, has been the necessary consequence of the measure taken by Congress.

Now Congress retrace their steps, (revient sur ses pas;) they revoke the act of the 1st of March; the ports of America are open to French commerce, and France is no longer interdicted to the Americans; in short, Congress engages to oppose itself to that one of the belligerent Powers which should refuse to acknowledge the right of neutrals.

In this new state of things, I am authorized to declare to you, sir, that the decrees of Berlin and Milan are revoked, and that after the 1st of November they will cease to have effect; it being understood that, in consequence of this declaration, the English shall revoke their Orders in Council, and renounce the new principles of blockade, which they have wished to establish; or that the United States, conformably to the act you have just communicated, shall cause their rights to be respected by the English.

It is with the most particular satisfaction, sir, that I make known to you this determination of the Emperor. His Majesty loves the Americans. Their prosperity and their commerce are within the scope of his policy.

The independence of America is one of the principal titles of glory to France. Since that epoch, the Emperor is pleased in aggrandizing the United States, and, under all circumstances, that which can contribute to the independence, to the prosperity, and the liberty of the Americans, the Emperor will consider as conformable with the interests of his Empire.

Accept, sir, the assurance of my high consideration,

CHAMPAGNY, Duc de Cadore.

His Exc<sup>y</sup> Gen. ARMSTRONG, &c.

General Armstrong to the Duke of Cadore. [No date.]

SIR: The enclosed copy of the law of the United States of the 1st of May last, has been transmitted to me officially by the Secretary of State, and I hasten to lay it before your Excellency. It will supply any want of authenticity which may be found in that already communicated.

In making this second communication of the law, I cannot but recall to your recollection an inference injurious either to my Government, or to myself, which may be drawn from the first paragraph of the letter you did me the honor to write to me on the 5th instant. In this paragraph it is said: "S. M. aurait désiré que cet acte, et tous les autres actes du Gouvernement des Etats Unis, qui peuvent intéresser la France, lui eussent toujours été notifiés officiellement. En général, elle n'en a eu connaissance qu'indirectement, et après un long intervalle du temps. Il résulte de ce retard des inconveniens grave, qui n'auraient pas lieu, si ces actes étaient promptement et officiellement communiqués." ["His Majesty could have wished, that this act and all the other acts of the Government of the United States, which interest France, had always been officially made known to him. In general, he has only had a knowledge of them indirectly, and after a long interval of time. There have resulted from this delay serious inconveniences, which would not have existed, if these acts had been promptly and officially communicated.”]

From these words it may be inferred, either that the United States have been habitually negligent in transmitting to me such of their acts as concern France, or that I have neglected to perform my duty, in not presenting those acts with sufficient promptitude.

In looking back on the public measures of the United States, which in any way interest France, I find but the following, viz:

1st. An act prohibiting commercial intercourse between the United States and St. Domingo.

2d. An act laying an embargo on the ships or other vessels of the United States.

3d. An act prohibiting all commercial intercourse between the United States and France.

4th. An arrangement made between the Secretary of State of the United States, and the Minister of His Britannic Majesty at Washington; and,

5th. The late act of the 1st of May. Now of these, all have been presented officially; and, making a proper allowance for the remoteness of the United States from France, with sufficient promptitude, excepting the last, which (from causes unknown to me) did not reach Paris until yesterday. Your Excellency can at any time ascertain the correctness of this statement by referring to the archives of your own Department.

I have the honor to be, &c.

JOHN ARMSTRONG.

Extract—Mr. Armstrong to Mr. Smith.

PARIS, Sept. 10, 1810.

Since the date of my last despatch, (by Mr. Jarvis,) nothing has occurred worth communicating, until yesterday, when I received the letter from the Duke of Cadore, of which No. 1 (enclosed) is a copy. By this it will be seen that the decree of Rambouillet is not in operation, and that American ships, entering the ports of France before the 1st of November next, will be judged under the decrees of Berlin and of Milan.

No. 2 is the copy of a note written to Mr. Champagny, with a view of drawing from him something explicit on the point of which it treats. The first of these may appear to have been useless, after the declaration of that Minister, that American ships, which will hereafter arrive in the ports of France, shall not be subject to confiscation; but understanding from the Council of Prizes, that, until some act be taken which had the effect of recalling by name the decree of the 23d March last, they must continue to consider it both as existing and operative, and of course, binding upon them, I hastened to present the subject again, and in a form which leaves no room for misunderstanding.

SEPTEMBER 12.

I have the honor to enclose copies of two letters from the Duke of Cadore, one of which is an answer to my note of the 8th instant. To the question, whether we had anything to expect in reparation for past wrongs? they reply, that their act being of reprisal, the law of reprisal must govern: in other words, that, if you confiscate French property under the law of non-intercourse, they will confiscate your property under their decree of Rambouillet. The words underscored are the verbal explanation which accompanied the letter.

I set out this day for Bordeaux, (on my way to the United States,) and hope to begin my voyage from that port on the 1st. October next.

[Referred to in Mr. Armstrong's despatch of Sept. 10, 1810.]

No. 1.

The Duke of Cadore to Mr. Armstrong.

PARIS Sept. 7. 1810.

SIR: You have done me the honor to ask of me, by your letter of the 20th August, what will be the lot of the American vessels which may arrive in France before the 1st of November?

His Majesty has always wished to favor the commerce of the United States. It was not without reluctance that he used reprisal towards the Americans, while he saw that Congress had ordered the confiscation of all French vessels which might arrive in the United States.

It appears that Congress might have spared to His Majesty and his subjects this mortification, (ce désagrément) if, in place of that harsh and decisive measure, which left to France no choice, they had used some palliative, such as that of not receiving French vessels, or of sending them away after a delay of so many days.

As soon as His Majesty was informed of this hostile act, he felt that the honor of France, involved in this point, could not be cleansed (ne pouvait être lavé) but by a declaration of war, which could not take place but by tedious explanations.

The Emperor contented himself with making reprisals, and, in consequence, he applied to American vessels which came to France, or to the countries occupied by the French armies, word for word, the regulations of the act of Congress.

Since the last measures, by which that hostile act is repealed, His Majesty hastens to cause it to be made known to you, that he anticipates that which may re-establish harmony with the United States and that he repeals his decree of Berlin and Milan, under the conditions pointed out in my letter to you of the 5th August.

During this interval, the American vessels which shall arrive in France will not be subjected to confiscation, because the act of Congress which had served as a motive to our reprisals, is repealed; but these vessels will be subjected to all the effects of the Berlin and Milan decrees; that is to say, they will be treated amicably, if they can be considered as Americans, and hostilely, if they have lost their national character, (s'ils se sont laissés dénationalisés) by submitting to the Orders in Council of the British Government.

Relations with France.

I have the honor to renew to you, sir, the assurance of my high consideration.

CHAMPAGNY, Duc de Cadore.

His Exc'y Gen. ARMSTRONG, &c.

No. 2.

[Referred to in Mr. Armstrong's despatch of Sept. 10.]

General Armstrong to the Duke of Cadore.

PARIS, Sept. 7, 1810.

SIR: Your Excellency will not think me importunate, if I should employ the last moments of my stay in Paris in seeking an explicit declaration on the following points:

1st. Has the decree of His Majesty of the 23d of March last, enjoining acts of reprisal against the commerce of the United States, on account of their late law of non-intercourse, been recalled?

2d. What will be the operation, on the vessels of the United States, of His Majesty's decrees of July last, forbidding the departure of neutral ships from ports of France, unless provided with imperial licenses? Are these licenses merely substitutes for clearances; or do they prescribe regulations to be observed by the holders of them within the jurisdiction of the United States?

Do they confine the permitted intercourse to two parts only of the said States; and do they enjoin that all shipments be made on French account exclusively?

Is it His Majesty's will, that the seizures made in the ports of Spain, and other places, on the principle of reprisal, shall become a subject of present or future negotiation between the two Governments; or, are the acts already taken by His Majesty to be regarded as conclusive against remuneration?

I need not suggest to your Excellency the interest that both Governments have in the answers that may be given to these questions, and how nearly connected they are with the good understanding which ought to exist between them. After the great step lately taken by His Majesty, towards an accommodation of differences, we are not at liberty to suppose that any new consideration will arise, which shall either retard or prevent the adoption of measures necessary to a full restoration of the commercial intercourse and friendly relations of the two Powers.

I cannot omit expressing, on this occasion, the sense I shall carry with me of the many obligations I am personally under to your Excellency, and of the very high consideration with which I have the honor to be, your most obedient and very humble servant,

JOHN ARMSTRONG.

His Exc'y the DUKE OF CADORE, &c.

[Referred to in Mr. Armstrong's despatch of Sept. 10.]

The Duke of Cadore to Mr. Armstrong.

PARIS, Sept. 12, 1810.

SIR: I have received your letter of the 7th September. That which I wrote to you the same day answered the first of the questions you put to me. I will add to what I have had the honor to write to you, that the decree of the 23d March, 1810, which ordered reprisals, in consequence of the act of Congress of the 1st March, 1809, was repealed, as soon as we were informed of the repeal of the act of non-intercourse passed against France.

On your second question, I hasten to declare to you, that American vessels, loaded with merchandise, the growth of the American provinces, will be received without difficulty in the ports of France, provided they have not suffered their flag to lose its national character, by submitting to the acts of the British Council: they may, in like manner, depart from the ports of France. The Emperor has given licenses to American vessels. It is the only flag which has obtained them. In this His Majesty has intended to give a proof of the respect he loves to show to the Americans. If he is somewhat dissatisfied (peu satisfaite) that they have not as yet been able to succeed in causing their flag to be respected, at least he sees with pleasure that they are far from acknowledging the tyrannical principle of English legislation.

The American vessels which may be loaded on account of Frenchmen, or on account of Americans, will be admitted into the ports of France. As to the merchandise confiscated, it having been confiscated as a measure of reprisal, the principles of reprisal must be the law in that affair.

I have the honor to renew to you, sir, the assurance of my high consideration.

CHAMPAGNY, Duc de Cadore.

His Exc'y Gen. ARMSTRONG, &c.

General Armstrong to Mr. Pinkney.

BORDEAUX, September 29, 1810.

SIR: Your letter of the 3d instant found me at this place, and on the point of embarking for the United States. I hasten, therefore, to give to it an immediate answer.

There was no error in my representation to you, nor in your representation to Lord Wellesley, of the words, or of the meaning, as I understand it, of the Duke of Cadore's note to me; nor, indeed, do either of these appear to be readily susceptible of mistake. The former, no doubt, retract, in the most positive terms, the Berlin and Milan decrees, and, of course, the principles on which these decrees were founded; and, in doing so, assuredly give us a fair claim on His Britannic Majesty for a fulfilment of the promise made by his Minister Plenipotentiary to our Government the 23d of February, 1808. It would, however appear, by Lord Wellesley's letter to you of the 31st ultimo, that the British Cabinet has given a new version to this promise of His Majesty, and that, as a preliminary to its execution, it is now required, not merely that the principles which had rendered necessary the British system should be retracted, but that the repeal of the French decrees should have actually begun to operate, and the commerce of neutral nations (generally) should have been restored to the condition in which it stood previously to the promulgation of these decrees. It would also appear, from different passages in your letter, that this deviation from the original promise of His Majesty grew out of a supposition that the recall of the French decrees implied a contemporaneous cessation of the British Orders in Council of November, 1807, and a repeal before the 1st day of November next of all proclamation blockades of France, &c. &c. Than this construction nothing can, in my opinion, be more erroneous. Were the repeal of the French decrees dependent alone on what Great Britain may do, the supposition would have in it some color of reasonableness; but as the conditions of it present an alternative, one side of which depends, not on the will of His Britannic Majesty at all, but altogether on that of the United States, and which cannot be adopted by them until after the 1st of November next, it necessarily follows that the conditions are not precedent, as has been supposed, but subsequent, as I represent them. This reasoning will receive illustration from a plain and unsophisticated statement of the Duke of Cadore's declaration, viz: that the Berlin and Milan decrees will cease to operate after the 1st day of November next, on one of two conditions; either that Great Britain shall revoke her Orders in Council, so far as they violate the maritime rights of the United States, or that, refusing to do so, the United States shall revive towards her certain sections of their late non-intercourse law, conformably to an act of Congress of the 1st May last. In this we find nothing of a contemporaneous cessation of the French decrees and British Orders in Council, nor that the blockades of France must be recalled before the 1st day of November next; indeed, the very reverse is to be found there; for it contains an express engagement the decrees shall cease, if the United States do a certain act, which all the world knows they cannot do till after that day. These remarks may derive some additional force from the contents of my letter by Mr. Masson, which will, I hope, show that the concessions made by France to the United States are at least sufficiently substantial to invite from Great Britain some measures of a character equally conciliatory, and that, "earnestly desiring to see the commerce of the world restored to that freedom which is necessary to its prosperity," and no more hesitating to follow the good than she has done to follow the bad example of her neighbor and rival, she will go on to declare that her Orders in Council, &c. shall cease after the 1st day of November next, on condition, either that France shall have actually withdrawn her offensive decrees on that day, or that, if she refuse to do so, the United States shall proceed to enforce against her their late non-intercourse law.

In view of the subject, nothing short of this can be considered a sufficient pledge on the part of the British Government, which, unlike that of France, presents no alternative in the conditions on which her Orders in Council shall be repealed, and which, of course, in no way makes that repeal to depend on an act which would be altogether that of the United States. I have, &c.

JOHN ARMSTRONG.

His Exc'y WILLIAM PINKNEY, &c.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Pinkney to Mr. Russell.

OCTOBER 7, 1810.

It may not be amiss to mention that, as it will be obviously prudent, even if it be not absolutely necessary, to furnish me with all such further evidence as can conveniently be gained, confirmatory of our expectation that the French repeal of the Berlin and Milan decrees will take effect on the 1st of November, I beg you to transmit me such evidence if —, and as soon as it shall be gained.

It may be yet more important to send me, with as little delay as possible, after the 1st of November, the most decisive proof in your power that the repeal has taken effect, at least an official letter from you to me stating that fact.

Extract—Mr. Smith, Secretary of State, to General Armstrong.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,

November 2, 1810.

You will herewith receive a printed copy of the proclamation, which, conformably to the act of Congress, has been issued by the President on the revocation of the Berlin and Milan decrees; you will, however, let the French Government understand that this has been done on the ground that the repeal of these decrees does involve an extinguishment of all the edicts of France actually violating our neutral rights, and that the reservations under the expression "it being understood," are not conditions precedent, affecting the operation of the repeal; and on the ground also that the United States are not pledged against the blockades of Great Britain, beyond what is stated in my letter to you of the 5th July. It is to be remarked, moreover, that in issuing the proclamation it has been presumed that the requisition contained in that letter, on the subject of the sequestered property will have been satisfied. This presumption is not only favored by the natural connexion of the policy and justice of a reversal of that sequestration with the repeal of the decrees, but is strengthened by concurrent accounts, through different channels, that such property as has been sequestered has been actually restored.

The enclosed copy of my last letter to Mr. Pinkney of the 12th ultimo, will afford you a distinct view of the line of conduct presented to him in relation to the British orders and blockades.

This despatch will be delivered to you by one of the officers of the United States' frigate Essex, who will have orders to return to his ship as soon as he shall have received such despatches as you may deem it necessary to transmit to this Department.

Mr. Smith to General Armstrong.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,

November 5, 1810.

SIR: As the ground on which the French Government has deemed it expedient to place the revocation of its decrees may suggest to it the further pretext of requiring a restoration of the French property seized here under the non-intercourse law, as a condition to their restoring the American property condemned or sequestered under the French decree of March, you are authorized, in case a restoration can be thus, and not otherwise, obtained, to acquiesce in such an arrangement, and, if necessary, to give to such arrangement a conventional form requiring the sanction of the Senate. You will, however, take care to avoid any expressions implying an acknowledgement, on the part of the United States, that the non-intercourse law, which was not retrospective, has any analogy to the French decree, the injustice of which essentially consists in its retrospective operation. In truth, the arrangement, on the part of the United States, will be little more than nominal, as will appear by the enclosed copy of a letter from the Treasury Department. It may be proper to remark that the third section of the act of May, for the recovery of forfeitures under the non-intercourse law, contemplated violations by our own citizens, rather than French violations, which could not have been of sufficient importance to have called for such a provision, pointing particularly at them.

I have the honor to be, &c.

R. SMITH.

Gen. JOHN ARMSTRONG, &c.

Mr. Russell to the Secretary of State.

PARIS, December 4, 1810.

SIR: This serves merely to cover a copy of my letter to Mr. Pinkney of the 1st of this month; since that time nothing has come to my knowledge to affect the statement which it contains. It is my duty, however, to say that I have not learned the occurrence of any case to which the Berlin and Milan decrees could be applied.

I have the honor to be, &c.

JON. RUSSELL.

Hon. R. SMITH, Secretary of State.

[Referred to in Mr. Russell's letter of Dec. 4, 1810.]

Mr. Russell to Mr. Pinkney.

PARIS, December 1, 1810.

SIR: As nothing has transpired here of sufficient importance to be communicated by a special messenger, and as no safe private conveyance has hitherto presented itself, I have delayed, till now, to acknowledge the receipt of your letters under date of the 7th and 28th of October.

No event within my knowledge has occurred, either before or since the 1st of November, to vary the construction given by us to the very positive and precise assurances of the Duke of Cadore on the 5th August, relative to the revocation of the Berlin and Milan decrees. That these decrees have not been executed for an entire month on any vessel arriving during that time in any of the ports of France, may, when connected with the terms in which their revocation was announced, fortify the presumption that they have ceased to operate. I know, indeed, of no better evidence than this, which the negative character of the case admits, or how the non-existence of an edict can be proved, except by the promulgation of its repeal and its subsequent non-execution.

Our attention here is now turned towards England and the United States. The performance of one of the conditions on which the revocation of the decrees was predicated, and which is essential to render it permanent, is anxiously expected; and it is devoutly to be wished that England, by evincing the sincerity of her former professions, may save the United States from the necessity of resorting to the measures which exclusively depend on them.

I need not suggest to you the importance of transmitting hither, as early as possible, any information of a decided character which you may possess relative to this subject, as an impatience is already betrayed here to learn that one or the other of the conditions has been performed.

I am, sir, with great respect, &c.

JON. RUSSELL.

His Exc'y Wm. PINKNEY, Esq.

Jonathan Russell, Esq., Chargé d'Affaires of the United States at Paris, to Mr. Smith.

PARIS, December 11, 1810.

SIR: On the evening of the 9th instant, I learned that the Essex frigate had arrived at L'Orient on the 4th, and had been put under quarantine for five days for the want of a bill of health, during which time the messenger is not allowed to come on shore. At the same time that I received this intelligence, I was also informed that brig New Orleans Packet was seized at Bordeaux, under the Berlin and Milan decrees, by the director of the customs at that place. The simultaneous occurrence of these two events formed, in my opinion, a crisis which required a prompt decision of this Government. Under this impression, I immediately addressed to the Duke of Cadore the note of which the enclosed is a copy, and in which I thought it politic to remonstrate with firmness against the proceedings of the direction of the customs at Bordeaux, and to leave the Government here at liberty to disavow them. This disavowal, however, I am persuaded, depends entirely on the nature of the despatches brought by the Essex. I feel, therefore, the most lively anxiety to receive them. In the mean time, I give this letter a chance of reaching you by a vessel about leaving Bordeaux for New York.

Since my last, the Hanseatic towns have been annexed to this Empire.

I have informed Mr. Pinkney of the arrival of the Essex, and suggested to him the possibility that the proclamation of the President had come out by her, in order that he might, if he thought proper, make a final attempt to obtain a repeal of the Orders in Council while it was yet in the power of the British Ministry to do it with a good grace. I have the honor to be, &c.

JONA. RUSSELL.

Relations with France.

[Referred to in Mr. Russell's despatch of December 11, 1810.]

Mr. Russell to the Duke of Cadore.

PARIS, December 10, 1810.

SIR: I have this moment learned that the American brig, the New Orleans Packet, lately arrived at Bordeaux, has, with her cargo, the bona fide property of citizens of the United States, and laden at the port of New York, been seized by the director of the customs under the Berlin and Milan decrees. I have also been informed that this director of the customs, not satisfied with this hardy violation of the solemn assurances given by your Excellency to General Armstrong on the 5th of August last, and confirmed by your letter to him of the 7th of September, that these decrees were revoked, and would cease to operate from the 1st of November, has, without regard to the plighted faith of his Government, announced his intention of selling the provisions which constitute a part of the cargo, under the pretext that they are perishable. The clear and unequivocal manner in which the revocation of the Berlin and Milan decrees was announced by your Excellency, forbids me for a moment to suppose that the violent proceedings of this man will be sanctioned by His Majesty the Emperor and King, or that the least delay will be allowed, in placing the property thus arrested at the free disposition of the rightful owner, whose confidence alone in the good faith with which it becomes nations to perform their engagements has brought him to the place where he is so inhospitably treated.

I am persuaded that your Excellency will not, on this occasion, attempt to remind me of the conditions on which the revocation of those decrees was predicated. These conditions were in the alternative, and the performance of either is sufficient to render absolute and perpetual that revocation. It is of no importance that the British Orders in Council have not been withdrawn, if the United States, in due time, perform the condition which depends alone on them; and what is this condition? Why, to execute an act of Congress against the English, which, to be thus executed, requires the previous revocation of these very decrees. The letter of your Excellency, of the 5th of August, appears to have been written with a full knowledge of this requisition of the law, and manifestly with the intention to comply with it, in order that it might be competent for the President of the United States to exercise the contingent power which had been given to him.

It will not be pretended that the decrees have, in fact, been revoked, but that the delay of the United States in performing the condition presented to them authorizes their revival. The case of the New Orleans Packet is the first which has occurred since the 1st of November, to which the Berlin or Milan decrees could be applied; and if they be applied to this case, it will be difficult for France to show one solitary instance of their having been practically revoked; as to delay on the part of the United States, there has been none. No official information of the letter of your Excellency of the 5th of August left France for the United States, owing to circumstances which it was not in the power of General Armstrong to control, until the 29th of September; and to this moment I have not learned that such official information has been there received. I might, indeed, have learned it, and been able now to have communicated to your Excellency the measures on which the President has decided in consequence of it, had not the frigate, the Essex, despatched by him, been put under quarantine, on her arrival at L'Orient, for the want of a bill of health, and the messenger thereby detained since the 4th of this month. I will not undertake to decide whether a bill of health ought, in courtesy, to be exacted of a frigate of a friendly Power coming in the winter season from a place not known to have been lately afflicted with any malignant disease; but surely the delay which this exaction occasions cannot be imputed to a want of due diligence on the part of the American Government.

It is from this view of the subject that I am thoroughly convinced that the application of the Berlin or Milan decree, by the director of the customs at Bordeaux, to the New Orleans Packet, will not be approved by His Majesty, but that prompt and efficient measures will be taken to correct a procedure which, if persisted in, might produce a state of things which it is the obvious interest of both nations to avoid.

I pray your Excellency to be assured of my most distinguished consideration.

UNITED STATES' CONSULATE,
Bordeaux, Dec. 6, 1810.

SIR: I have the honor to enclose a copy of Mr. Cathalan's letter to me, received this morning, concerning the recapture of the schooner Grace Anne Greene, of New York, Daniel Greene, master, who brought her into the port of Marseilles, having two British officers and seven sailors on board, and they only being six men and two boys.

The brig New Orleans Packet, of New York with a cargo of provisions and three hundred bags of cocoa on board, bound to the Mediterranean, for a market, went to Gibraltar, and, after lying there some time, came to this port where she has been sequestered.

The schooner Friendship, of and from Baltimore, Captain Snow, with a cargo of coffee and Campeachy, arrived five days ago in this river. Whatever the issue may be of these two vessels, I shall have the honor to inform you of it.

I remain, very respectfully, sir, &c.

SIR: Annexed is a triplicate of my respects to you of the 6th instant; the brig Osmin and the ship Commodore Rodgers, by which the original and duplicate went, having not got to sea yet.

The brig New Orleans Packet, of New York, Captain Harris, mentioned in my former letter, has since been seized by the collector, and her cargo has been put in the imperial custom-house.

The schooner Friendship, of and from Baltimore, Captain Snow, has been sequestered.

This is accompanied with an account of sundry advances made for the relief of distressed seamen, for this port and the port of Bayonne, with twenty-two vouchers, amounting to 4,934 francs 20 centimes, and for which I have drawn on Jonathan Russell, Esq., our Chargé d'Affaires at Paris.

Captain Skiddy, of the schooner Maria Louisa, bound to New York, has eight distressed seamen on board, and for whom I have paid no passage money, nor have I laid in provision for them.

The ship Commodore Rodgers, Captain Shaler, from Bayonne, bound to New York, will carry home from fifty to sixty seamen in distress, and for whom I shall have the honor to transmit you a list and an account by my next.

The duty on cocoa has been reduced from 5 francs 50 centimes to 2 francs 75 centimes per pound.

The Essex frigate is arrived at L'Orient from the United States.

This is accompanied by a file of newspapers, and which I shall have the honor to continue to send whenever opportunities offer.

I have the honor to be, &c.

CIRCULAR.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,

November 2, 1810.

SIR: You will herewith receive a copy of the proclamation of the President of the United States, announcing the revocation of the edicts of France, which violated the neutral commerce of the United States, and that the restrictions, imposed by the act of 1st May last, accordingly cease from this day in relation to France. French armed vessels may, therefore, be admitted into the harbors and waters of the United States, anything in that law to the contrary notwithstanding.

It also follows that, if Great Britain shall not, on the 2d of February next, have revoked or modified in like manner her edicts violating the neutral commerce of the United States, the third, fourth, fifth, sixth, seventh, eighth, ninth, tenth, and eighteenth sections of the "Act to interdict the commercial intercourse between the United States and Great Britain and France, and their dependencies, and for other purposes," shall, in conformity with the act first abovementioned, be revived and have full force and effect, so far as relates to Great Britain and her dependencies, from and after the said 2d day of February next. Unless, therefore, you shall before that day be officially notified by this department of such revocation or modification, you will, from and after the said day, carry into effect the abovementioned sections, which prohibit both the entrance of British vessels of every description into the harbors and waters of the United States, and the importation into the United States of any articles the growth, produce, or manufacture of the dominions, colonies, and dependencies of Great Britain, and of any articles whatever brought from the said dominions, colonies, and dependencies.

I am, respectfully, sir, your obedient servant.

The COLLECTOR of the District of —.

By the President of the United States of America.

A PROCLAMATION.

Whereas, by the fourth section of the act of Congress, passed on the 1st day of May, 1810, entitled "An act concerning the commercial intercourse between the United States and Great Britain and France, and their dependencies, and for other purposes," it is provided "that, in case either Great Britain or France shall, before the 3d day of March next, so revoke or modify her edicts as that they shall cease to violate the neutral commerce of the United States, which fact the President of the United States shall declare by proclamation; and if the other nation shall not, within three months thereafter, so revoke or modify her edicts, in like manner, then the third, fourth, fifth, sixth, seventh, eighth, ninth, tenth, and eighteenth sections of the act entitled 'An act to interdict the commercial intercourse between the United States and Great Britain and France, and their dependencies, and for other purposes,' shall, from and after the expiration of three months from the date of the proclamation aforesaid, be revived and have full force and effect, so far as relates to the dominions, colonies, and dependencies, and to the articles the growth, produce, or manufacture of the dominions, colonies, and dependencies of the nation thus refusing or neglecting to revoke or modify her edicts in the manner aforesaid. And the restrictions imposed by this act shall, from the date of such proclamation, cease and be discontinued in relation to the nation revoking or modifying her decrees in the manner aforesaid."

And whereas it has been officially made known to this Government, that the edicts of France violating the neutral commerce of the United States have been so revoked as to cease to have effect on the 1st of the present month: Now, therefore, I, James Madison, President of the United States, do hereby proclaim that the said edicts of France have been so revoked as that they ceased on the said 1st day of the present month to violate the neutral commerce of the United States; and that, from the date of these presents, all the restrictions imposed by the aforesaid act shall cease and be discontinued in relation to France and their dependencies.

In testimony whereof, I have caused the seal of the United States to be hereunto affixed, and signed the same with my hand, at the City of Washington, this second day of November, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and ten, and of the independence of the United States the thirty-fifth.

JAMES MADISON.

R. SMITH, Secretary of State.

The Vice Consul at Bordeaux to the Secretary of State.

UNITED STATES' CONSULATE,
BORDEAUX, December 31, 1810.

SIR: I had the honor of addressing you the 14th instant by this opportunity, (the schooner Maria Louisa, Captain Skiddy,) and I have now to enclose a newspaper of yesterday, containing two letters from the French Minister of Justice to the President of the Tribunal of Prizes, and from the Minister of Finance to the Collector General of all the customs in France, concerning American navigation. I have the honor to be, &c.

CH. MEYER,
Vice Consul of the United States.

[Referred to in the preceding letter of Mr. Meyer.]

PARIS, December 26, 1810.

Copy of a letter from His Excellency the Grand Judge, Minister of Justice, to the Counsellor of State, President of the Council of Prizes.

PARIS, December 25, 1810.

MR. PRESIDENT: The Minister of Foreign Relations, by order of His Majesty the Emperor and King, addressed on the 5th of August last to the Plenipotentiary of the United States of America a note containing the following words:

"I am authorized to declare to you that the decrees of Berlin and Milan are revoked, and that after the 1st of November they will cease to have effect; it being well understood that, in consequence of this declaration, the English will revoke their Orders in Council and renounce the new principles of blockade which they wished to establish; or that the United States, in conformity to the act you have just communicated, will cause their rights to be respected by the English."

In consequence of the communication of this note, the President of the United States issued, on the 2d of November, a proclamation to announce the revocation of the decrees of Berlin and Milan, and declared that, in consequence thereof, all the restrictions imposed by the act of the 1st of May must cease with respect to France and her dependencies. On the same day the Treasury Department addressed a circular to all the collectors of the customs of the United States, which enjoins them to admit into the ports and waters of the United States armed French vessels; prescribes to them to apply, after the 2d of February next, to English vessels of every description, and to productions arising from the soil and industry of the commerce of England and her dependencies, the law which prohibits all commercial relations, if at that period the revocation of the English Orders in Council, and of all the acts violating the neutrality of the United States, should not be announced by the Treasury Department.

In consequence of this engagement, entered into by the Government of the United States, to cause their rights to be respected, His Majesty orders that all the causes that may be pending in the Council of Prizes of captures of American vessels, made after the 1st of November, and those that may in future be brought before it, shall not be judged according to the principles of the decrees of Berlin and Milan, but that they shall remain suspended; the vessels captured or seized to remain only in a state of sequestration, and the rights of the proprietors being reserved for them until the 2d of February next, the period at which the United States having fulfilled the engagement to cause their rights to be respected, the said captures shall be declared null by the Council, and the American vessels restored, together with their cargoes, to their proprietors.

Receive, Mr. President, the new assurances of my most distinguished consideration.

THE DUKE OF MASSA.

Copy of a letter from the Minister of Finance to the Count of Sussy, Counsellor of State, Director General of the Customs.

DECEMBER 25, 1810.

On the 5th of last August, the Minister of Foreign Relations wrote to Mr. Armstrong, Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States of America, that the Berlin and Milan decrees were revoked, and that after the first of November they would cease to have effect; it being well understood that, in consequence of this declaration, the English would revoke their Orders in Council, and renounce the new principles of blockade which they wished to establish; or that the United States, in conformity to the act communicated, should cause their rights to be respected by the English.

On the communication of this note, the President of the United States issued, on the 2d of November, a proclamation which announces the revocation of the Berlin and Milan decrees after 1st of November; and which declares that, in consequence thereof, all the restrictions imposed by the act of the 1st of May, 1809, should cease with respect to France and her dependencies.

The same day the Treasury Department addressed to the collectors of the customs a circular, which directs them to admit into the ports and waters of the United States armed French vessels, and enjoins it on them to apply, after the 2d of February next, the law of the 1st of May, 1809, prohibiting all commercial relation to English vessels of every description, as well as to productions of the soil, industry, or commerce of England and her dependencies.

Relations with Spain.

His Majesty having seen, in these two pieces, the enunciation of the measures which the Americans purpose taking on the 2d of February next, to cause their rights to be respected, has ordered me to inform you that the Berlin and Milan decrees must not be applied to any American vessels that have entered our ports since the 1st of November, or may enter in future; and that those which have been sequestered, as being in contravention of these decrees, must be the object of a special report.

On the 2d of February I shall acquaint you with the intentions of the Emperor with regard to the definitive measures to be taken for distinguishing and favoring the American navigation. I have the honor to salute you.

The Minister of Finance,

THE DUKE OF GAETE.

SPAIN—FLORIDA.

Communicated to Congress by the public Message of December 5, 1810, and the confidential Message of January 3, 1811.

WASHINGTON, January 3, 1811.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

I communicate to Congress, in confidence, a letter of the 2d December from Governor Folch, of West Florida, to the Secretary of State; and another of the same date, from the same, to John McKee.

I communicate in like manner a letter from the British Chargé d'Affaires to the Secretary of State, with the answer of the latter. Although the letter cannot have been written in consequence of any instruction from the British Government, founded on a late order for taking possession of the portion of West Florida well known to be claimed by the United States; although no communication has ever been made by that Government to this of any stipulation with Spain, contemplating an interposition which might so materially affect the United States; and although no call can have been made by Spain in the present instance for the fulfilment of any such subsisting engagement, yet the spirit and scope of the document, with the accredited source from which it proceeds, required that it should not be withheld from the consideration of Congress.

Taking into view the tenor of these several communications, the posture of things with which they are connected, the intimate relation of the country adjoining the United States eastward of the river Perdido to their security and tranquillity, and the peculiar interest they otherwise have in its destiny, I recommend to the consideration of Congress, the seasonableness of a declaration that the United States could not see, without serious inquietude, any part of a neighboring territory, in which they have in different respects so deep and so just a concern, pass from the hands of Spain into those of any other foreign Power.

I recommend to their consideration also the expediency of authorizing the Executive to take temporary possession of any part or parts of the said territory, in pursuance of arrangements which may be desired by the Spanish authorities, and for making provision for the government of the same during such possession.

The wisdom of Congress will, at the same time, determine how far it may be expedient to provide for the event of a subversion of the Spanish authorities within the territory in question, and an apprehended occupancy thereof by any other foreign Power.

JAMES MADISON.

Extract of a letter from Governor Holmes, of the Mississippi Territory, to the Secretary of State, dated

OCTOBER 17, 1810.

The enclosed letter I have been requested to transmit to you.

[Enclosed in Gov. Holmes's letter of October 17, 1810.]

The President of the Convention of Florida to the Secretary of State.

BATON ROUGE, October 10, 1810.

SIR: The Convention of the State of Florida have already transmitted an official copy of their act of independence, through His Excellency Governor Holmes, to the President of the United States, accompanied with the expression of their hope and desire that this Commonwealth may be immediately acknowledged and protected by the Government of the United States, as an integral part of the American Union. On a subject so interesting to the community represented by us, it is necessary that we should have the most direct and unequivocal assurances of the views and wishes of the American Government without delay, since our weak and unprotected situation will oblige us to look to some foreign Government for support, should it be refused to us by the country which we have considered as our parent State.

We therefore make this direct appeal through you to the President and General Government of the American States, to solicit that immediate protection to which we consider ourselves entitled; and, to obtain a speedy and favorable decision, we offer the following considerations: 1st, The Government of the United States in their instructions to the Envoys Extraordinary at Paris in March, 1806, authorized the purchase of East Florida, directing them at the same time to engage France to intercede with the Cabinet of Spain to relinquish any claim to the territory which now forms this Commonwealth. 2d, In all diplomatic correspondence with American Ministers abroad, the Government of the United States have spoken of West Florida as a part of the Louisiana cession. They have legislated for the country as a part of their own territory, and have deferred to take possession of it, in expectation that Spain might be induced to relinquish her claim by amicable negotiation. 3d, The American Government has already refused to accredit any Minister from the Spanish Junta, which body was certainly more legally organized as the representative of the sovereignty, than that now called the Regency of Spain. Therefore, the United States cannot but regard any force or authority emanating from them, with an intention to subjugate us, as they would an invasion of their territory by a foreign enemy. 4th, The Emperor of France has invited Spanish Americans to declare their independence rather than remain in subjection to the old Spanish Government: therefore, an acknowledgment of our independence by the United States, could not be complained of by France, or involve the American Government in any contest with that Power. 5th, Neither can it afford any just cause of complaint to Great Britain, although she be the ally of Spain, that the United States should acknowledge and support our independence, as this measure was necessary to save the country from falling into the hands of the French exiles from the island of Cuba, and other partisans of Bonaparte, who are the eternal enemies of Great Britain.

Should the United States be induced by these, or any other considerations, to acknowledge our claim to their protection as an integral part of their territory, or otherwise, we feel it our duty to claim, for our constituents, an immediate admission into the Union as an independent State, or as a Territory of the United States, with permission to establish our own form of Government, or to be united with one of the neighboring Territories, or a part of one of them, in such manner as to form a State. Should it be thought proper to annex us to one of the neighboring Territories, or a part of one of them, the inhabitants of this Commonwealth would prefer being annexed to the island of Orleans; and in the meanwhile, until a State Government should be established, that they should be governed by the ordinances already enacted by this Convention, and by their further regulations hereafter.

The claim which we have to the soil or unlocated lands within this Commonwealth will not, it is presumed, be contested by the United States, as they have tacitly acquiesced in the claim of France or Spain for seven years, and the restrictions of the several embargo and non-intercourse laws might fairly be construed, if not as a relinquishment of their claim, yet at least sufficient to entitle the people of this Commonwealth (who have wrested the Government and country from Spain at the risk of their lives and fortunes) to all the unlocated lands. It will strike the American Government that the moneys arising from the sales of these lands, applied as they will be to improving the internal communications of the country, opening canals, &c. will, in fact, be adding to the prosperity and strength of the Federal Union. To fulfil with good faith our promises and engagements to the inhabitants of this country, it will be our duty to stipulate for an unqualified pardon for all deserters now residing within this Commonwealth, together with an exemption from further service in the army or navy of the United States.

A loan of $100,000 is solicited of the American Government, to be reimbursed at three, six, and nine years, from the sales of public lands. This loan may be made by the Secretary of the Treasury immediately, without committing the Government, or making it known to foreign Ministers at Washington.

In order not to embarrass the Cabinet of the United States, and to receive first through their own confidential agents their wishes and views with respect to us, it is deemed prudent to defer the departure of our Envoy already named, who will be despatched immediately on receiving information that such a measure will meet the approbation of the United States.

We pray you to accept the assurances of our respect and high consideration.

By order of the Convention:

JOHN RHEA, President.

To the Honorable ROBERT SMITH, Secretary of State for the United States.

[Transmitted with the letter of Governor Holmes to the Secretary of State, of October 17, 1810.]

The Convention of Florida to His Excellency the Governor of the Mississippi Territory.

BATON ROUGE, September 26, 1810.

SIR: We, the delegates of the people of this State, have the honor to enclose to you an official copy of their act of independence, requesting that it may be forthwith transmitted by you to the President of the United States, with the expression of their most confident and ardent hope that it may accord with the policy of the Government, as it does with the safety and happiness of the people of the United States, to take the present Government and people of this State under their immediate and special protection, as an integral and inalienable portion of the United States.

The Convention and their constituents of Florida rest in the firm persuasion that the blood which flows in their veins will remind the Government and the people of the United States, that they are their children; that they have been acknowledged as such by the most solemn acts of the Congress of the United States; and that, so long as independence and the rights of man shall be maintained and cherished by the American Union, the good people of this State cannot, or will not, be abandoned or exposed to the invasion, violence, or force of any foreign or domestic foe.

The Convention beg you to receive for yourself, sir, and to assure the President of their high respect and consideration.

By order of the Convention:

JOHN RHEA, President.

[Transmitted with the letter of Governor Holmes to the Secretary of State, of October 17, 1810.]

By the Representatives of the people of West Florida, in Convention assembled:

A DECLARATION.

It is known to the world with how much fidelity the good people of this Territory have professed and maintained allegiance to their legitimate Sovereign, while any hope remained of receiving from him protection for their property and lives.

Without making any unnecessary innovation in the established principles of the Government, we had voluntarily adopted certain regulations, in concert with our First Magistrate, for the express purpose of preserving this Territory, and showing our attachment to the Government which had heretofore protected us. This compact, which was entered into with good faith on our part, will forever remain an honorable testimony of our upright intentions and inviolable fidelity to our King and parent country, while so much as a shadow of legitimate authority remained to be exercised over us. We sought only a speedy remedy for such evils as seemed to endanger our existence and prosperity, and were encouraged by our Governor with solemn promises of assistance and co-operation. But those measures which were intended for our preservation he has endeavored to pervert into an engine of destruction, by encouraging, in the most perfidious manner, the violation of ordinances sanctioned and established by himself as the law of the land.

Being thus left without any hope of protection from the mother country, betrayed by a Magistrate whose duty it was to have provided for the safety and tranquillity of the people and Government committed to his charge, and exposed to all the evils of a state of anarchy, which we have so long endeavored to avert, it becomes our duty to provide for our own security, as a free and independent State, absolved from all allegiance to a Government which no longer protects us.

We, therefore, the Representatives aforesaid, appealing to the Supreme Ruler of the world for the rectitude of our intentions, do solemnly publish and declare the several districts composing this Territory of West Florida to be a free and independent State; and that they have a right to institute, for themselves, such form of Government as they may think conducive to their safety and happiness; to form treaties; to establish commerce; to provide for their common defence; and to do all acts which may, of right, be done by a sovereign and independent nation; at the same time declaring all acts, within the said Territory of West Florida, after this date, by any tribunal or authorities not deriving their powers from the people, agreeably to the provisions established by this Convention, to be null and void; and calling upon all foreign nations to respect this our declaration, acknowledging our independence, and giving us such aid as may be consistent with the laws and usages of nations.

This Declaration, made in Convention, at the town of Baton Rouge, on the twenty-sixth day of September, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and ten, we, the Representatives, in the name aforesaid, and on behalf of our constituents, do hereby solemnly pledge ourselves to support with our lives and fortunes.

By order of the Convention :

ANDREW STEELE, Sec'ry.

The Secretary of State to Governor Claiborne.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,

October 27, 1810.

SIR: From the enclosed proclamation of the President of the United States, you will perceive his determination to take possession of the Territory therein specified, in the name and in behalf of the United States, the considerations which have constrained him to resort to this necessary measure, and his direction that you, as Governor of the Orleans Territory, shall execute the same. Of this proclamation, upon your arrival at Natchez, you will, without delay, cause to be printed as many copies, in the English, French, and Spanish languages, as may be deemed necessary, and you will cause the same to be extensively circulated throughout the said Territory.

You will immediately proceed, by the nearest and best route, to the town of Washington, in the Mississippi Territory. From the Secretary at War you will receive an order to the officers commanding the several frontier posts to afford you such assistance in passing the wilderness, and in descending the Western waters, as you may require; and, as despatch is very desirable, you are authorized, in case your horses should fail, to procure others at the public expense. After having made, at Washington, the necessary arrangements with Governor Holmes and with the commanding officer of the regular troops, you will, without delay, proceed into the said Territory, and, in virtue of the President's proclamation, take possession of the same, in the name and in behalf of the United States.

As the district, the possession of which you are directed to take, is to be considered as making part of the Territory of Orleans, you will, after taking possession, lose no time in proceeding to organize the militia; to prescribe the bounds of parishes; to establish parish courts; and, finally, to do whatever your legal powers applicable to the case will warrant, and may be calculated to maintain order; to secure to the inhabitants the peaceable enjoyment of their liberty, property, and religion; and to place them, as far as may be, on the same footing with the inhabitants of the other districts under your authority. As far as your powers may be inadequate to these and other other requisite objects, the Legislature of Orleans which it is understood will soon be in session, will have an opportunity of making further provisions for them, more especially for giving, by law, to the inhabitants of the said Territory, a just share in the representation in the General Assembly; it being desirable that the interval of this privation should not be prolonged beyond the unavoidable necessity of the case.

If, contrary to expectation, the occupation of this Territory on the part of the United States should be opposed by force, the commanding officer of the regular troops on the Mississippi will have orders from the Secretary at War to afford you, upon your application, the requisite aid; and should an additional force be deemed necessary, you will draw from the Orleans Territory, as will Governor Holmes from the Mississippi Territory militia in such numbers and in such proportions from your respective territories, as you and Governor Holmes may deem proper. Should, however, any particular place, however small, remain in possession of a Spanish force, you will not proceed to employ force against it, but you will make immediate report thereof to this Department.

You will avail yourself of the first favorable opportunities that may occur to transmit to the several Governors of the Spanish provinces in the neighborhood copies of the President's proclamation, with accompanying letters of a conciliatory tendency.

To defray any reasonable expenditures which may necessarily attend the execution of these instructions, the President authorizes you, having due regard to economy, to draw for a sum not exceeding, in any event, twenty thousand dollars.

From the confidence which the President justly has in your judgment and discretion, he is persuaded that, in the execution of this trust, as delicate as it is important, your deportment will be temperate and conciliatory. Such a line of conduct towards the inhabitants is prescribed as well by policy as by justice.

You will, it is expected, be fully sensible of the necessity not only of communicating every important event, that may occur in the progress of this business, but of transmitting a letter, whatever may be its contents, by every mail to this city. I have the honor to be, &c.

R. SMITH.

W. C. C. CLAIBORNE, Esq. &c.

[Referred to in the preceding letter.]

By the President of the United States of America.

A PROCLAMATION.

Whereas the territory south of the Mississippi Territory and eastward of the river Mississippi, and extending to the river Perdido, of which possession was not delivered to the United States in pursuance of the treaty concluded at Paris on the 30th of April, 1803, has, at all times, as is well known, been considered and claimed by them, as being within the colony of Louisiana conveyed by the said treaty, in the same extent that it had in the hands of Spain, and that it had when France originally possessed it;

And whereas the acquiescence of the United States in the temporary continuance of the said Territory under the Spanish authority was not the result of any distrust of their title, as has been particularly evinced by the general tenor of their laws, and by the distinction made in the application of those laws between that Territory and foreign countries, but was occasioned by their conciliatory views, and by a confidence in the justice of their cause, and in the success of candid discussion and amicable negotiation with a just and friendly Power;

And whereas a satisfactory adjustment, too long delayed, without the fault of the United States, has for some time been entirely suspended by events over which they had no control; and whereas a crisis has at length arrived subversive of the order of things under the Spanish authorities, whereby a failure of the United States to take the said Territory into its possession may lead to events ultimately contravening the views of both parties, whilst, in the mean time, the tranquillity and security of our adjoining Territories are endangered, and new facilities given to violators of our revenue and commercial laws, and of those prohibiting the introduction of slaves:

Considering, moreover, that under these peculiar and imperative circumstances, a forbearance on the part of the United States to occupy the Territory in question, and thereby guard against the confusions and contingencies which threaten it, might be construed into a dereliction of their title, or an insensibility to the importance of the stake: Considering that in the hands of the United States it will not cease to be a subject of fair and friendly negotiation and adjustment: Considering, finally, that the acts of Congress, though contemplating a present possession by a foreign authority, have contemplated also an eventual possession of the said Territory by the United States, and are accordingly so framed as, in that case, to extend in their operation to the same:

Now be it known, that I, JAMES MADISON, President of the United States of America, in pursuance of these weighty and urgent considerations, have deemed it right and requisite that possession should be taken of the said Territory, in the name and behalf of the United States. William C. C. Claiborne, Governor of the Orleans Territory, of which the said Territory is to be taken as part, will accordingly proceed to execute the same, and to exercise over the said Territory the authorities and functions legally appertaining to his office. And the good people inhabiting the same are invited and enjoined to pay due respect, to him in that character, to be obedient to the laws, to maintain order, to cherish harmony, and in every manner to conduct themselves as peaceable citizens, under full assurance that they will be protected in the enjoyment of their liberty, property, and religion.

In testimony whereof, I have caused the seal of the United States to be hereunto affixed, and signed the same with my hand.

Done at the City of Washington, the twenty-seventh day of October, A. D. 1810, and in the thirty-fifth year of the independence of the said United States. JAMES MADISON.

By the President:

R. SMITH, Secretary of State.

Mr. Smith to Governor Holmes.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Nov. 15, 1810.

SIR: I have received your letter of the 17th of October, enclosing the memorial of the Convention of West Florida. To repress the unreasonable expectations therein indicated in relation to the vacant land in that Territory, it is deemed proper to lose no time in communicating to you and to Governor Claiborne the sentiments of the President on the subject.

The right of the United States to the Territory of West Florida, as far as the river Perdido, was fairly acquired by purchase, and has been formally ratified by treaty. The delivery of possession has, indeed, been deferred, and the procrastination has been heretofore acquiesced in by this Government, from a hope, patiently indulged, that amicable negotiation would accomplish the equitable purpose of the United States. But this delay, which proceeded only from the forbearance of the United States to enforce a legitimate and well known claim, could not impair the legality of their title; nor could any change in the internal state of things, without their sanction, howsoever brought about, vary their right. It remains, of course, as perfect as it was before the interposition of the Convention. And the people of West Florida must not for a moment be misled by the expectation that the United States will surrender, for their exclusive benefit, what had been purchased with the treasure and for the benefit of the whole. The vacant land of this Territory, thrown into common stock with all the other vacant land of the Union, will be a property in common, for the national uses of all the people of the United States. The community of interests upon which this Government invariably acts, the liberal policy which it has uniformly displayed towards the people of the Territories, (a part of which policy, has ever been a just regard to honest settlers,) will, nevertheless, be a sufficient pledge to the inhabitants of West Florida for the early and continued attention of the Federal Legislature to their situation and their wants.

These observations will apprise you, sir, of the sentiments of the President, as to the propositions in the memorial in relation to the vacant land in West Florida, and will enable you to make, when necessary and proper, suitable explanations to the people of that Territory. You will, however, keep in mind that the President cannot recognise in the Convention of West Florida any independent authority whatever to propose or to form a compact with the United States.

I am sir, with the highest respect, your most obedient servant,

R. SMITH.

His Ex'cy DAVID HOLMES.

Governor Folch to Mr. Smith, Secretary of State.

MOBILE, December 2, 1810.

SIR: I will not detain myself in giving to your Excellency information relative to the letter which I directed to his Excellency Governor Holmes, being persuaded that it will be in the hands of your Excellency long before this; but I will add to its contents, for your government, that I have decided on delivering this province to the United States under an equitable capitulation, provided I do not receive succor from the Havana or Vera Cruz, during the present month; or that his Excellency the Marquis of Someruelos, (on whom I depend,) should not have opened directly a negotiation on this point.

The incomprehensible abandonment in which I see myself, and the afflicted situation to which this province sees itself reduced, not only authorize me, but force me to have recourse to this determination, the only one to save it from the ruin which threatens it.

The United States are also authorized to accept it; for as the disturbances which now afflict this province, so near to them, must increase every day, they cannot but have an influence on their tranquillity, an object which merits the first care of every Government.

The inhabitants of Baton Rouge may figure to themselves many motives which may, (in their conception,) justify the determination they have adopted; but they cannot produce even a single one which can make tolerable the tyrannical, illegal, and unjust obstinacy with which they insist that the other districts should subject themselves to their will.

The United States, who profess the exercise of equity, cannot exempt themselves from taking part with the party unjustly oppressed. In this belief, I recur to its Executive, through the medium of your Excellency, supplicating him, that he will be pleased to send orders to the commandant of Fort Stoddert, that he should assist me with the troops which he has under his orders, for the purpose of forcing the party under the command of Reuben Kemper to retire within the limits of the districts of Baton Rouge; intimating to him, that if in future he should repeat his incursions in the district of Mobile and Pensacola, the troops of the United States, joined to the Spanish troops, will use force to keep them back.

These districts have the more reason to expect from the rectitude of the United States the assistance which I ask, as the party which Kemper commands has been recruited, armed, and provisioned within the limits of their sovereignty.

At the same time, if my proposition is accepted, orders may be given authorizing some person to treat with me for regulating the evacuation of the province, and what ought to precede it.

I conclude by assuring your Excellency of my consideration and respect.

God preserve your Excellency many years.

Governor Folch to Colonel McKee.

MOBILE, Dec. 2, 1810.

SIR: Since the conversations I have had with you respecting the disturbances which at present afflict this province, I have thought of addressing myself directly to the Executive power of the United States, through the medium of their Secretary of State, proposing to treat for the delivery of the province in more positive terms than those which I employed in the letter that I wrote to his Excellency Governor Holmes, because, as our difficulties every day increase, the necessity of hastening their conclusion increases also.

I have believed, also, that it might be conducive to the better exit of this negotiation, that my despatch should be intrusted to a person who could give to the Government every information that it ought to possess, in order that it may deliberate with the brevity which is necessary; and considering, sir, that you are in a situation to fulfil this object, from having been an eye-witness to all that has passed in this part of the province and the adjacent country, you can give information respecting the alarm which reigns among the inhabitants, of the influence which the French agents in Louisiana exercise in these disturbances, and the risk which that province runs of being involved in the disorders which have had their birth in Florida, as well as the fatal consequences which may follow if the evil is not stopped in its beginning, and whatever else can be said on the subject.

In order to avoid accidents and delays, which it is not easy to foresee, I will deliver to you duplicates of the despatch which I address to his Excellency the Secretary of State, in order that you may transmit one of them by the mail, and by this means give early information to the Government of the affairs on which it has to deliberate.

The satisfaction I have enjoyed for many years in your acquaintance assures me that you will use every exertion in a matter which is so interesting to our respective countries.

I remain, &c.

Colonel McKee to Mr. Eustis.

FORT STODDERT, Dec. 5, 1810.

SIR: Having on the 21st ult. taken the liberty of addressing you on the subject of the disturbances in this quarter, and having no personal acquaintance with any member of the present Executive, I have presumed to enclose to your care a despatch from Governor Folch to the Secretary of State. I have also enclosed a hasty translation of Governor Folch's letter to me, which, with some other considerations, has induced me to proceed immediately to the City of Washington, for which I leave this in two or three days, and will proceed with the least possible delay to Knoxville. I have the honor, &c.

JOHN McKEE.

Hon. WILLIAM EUSTIS.

Mr. Morier to Mr. Smith.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 15, 1810.

SIR: I deem it to be a duty incumbent on me, considering the strict and close alliance which subsists between His Majesty's Government and that of Spain, to express to the Government of the United States, through you, the deep regret with which I have seen that part of the President's Message to Congress, in which the determination of this Government to take possession of West Florida is avowed.

Without presuming to discuss the validity of the title of the United States to West Florida, (a title which is manifestly doubtful, since, according to the President's proclamation, it is left open to discussion, but which has, nevertheless, been brought forward as one of the pleas to justify the occupation of that province,) may it not be asked why that province could not have been as fairly a subject of negotiation and adjustment in the hands of the Spaniards, who possess the actual sovereignty there, as in the hands of the Americans, who, to obtain possession, must begin by committing an act of hostility toward Spain?

But it may be said that the Spanish forces in Mexico, in Cuba, or at Pensacola, are unequal to quell the rebellious association of a band of desperadoes who are known here by the contemptuous appellation of land-jobbers. Allowing as much, (which you will agree with me, sir, is allowing a great deal,) would it not have been worthy of the generosity of a free nation like this, bearing, as it doubtless does, a respect for the rights of a gallant people at this moment engaged in a noble struggle for its liberty—would it not have been an act on the part of this country, dictated by the sacred ties of good neighborhood, and of friendship, which exist between it and Spain, to have simply offered its assistance to crush the common enemy of both, rather than to have made such interference the pretext for wresting a province from a friendly Power, and that in the time of her adversity?

For allow me, sir, to inquire how can the declaration in the President's proclamation, "that in the hands of the United States, that territory will not cease to be a subject of fair and friendly adjustment," be made to accord with the declaration in his Message to Congress, (implying permanent possession,) "of the adoption of that people into the bosom of the American family?"

The act, consequently, of sending a force to West Florida to secure by arms what was before a subject of friendly negotiation, cannot, I much fear, under any palliation, be considered other than as an act of open hostility against Spain.

While, therefore, it is impossible to disguise the deep and lively interest which His Majesty takes in everything that relates to Spain, which would, I am convinced, induce him to mediate between Spain and the United States on any point of controversy which may exist between them, with the utmost impartiality and good will toward both parties, I think it due to the sincere wish of His Majesty, to maintain unimpaired the friendship which at this moment happily exists between Great Britain and the United States, to say that such are the ties by which His Majesty is bound to Spain, that he cannot see with indifference any attack upon her interests in America. And as I have no doubt that the Government of the United States will attribute this representation to the most conciliatory motives, I am induced to request, in answer to it, such explanation on the subject, as will at once convince His Majesty's Government of the pacific disposition of the United States toward His Majesty's allies the Spaniards, and will remove the contrary impression, which, I fear, the President's Message is likely to make.

I have the honor to be, with the highest consideration, sir, your most obedient, humble servant,

J. P. MORIER.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 22, 1810.

Mr. Morier presents his compliments to Mr. Smith, and begs the favor to be informed when he may expect an answer to the letter which he had the honor to address to Mr. Smith on the 15th instant.

Mr. Morier, at the same time, hopes that Mr. Smith, concurring with him in the opinion that it would be desirable that His Majesty's Government should, as soon as possible after the receipt of the President's Message, be furnished with the explanation which Mr. Morier has requested in the above letter on the occupation of West Florida in the name of the United States, will readily excuse the solicitude with which he again presses this subject upon the attention of this Government.

STATE DEPARTMENT, Dec. 28, 1810.

SIR: Taking into view the subject and the circumstances of your letter of the 15th instant, I have, in acknowledging it, only to remark to you, that although it is sufficiently evident, from the face of the documents before the public, that no hostile or unfriendly purpose is entertained toward Spain, the only Power known to the United States in the transaction, yet our functionary at London has been enabled to give to your Government whatever explanations may comport with the frankness and the spirit of conciliation which have been invariably manifested on the part of the United States.

[The following documents were communicated to Congress by the President's Message of December 5, 1810.]

Extract of a letter from John Gavino, Esq., Consul of the United States at Gibraltar, to the Secretary of State.

GIBRALTAR, September 18, 1810.

I beg leave to hand you a copy of a letter from Consul Cox, dated Malta, 26th ultimo, when he was on his return to Tunis. It has given me great pleasure to find his having succeeded in terminating amicably the differences which had taken place with that Bey.

[Referred to in the preceding letter.]

C. D. COXE to John Gavino.

MALTA, August 26, 1810.

SIR: I arrived at this place on the 22d instant, in the schooner Hamilton, Captain Whitlock, as a flag of truce, in consequence of an unfavorable change in the situation of our affairs at Tunis, with the expectation of making some arrangement whereby the difficulty which has taken place may be amicably adjusted.

On the 14th instant, His Excellency, the Bey, sent a messenger to request my presence at the palace. I accordingly presented myself, and he informed me that, in consequence of the seizure of a vessel belonging to him and bearing his flag, through the interference of Mr. Pulis, the American Consul at Malta, he had given orders to arrest all the Americans and sequester all their property in the Kingdom of Tunis, which he would hold until he received full satisfaction from the United States, considering them responsible for the acts of their public agents.

The vessel alluded to was the ship Liberty, of Philadelphia, belonging to William Hazlett of that place, which had been taken by a French privateer, brought to Tunis, and sold by order of the French Consul at public auction. The first Minister of the Bey was the purchaser, and she afterwards proceeded to Malta under Tunisian colors, where she arrived without interruption in the month of May last. Mr. Pulis, the American Consul, applied to the Maltese court, or Consulate del Maore, (as the British Vice Admiralty Court would not interfere,) and claimed the ship for the original American owners. His Excellency, the Bey, on being informed of this, took the measures before related.

He not only regards this as a loss of property, but as an insult offered to his flag, and will view it as a declaration of war if the ship should not be restored to him, with damages of detention. He insists on the right of purchasing prize vessels at auction, or any others offered for sale in his Kingdom, and that his flag shall protect them. His Excellency declared that he had given me the strongest proofs of his justice and friendly disposition to my Government, in causing all the American vessels with their cargoes to be released which had been taken within the limits of this jurisdiction; but that those taken on the high seas was an affair between the American and French Governments, and did not concern him. He has warned me that, if the ship Rolla (an American vessel, taken by a French privateer without his jurisdictional limits, and purchased by his agents at public auction at the French consulate,) should be hereafter claimed by an American citizen and given up to him, the Americans, with their property at Tunis, shall be answerable for the event.

The amount of American property at Tunis may be computed at about two hundred and fifty thousand dollars.

All my endeavors to deter his Excellency from these harsh measures were of no avail. He assured me, in the most solemn manner, that he would not only firmly adhere to the steps he had already taken, but would pursue such others as he might deem necessary. I have now, however, to inform you that on my arrival here, and in consequence of my having officially informed Mr. Pulis of what had taken place at Tunis, he has, as the only alternative to prevent a war, withdrawn his claim, and the ship has been restored to the Bey's Ambassador at this place, whereby our relations with that Regency are again placed on the same friendly footing on which they were before this unfortunate occurrence took place.

I shall sail on my return to Tunis immediately in the vessel which brought me here; having thus brought the difficulty which had arisen to an amicable conclusion, on terms which, I trust, will be satisfactory to my Government.

Very respectfully, I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient, humble servant.

DECEMBER 28, 1810.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Dec. 28, 1810.

SIR: In pursuance of a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 21st of this month, I have the honor of laying before you:

1st. A copy (marked A) of a decree of the Emperor of France, transmitted to this Department by General Armstrong:

2d. A copy (marked B) of a correspondence with General Turreau.

3d. A copy (marked C) of a communication just received from General Armstrong, in relation to the duties lately imposed by the Emperor of France.

With the highest respect and consideration, I have the honor to remain, &c.

To the PRESIDENT of the United States.

A.

Translation of a decree of the 15th July, 1810.

Thirty or forty American vessels may import into France, under license, cotton, fish, oil, dye-wood, salt fish, codfish, hides, and peltry. They may export wine, brandy, silks, linens, cloths, jewelry, household furniture, and other manufactured articles. They can only depart from Charleston and New York, under the obligation of bringing with them a gazette of the day of their departure, (American gazette,) moreover a certificate of the origin of the merchandise, given by the French Consul, containing a sentence in cipher. The French merchants, who shall cause these vessels to come, must prove that they are concerned in the fabrics at Paris, Rouen, and other towns.

B.

General Turreau to Mr. Smith.

WASHINGTON, Nov. 27, 1810.

SIR: Since our last conversation relative to the certificates of origin given by the Consuls of His Majesty in the United States, I have collected and read over the different orders of my Court on that subject, and asked of the Consul General of France those which he might have received directly on this part of the service, so essential for the security of your exportations.

It results from the instructions which I have received directly, and from those that have been sent to the Consul General, that the Consuls of His Majesty in the United States do not deliver, or must not hereafter deliver, under any pretext, any certificate of origin to American vessels destined for any port other than those of France; that they deliver them, and will deliver them hereafter, to all American vessels destined for the ports of France, loaded only with the produce of the United States; that all the certificates anterior to the last instructions, attributed to the Consuls of His Majesty, and which, it is pretended, were given for colonial produce, that evidently came from England, have been challenged as false, (argués de faux;) inasmuch as the English publicly fabricate papers of this sort at London.

This, sir, is all that it is possible for me to say to you at present respecting certificates of origin.

I cannot doubt but that the Government of the United States will see, in these regulations of my Court, an intention, distinctly pronounced, of favoring the commercial relations between France and the United States in all the objects of traffic which shall evidently proceed from their agriculture or manufactures.

You will readily perceive, sir, that, in giving this latitude to the mutually advantageous relations of the two friendly people, the Emperor cannot depart from the system of exclusion against English commerce, without losing the advantages which His Majesty and the allied Powers must necessarily expect from it.

I have the honor to be, with high consideration, &c.

TURREAU.

Hon. R. SMITH. Sec. of State.

The Secretary of State to General Turreau.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Nov. 28, 1810.

SIR: I have had the honor of receiving your letter of yesterday, stating that the French Consuls in the United States are, at this time, authorized to deliver certificates of origin only to such American vessels as are bound to some port of France, and as are laden with the produce of the United States.

It will afford satisfaction to our merchants to know, and, therefore, I have to request you to inform me whether, in American vessels having such certificates of origin, they can export every kind of produce of the United States, and especially cotton and tobacco.

In addition to the intelligence communicated in your letter in relation to the certificates of origin, I have the honor of asking from you information upon the following questions:

1st. Have not the French Consuls been in the practice, under the authority of the French Government, of delivering, in the ports of the United States, certificates of origin for American vessels bound to the ports of France and her allies, and laden with either colonial produce, or the produce of the United States?

2d. Have the French Consuls in the United States lately received from the French Government instructions not to deliver such certificates of origin for American vessels, and at what time did they receive such instructions?

3d. At what time did the French Consuls cease to issue certificates of origin to American vessels, in pursuance of instructions from their Government, in cases of destination to ports of the allies of France?

These facts being connected with questions interesting to our merchants in foreign tribunals, your goodness will pardon the resort to your aid in ascertaining them. I have, &c.

GEN. TURREAU, &c.

R. SMITH.

General Turreau to Mr. Smith.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 12, 1810.

SIR: If I have not replied sooner to the letter which you did me the honor to write to me on the 28th of last month, it is because I have sought information from the Consul General of His Majesty, whether he had not received, directly, instructions more recent than those which I had transmitted to him, and, also, to enable me to give a positive answer to the questions contained in the letter referred to above.

I reply, sir, to the first of your questions, that Messieurs the Consuls of His Majesty to the United States have always delivered certificates of origin to American vessels for the ports of France; they did it in execution of a decree of His Majesty of the first of Messidor of the year eleven.

Messieurs the French Consuls have, also, delivered them to vessels destined for neutral or allied ports, whenever they have been required of them. This measure was sanctioned and authorized by a circular despatch of His Excellency the Minister of Foreign Relations, under date of the 20th of April, 1808. This despatch prescribes the formality to be gone through for the certificates delivered in such cases.

I proceed now, sir, to reply to the second of your questions.

By a despatch of his Excellency the Duke of Cadore, of the 30th of August last, received by the Hornet, the 13th of last month, and of which information was given the same day to the Consuls and Vice Consuls of His Majesty, they are expressly prohibited from delivering certificates of origin for merchandise of any kind, or under any pretext whatever, if the vessels are not destined for France.

This reply to your second question, sir, furnishes you with a solution of the third. The Consuls and Vice Consuls of His Majesty will have ceased to deliver certificates of origin to vessels for any other place than France, immediately on the receipt of this circular, which will reach them a few days sooner or later, according to the greater or less distance of the places of their residence.

Concerning cotton and tobacco, their importation into France is, at this moment, specially prohibited; but, I have reasons to believe, (and I pray you, meanwhile, to observe, sir, that they do not rest upon any facts,) that some modifications will be given to this absolute exclusion. These modifications will not depend upon the chance of events, but will be the result of other measures, firm, and pursued with perseverance, which the two Governments will continue to adopt, to withdraw from the monopoly and from the vexations of the common enemy a commerce loyal (loyal) and necessary to France as well as to the United States.

Accept, sir, the renewed assurances of my high consideration.

TURREAU.

Hon. R. SMITH, Sec. of State.

The Secretary of State to General Turreau,

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Dec. 18, 1810.

SIR: I have had the honor of receiving your letter of the 12th instant, in reply to my inquiries in relation to certificates of origin, as well as to the admission into France of the products of the agriculture of the United States.

From your letter, it appears that the importation into France of cotton and tobacco, the produce of the United States, is, at this time, specially and absolutely prohibited.

From the decree of the 15th July, it, moreover, appears that there can be no importation into France but upon terms and conditions utterly inadmissible; and that, therefore, there can be no importation at all of the following articles, the produce of the United States, namely, fish-oil, dye-wood, salt fish, codfish, hides, and peltry.

As these enumerated articles constitute the great mass of the exports from the United States to France, the mind is naturally awakened to a survey of the actual condition of the commercial relations between the two countries, and to the consideration that no practical good, worthy of notice, has resulted to the United States from the revocation of the Berlin and Milan decrees, combined, as it unexpectedly has been, with a change in the commercial system of France, so momentous to the United States.

The act of Congress of May last had for its object, not merely the recognition of a speculative legitimate principle, but the enjoyment of a substantial benefit. The overture therein presented, obviously embraced the idea of commercial advantage. It included the reasonable belief that an abrogation of the Berlin and Milan decrees would leave the ports of France as free for the introduction of the produce of the United States, as they were previously to the promulgation of those decrees.

The restrictions of the Berlin and Milan decrees had the effect of restraining the American merchant from sending their vessels to France. The interdictions in the system that has been substituted against the admission of American products will have the effect of imposing upon them an equal restraint. If, then, for the revoked decrees, municipal laws, producing the same commercial effect, have been substituted, the mode only, and not the measure, has undergone an alteration. And, however true it may be that the change is lawful in form, it is, nevertheless, as true, that it is essentially unfriendly, and that it does not at all comport with the ideas inspired by your letter of the 27th ultimo, in which you were pleased to declare the "distinctly pronounced intention of His Imperial Majesty of favoring the commercial relations between France and the United States in all the objects of traffic which shall evidently proceed from their agriculture or manufactures."

If France, by her own acts, has blocked up the ports against the introduction of the products of the United States, what motive has this Government, in a discussion with a third Power, to insist on the privilege of going to France? Whence the inducement to urge the annulment of a blockade of France, when, if annulled, no American cargoes could obtain a market in any of her ports? In such a state of things, a blockade of the coast of France would be to the United States as unimportant as would be a blockade of the coast of the Caspian sea.

The British edicts may be viewed as having a double relation; first, to the wrong done to the United States; secondly, to the wrong done to France. And it is in the latter relation only, that France has a right to speak. But, what wrong, it may be asked, can France suffer from British orders which co-operate with her own regulations?

However sensible the United States may be to the violation of their neutral rights under those edicts, yet, if France herself has, by her own acts, rendered it a theoretical instead of a practical violation, it is for this Government to decide on the degree in which sacrifices of any sort may be required by considerations which peculiarly and exclusively relate to the United States. Certain it is, that the inducements to such sacrifices are weakened, as far as France can weaken them, by having converted the right to be maintained into a naked one, whilst the sacrifices to be made would be substantial and extensive.

A hope, however, is indulged, that your instructions from your Government will soon enable you to give some satisfactory explanations of the measures to which reference has been made, and that their operation, in virtue of modifications which have not yet transpired, will not be as has been herein represented.

The President has received with great satisfaction the information that the Consuls of France have been heretofore, in the official and authorized practice of furnishing certificates of origin to American vessels, as well as to those destined to neutral ports, as to those whose sovereigns are in alliance with France; and that this practice, sanctioned by the French Government, did not cease in any part of the United States before the 13th of last month, and then, only in consequence of a despatch from the Duke of Cadore, bearing date the 30th of August preceding. This satisfaction arises from the hope that similar information may have been given to the Danish Government, and from a sense of the happy influence which such a communication will have had on the American property that had been seized and detained by the privateers of Denmark, upon the supposition that these certificates of origin were spurious, and not authorized by the French Government. It is, nevertheless, to be regretted, that the functionaries of France in Denmark had not made known to the Danish authorities, during the occurrence of such outrages on the American trade, the error of denouncing as illegitimate authentic documents which had been lawfully issued by the accredited agents of His Imperial Majesty. I have the honor to be, &c.

R. SMITH.

General TURREAU, &c.

Translation of a letter from General Turreau to Mr. Smith.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 25, 1810.

SIR: I have received the letter you have done me the honor to write me on the 18th of this month, and I hasten to transmit a copy of it to his Excellency the Duke de Cadore.

This despatch, sir, being an answer to the letters which I had the honor to write to you on the 27th of November and the 12th of this month, naturally takes me back to their object, to which I believe it is my duty again to call your attention.

I pray you to observe that the last instructions I have received from my Court relative to the new directions the commerce of France with the United States must follow, are of a very old date; the official despatches from which I have taken them are of the 12th and 28th of April last.

It is the more probable that the regulations of my Government, in regard to this commerce, have undergone some modifications, as the Consul General received by the Hornet despatches of the 10th July, and 22d and 30th August last, in which it is specially stated that cottons may be imported into France in American vessels, and under certain regulations; whereas, according to the instructions which were addressed to me on the 12th and 28th of April preceding, cotton and tobacco are specially prohibited.

I will add to these data, (ces donnees,) that, according to the orders transmitted to the Consuls of His Majesty respecting certificates of origin, and under the date before cited, (30th August last,) they may deliver them to all American vessels destined for France; observing that these certificates are not applicable but to the products of the United States. If these certificates of origin cannot be applied but to the productions of the United States, and cannot be given to any vessels but those destined for France, the introduction of these productions is not then prohibited there.

Relations with France.

You will be pleased especially to observe, sir, that the dispositions which were announced to me by the despatches of the 12th and 28th of April, are, of course, anterior to the repeal of the decrees of Berlin and Milan, and are necessarily without an object the moment the said decrees are no longer in force. I do not know of any subsequent acts which modify this repeal; for the instructions already cited, sent to the Consul General the 30th of August last, relative to the certificates of origin, are only a consequence of it, and formally exclude only colonial productions.

Furthermore sir, I have before me the letters of the Duke of Cadore to General Armstrong, under date of the 5th of August and 12th September, of which copies have been sent to me by order of my Court. These are the only documents on which it seems to me reasonable to fix the attention, (s'arrêter;) and I see in them nothing which can cause it to be supposed that the French Government may have had an intention to modify or to restrict the repeal of the before-cited decrees. This act contains no reserve; it does not exact any guaranty. The declaration of the Duke of Cadore is formal; and it is the provisions themselves of the act of the honorable Congress of the 1st of May last, which have dictated to him the consequence.

I seize this occasion with eagerness, sir, to renew to you the assurance of my high consideration.

TURREAU.

C.

General Armstrong to Mr. Smith.

WASHINGTON, December 27, 1810.

SIR: The enclosed documents, marked 1 and 2, were intended to have made part of my last communication. The paper, entitled Avis au commerce, &c. (notice to merchants,) contains a tariff of the new duties payable in France, and shows, besides, what are the articles of commerce admissible there. If this paper has no other value, it will be found important from the illustration it gives to that passage of the Duke of Cadore's letter to me of the 12th of September last, in which he says that "American vessels loaded with merchandise, the growth of the American States, will be received without difficulty into the ports of France." It is also in perfect concert with the practice of the French custom-house, in the case of the ship Ida, coming from Boston with a cargo of cotton. I am, sir, &c.

I communicate to Congress, in confidence, the translation of a letter from Luis de Onis, the Captain General of the province of Caraccas.

The tendency of misrepresentations and suggestions, which, it may be inferred from this specimen, enter into more important correspondences of the writer, to promote in foreign councils, at a critical period, views adverse to the peace and to the best interests of our country, renders the contents of the letter of sufficient moment to be made known to the Legislature.

CITY OF PHILADELPHIA,
 February 2, 1810.

The Administration of this Government, having put the stamp upon the servile meanness and adulation in which they stand in relation to their oracle, Bonaparte, the day before yesterday, by their direction, Mr. Eppes, the son-in-law of the former President, Jefferson, made a proposition that a Minister should be immediately sent to Joseph Bonaparte, at Madrid. This was supported in the committee in which the House then was, by Mr. Cutts, who is the brother-in-law of President Madison. There were various debates, there were howlings of the tribunals, there were sarcasms against the Supreme Central Junta, and many trifling observations from one party and the other, among which mention was made of the arrival of a Minister from the Supreme Junta, and of this Government's having wisely refused to receive him; and, at length, a vote was taken, from which it resulted that, for the present, no Minister was to be sent to Joseph.

In the annexed paper you will see all the debates, which, for want of time, I have not been able to have translated. If your Excellency should not be informed, by my former despatches, of the mode of thinking of the present Administration, this alone will show the little hope there is of obtaining anything favorable from it, but by energy, by force, and by chastisement.

The facility—I again repeat it, and I will repeat it a thousand times—with which American vessels are admitted into our colonies, preferring them to our own, makes these people believe that our weakness does not permit us even to talk to them on equal terms, much less to take measures which may injure them. From hence springs the great opinion (la grande opinion) they have, that the intruder, Joseph, will rule in Spain and her colonies; and hence the incitement to their scandalous conduct in promoting, by every means in their power, the machinations of Joseph to make himself master of our colonies, as if upon that depended their happiness.

The determination of making war on England, and of treating Spain with contempt, supposing that her nullity did not entitle her to anything else, was taken by the present Administration some time since; though it was not in them the determination of reason. To accomplish it, they thought of forming an alliance, offensive and defensive, between France, Russia, Denmark, Sweden, and the United States; and some even suppose that it is formed. With this object they have sent Mr. Adams to the Court of St. Petersburg, in quality of Minister Plenipotentiary, directing him to examine on his way (haciendole recorrer al paro) the Courts of Stockholm and Copenhagen; but, notwithstanding this, if England should display her energy, in however small a degree, and if, on our part, some vessels should be sent to their coasts, and some troops should draw near to Louisiana, there is reason to believe that we should see these provinces separated and divided into two or three Republics, and, consequently, they would remain in a state of perfect nullity. We should soon have from the Republic of the North, which would be our friend, all the supplies which are now drawn from the others, who would perish from poverty and quarrels among themselves.

This country is now without a cent, with a deficit of four millions of dollars in her revenue, with not more of an effective army than six thousand despicable men, of whom two thousand five hundred, that they had at New Orleans, are reduced by death to six hundred; and although they have passed a law for one hundred thousand, much time and money will be necessary to organize them. Its navy is for the most part disarmed, although they propose to arm it, and the whole of it is reduced to eight or nine frigates. The blindness of these people is such, that the Secretary of the Treasury (Gallatin) speaking with Colonel Joseph de Gonzales, late Governor of Puno, who, from his having come from the Havana, Mexico, and other provinces, he believed (not knowing his integrity) to be one of the many emissaries of Napoleon, the caste which abounds most here, offered to him the constitution of Paine, and other papers relative to the liberty which here they dispute about, persuading him to send them to Mexico and our other colonies, and that he should endeavor to induce them to unite themselves to this Republic; that here they were ready, if this succeeded, to move near to them, or even to place in their country the seat of Government. These, sir, are the ideas with which this Administration is animated. Notwithstanding, at the time they observed this conduct, they sent General Sumter in the character of Minister Plenipotentiary to Rio Janeiro.

God preserve you many years.

ENCOURAGEMENT TO MANUFACTURES.

Communicated to the Senate, January 22, 1811.

To the honorable the Congress of the United States, the memorial of the subscribers, citizens of the town of Lexington, and county of Fayette, and State of Kentucky, respectfully sheweth:

That the present situation of the mechanics and manufacturers of the United States, is peculiarly interesting to the people generally, and well deserves the attention of Congress. In all the acts and deliberations of your honorable body, it appears to your memorialists, that a predilection for the interest of commerce has always been discoverable, while little has been done in favor of the internal industry of the country. Your revenue system, it must be confessed, has afforded it some partial protection; but that system appears to have been calculated only for the purposes of revenue; and, as powerfully as it might be made to encourage domestic manufactures, no act seems to have been adopted with that view; on the contrary, commerce has met with your exclusive protection and support. To prove this, let us refer to the immense sums that have been expended in the fortification of the seaports; to the establishment of a navy; to the expenditures occasioned by our intercourse with foreign nations; to the duties which have been laid on foreign tonnage; to the bounties which protect the fisheries; to the credits given to merchants at our custom-houses; and, in fine, to the many sacrifices which have been made to commerce. We do not, however, condemn that policy which gives bounties and protection to the merchant; nor, though local in its operation, to the support which is afforded to the fisherman. We feel, upon those subjects, as Americans should do. Remote as we are situated from the seats of commerce, we do not repine at those regulations which are made for its benefit, and are content when any species of enterprise and industry is encouraged by the Government—for we know well, that the United States compose an extensive nation; that our citizens are scattered over an immense country, having various soils and climates, with as various pursuits adapted thereto; and that a Government forming laws for this population must consult the wants and necessities of each, and, by attending to particulars, promote the general good of the whole. We complain only because the protection and encouragement of industry is not made universal, and extended to every pursuit which is known in our country. If it be just in a Republic, established for the common good, to give to any one pursuit bounties, encouragement, and protection, we hold it as an undeniable truth, that all other pursuits are equally entitled to them. That the industry of the mechanics and manufactures should likewise be protected, appears from other and powerful considerations.

The rapid accumulation of wealth which the United States have made since the wars of the French Revolution, was occasioned by an unnatural extension of commerce, and an unnatural demand for the productions of our agriculture. The labor there withdrawn from agriculture, the ravages of contending armies, and the destruction of the commercial navy of continental Europe, created a demand for our produce, and gave such employment to our shipping and such encouragement to our merchants as to occasion that rapid accumulation of wealth, and those internal improvements which have even astonished ourselves and been the wonder of the world. Upon the continuance of this state of things we are not to depend. An eternal war in Europe is not to be expected; the state is unnatural; and experience shows, that one party must give way when its resources are exhausted, or it is humbled by the victories of its enemy. When this period arrives, what has heretofore been the life of our industry, will no longer animate it, and we shall be compelled to look to other resources to preserve the wealth which we have acquired. But how can it be preserved if we do not change our system, and Congress does not give another direction to the industry of the country? Where shall we find a market for the productions of our soil? And where will our shipping find employment?

A brief view of the history of our commerce, we conceive, will place this subject in a proper point of view.

Before our Revolutionary war, our markets were in the dominions of Great Britain, and such of the colonies of European Powers as we could obtain admittance into by smuggling. After the peace of 1783, we lost the regular market of the former; and the latter, being precarious in its nature, was of little moment. Such were the colonial and commercial systems of Europe, as not to permit the introduction into their dominions, of articles which they could produce themselves, unless in seasons of scarcity; so that during the period of time which elapsed between the acknowledgment of our independence and the commencement of the French Revolution, all of our citizens who depended upon foreign commerce, were often reduced to great distress. The importation of foreign commodities drained us of our treasures; and our other commerce did not bring us back a correspondent proportion of the precious metals. Have we discovered that there exists in the breast of the rulers of Europe any disposition to abandon, upon the return of peace, their systems of commerce? Even during the wars which have raged for a few years past, they have renewed their prohibitions whenever they could do without us. In times of peace, the Powers of Europe can supply themselves and their colonies with all the provisions which they may have occasion for. Their colonies can rival us in tobacco, and in all the raw materials which they want for manufactures. In their ports we are, therefore, to expect a permanent market for a small part of our productions only, and but an uncertain and temporary one for the bulk of them. Asia and Africa want nothing from us. We hazard nothing, then, when we assert, that after the wars of Europe are over, foreign markets will not be found for our surplus produce, and that we shall be compelled to look at home for the reward of our labor. Another fact, perhaps, ought not to pass unnoticed. Our country is rapidly increasing in population, and its surplus produce for exportation must increase in an equal ratio. Not so the demand of foreign markets. All those circumstances combine, in the opinion of your memorialists, to show the policy of directing the industry of our citizens into such channels as will not be affected by the edicts, regulations, and wars of Europe; and to prepare, in time, for that change in business, which must take place, (and to the general distress of the country,) when a peace there will put an end to our carrying trade, and destroy the markets for our produce.

A change like this, in the direction of capital and labor, (it moreover appears to your memorialists,) will have a beneficial effect upon our foreign relations. If our most important market be at home, so large a proportion of our property will not be subjected to the depredations of the pirates of the ocean; and the people, less embarrassed by the interruptions of commerce, will more readily unite in measures calculated to vindicate the honor, and assert the rights of the nation. To prove this, let us appeal to facts; the most recent, and, of course, the most convincing, have happened within a few years. The edicts of France and England, which produced the embargo, occasioned, also, the interruption of that commerce, upon which much labor depended for employment, the merchant for his profits, and the farmer for the sale of his productions. Some capital was idle, many vessels were rotting in our ports, produce found no market, and the plough in some places was abandoned. Patriotism would prompt us to suffer for our country. But the sailor cannot feed himself in port; the farmer dislikes to lose his crops; the merchant looks with impatience upon blasted prospects and ruined fortunes; and few will be content to live on patriotism while their families are starving. Had our acting capital given life to domestic pursuits; had it given employment to labor; had our provisions been consumed, and our raw materials been fabricated by domestic artisans, instead of the farmer being compelled to look abroad in search of a market for both, we should not have felt so much the pressure of the embargo, nor would our interest have warred with our patriotism. This is the course of human events, and history proves, that the rulers of nations have always been obliged to accommodate their differences with others, upon better or worse conditions, according as the contest bore heavy or not upon their own people. Were the citizens of the United States, however, in the situation alluded to, how different would be the attitude which our Government could assume! And how much less would foreign Powers calculate upon exciting a clamor against it by the interruption of our commerce, or the general stagnation of our business.

That the interest of the country coincides with the political and national considerations which we have enumerated in support of domestic manufactures, has been the opinion of the most enlightened statesmen of whom America can boast, and moreover, appears, from very obvious reasons. Upon the quantum of its labor is said to depend the wealth of a nation. But, to create wealth, labor must be productive; and those pursuits which put most of it into action seem best calculated to make it so. There is no pursuit—agriculture excepted—which has an effect of this nature, equal to that of the mechanic and manufacturer. The manufacturer works up our raw materials, and consumes our provisions. What he earns is kept at home, and is almost immediately circulated again, by various channels, through society. The merchant is by no means so useful a character; part of his gains are sent abroad, and paid away to foreigners. The mechanic and manufacturer likewise contribute to make the country really independent, by furnishing those supplies which we should otherwise be dependent for on foreign nations. The nation which produces but a small part of what she can consume, or grows but few articles, we have already seen, must always be a dependent one. Her wants cannot be regularly supplied, and her business appears subjected to embarrassment. Say, that her pursuit is commerce. When that is interrupted, as, for example, it has been for the last sixteen years in Holland, and how soon will she become impoverished and distressed? Let her pursuit be exclusively agriculture; and the depression of markets (which has often been the case with respect to our provisions, tobacco, and cotton,) will paralyze the industry and enterprise of the nation. Whereas the multiplication and diversity of pursuits would give a country resources which others could not deprive her of; and the industry of one part of it would cherish, invigorate, and support that of another. Nor can it be an unimportant consideration, that the increase of manufactures would tend to keep at home the precious metals, the principal and the most convenient as well as the most useful representative of wealth and labor. Desirable, however, as it may be to encourage manufactures, it can be done effectually only by Congress. The mechanic and the manufacturer in the United States has to contend with obstacles unknown to the foreigner. The British manufacturer, his great competitor, is protected by prejudice, by the course of business, by the low price of labor, and the skill of his workmen, but above all, by the strength of his capital, and the bounties and encouragement given to him by his Government. And upon almost all heavy articles, as to which an American has the best opportunity of rivaling him, those bounties and encouragements are more than equal to the freight, charges, and insurance upon the manufactured article. The American manufacturer is at present poor; he has buildings to erect, workmen to teach, and powerful prejudices to overcome: his limited capital often makes it necessary for him to force markets, while his opponent can wait for, or command one at pleasure. Indeed, it is to be feared, that the foreigner will purposely seek opportunities to depress markets, in order to remove the American out of his way. Such have often been the effects of the jealousy of trade. Permit us, while upon this subject, to remind your honorable body of the celebrated contest between the British and Dutch, with the imperial East India Company; where the former, by depressing the prices of commodities, succeeded in annihilating or ruining the latter, supported as it was by the weight and treasures of the Emperor Joseph; a fate which may attend many establishments in America.

When we ask for adequate protection from Congress to our own manufactures, we are aware of jealousies which will be excited against us. Why, it will be asked, tax one portion of the people to benefit another? We answer, for the benefit of the whole, and to equalize the imposts which are laid to support Government. Imposts levied with this view is but taking from one pocket what is abundantly repaid to the other. Whatever gives life to the domestic industry of the country benefits every man in it. Whatever sums are paid to keep our resources at home is not lost. As in the human frame, it is like the veins returning blood to the heart, whereby the whole system may be replenished. Such are the lessons furnished by experience. How has Great Britain become the first commercial and manufacturing nation in the world? By her superior arts and industry? No. In these she is rivalled by her great competitor—by her system of restriction and protection; by those regulations which encourage her own commerce and manufactures, and by depressing those of foreign nations. What she can make and produce herself she suffers no country to supply her with. By these means she has made the industry of all nations her tributary, and by these means she has monopolized the commerce of, and manufactured for the world. But the effect of our own discriminating duties upon foreign tonnage, and that protecting system which has raised the fisheries of New England from insignificance, to be the first in the world, show sufficiently the effects produced upon the industry of a nation by this system of restriction and protection. Admitting, however, that a system like this may operate as a tax upon the industry of one part of the country, at the expense of another, it cannot long be so. When the domestic manufacturer shall have acquired experience, and his laborers are completely instructed in their business; and when, by industry and success, he shall have acquired capital sufficient to enable him to extend his business; the natural effect will be to reduce his prices to a very moderate profit; and lower often than what the same article could be afforded for from abroad.

But would not good policy dictate that the United States should meet restriction by restriction, and contend in this way against all nations who wish to make our labor and industry tributary to them? Shall we not be blind to our own interest if we omit doing so? Repeatedly have our public characters declared that manufactures should be encouraged, and praised have those citizens often been who have established them. But they must have something more substantial to support them than praise. If foreign Governments can prevent them (as we have shown they can, and probably will do) from being productive to the proprietors, experience will show the manufacturer that his money has been expended in vain; and ill success will deter others from the same pursuit. This latter consideration we hope will have its due weight with Congress, especially when the circumstances are recollected under which our most considerable manufactories were established. The non-importation act, but particularly the embargo act, by interrupting the trade of Europe, created a demand for articles which could not be obtained from abroad, and to supply which many workshops have been erected. Out of one establishment arose another. If Congress are disposed to encourage them, now is the time. A moment so favorable to do so may not occur for years—since many citizens are disposed to engage in them if those which are erected prove successful. Success crowns every step with popularity, and produces imitators and followers; whereas, misfortune has a contrary effect. Damped would this spirit be, if the expected settlement of our differences with foreign nations were to occasion such an influx of foreign commodities as to undersell our manufacturers. Then those buildings, workshops, and warehouses, upon which so much labor and money has been expended, would lie waste, and their proprietors, with the loss of purse, would have the additional mortification of being considered merely as projectors.

But should our disputes with foreign nations end in war, and at this moment, when new codes of maritime law are hourly proclaimed, and the peaceful pursuits of all neutral nations are interrupted by the great belligerent Powers of Europe; when old States are daily overturned, and new kingdoms are as often erected; we cannot calculate upon preserving peace for a moment: would not a Congressional act for the permanent support of the mechanics and manufacturers of the country much encourage those citizens who are disposed to devote their capital to those pursuits, and as much assist our Government in the vigorous prosecution of war? You have made provision for the permanent support of a navy; and in any war in which you might engage, this must be used as a great means to annoy. Your navy, as well as the shipping of the United States, have heretofore depended upon foreigners for the supply of cordage and sail cloth. You must have clothing also for the navy and army, and depend upon the internal resources of the country for the supply of those articles. The people must likewise depend upon the home market for the supply and sale of everything.

The mechanic and manufacturer, with the protection which Congress could promise, would work with spirit, confidently expecting a constant remuneration for their labor. Whether, however, this protection should be afforded by bounties, or by prohibitory, or protecting duties upon all articles which the country can produce, or in whole or in part by loans, as recommended by the present Secretary of the Treasury, the subscribers will not presume to point out. We will, however, state that, as capital is much wanted by mechanics and manufacturers, a combination of those means, might be attended with salutary effects.

As citizens of the State of Kentucky, permit us to add a few considerations, arising out of the local situation of our country. Kentucky is rich in soil, but remotely situated from the seats of commerce. Her proximity to Indiana and Ohio subjects her to continual drains of treasure for the purchase of the United States' lands. Large sums of money are annually sent off for foreign productions; and the merchants of the United States, who are the real collectors of the revenue, pay our duties to the Treasury. Protected as we are by the strong arm of, and attached to, the Union, with this arrangement we are satisfied. But when the fisheries of New England are not only protected by duties, but encouraged by bounties; when, comparatively speaking, no public moneys are expended here, but all at Washington and on the seaboard, for the support of Government and the protection of a commerce, in which, from our local and insular situation, we cannot participate; we think we have a rightful and just claim to some indemnification; and this can only be given to us by encouraging and protecting our internal industry.

Wherefore, we pray that Congress will take this subject into consideration, and, as in duty bound, we shall ever pray, &c.

SINKING FUND

[Communicated to the Senate, February 4, 1811.]

The Commissioners of the Sinking Fund respectfully report to Congress, as follows:

That the measures which have been authorized by the board, subsequent to their last report, of the 3d of February, 1810, so far as the same have been completed, are fully detailed in the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, to this board, dated the first day of the present month, and in the statements therein referred to, which are herewith transmitted, and prayed to be received as part of this report.

G. CLINTON, President of Senate.

A. GALLATIN, Sec'y Treasury.

C. A. RODNEY, Atty Gen. U. S.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 2, 1810.

The Secretary of the Treasury respectfully reports to the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund:

11th Con. 3d Sess.—41

That the balance of moneys advanced on account of the public debt, remaining unexpended at the close of the year 1808, and applicable to payments falling due after that year, which balance, as appears by the statement B, annexed to the last annual report, amounted to - - - $651,103 33

Together with the sums disbursed during the year 1809, from the Treasury, on account of the principal and interest of the public debt; which sums, as appears by statement C, annexed to the last annual report, amounted to - - - 6,452,698 52

And amounting, together, to - $7,103,801 85

Have been accounted for in the following manner:

I. There was repaid into the Treasury, during the year 1809, on account of the principal of moneys heretofore advanced for the payment of the foreign debt, as appears by the statement E, annexed to the last annual report, a sum of - - - $93 20

II. The sums actually applied during the same year to the payment of the principal and interest of the public debt, as ascertained by accounts rendered to the Treasury Department, amount, as will appear by the statement A, to $6,742,708 97, viz:

1. Paid in reimbursement of the principal of the debt, including the last instalment of the Dutch debt - - - $3,825,564 06

2. Paid on account of the interest and charges on the public debt 2,917,144 91

6,742,708 97

III. The balance remaining unexpended at the close of the year 1809, and applicable to payments falling due after that year, as ascertained by accounts rendered to the Treasury Department, amounted, as will appear by the statement B, to - - - 360,999 68

$7,103,801 85

That, during the year 1810, the following disbursements were made out of the Treasury, on account of the principal and interest of the public debt, viz:

I. On account of the interest and reimbursement of the domestic funded debt - - - $7,157,298 08

II. On account of the interest on the Louisiana stock, and on exchanged and converted stocks, payable in Europe - - - 844,674 35

Amounting, together, as will appear by the annexed list of warrants, marked C, to - - - $8,001,972 43

Which disbursements were made out of the following funds, viz:

I. From the funds constituting the annual appropriation of eight millions of dollars for the year 1810, viz: From the fund arising from the interest on the debt transferred to the credit of the Commissioners of the

Settlers on the Public Lands.

Sinking Fund, as per statement I -	$1,646,578 84
From the fund arising from the sales of public lands, being the amount paid into the Treasury from 1st October, 1809, to 30th September, 1810, as per statement K -	672,417 90
From the proceeds of duties on goods, wares, and merchandise, imported, and on the tonnage of vessels -	5,679,915 47
Amounting to -	7,998,912 21
Which sum of -	7,998,912 21
Together with the sum advanced during the year 1809, on account of the appropriation for the year 1810, amounting, as per last annual report, to -	1,087 79
Makes the amount of appropriation for the year 1810 -	$8,000,000 00

II. From repayments into the Treasury on account of advances to Commissioners of Loans, as will appear by the statement E, viz:

Repayment of principal advanced from the Treasury -	$2,639 37
Interest recovered -	420 85
	3,060 22
That the above-mentioned disbursements, together with the above stated balance which remained unexpended at the close of the year 1810, of	8,001,972 43
	360,999 68

And amounting, together, to - $8,362,972 11

Will be accounted for in the next annual report, in conformity to the accounts which shall then have been rendered to the Treasury Department.

That, in the mean while, the manner in which the said sum has been applied is estimated, as follows:

I. The repayments into the Treasury, on account of the principal, have, during the year 1810, amounted, as by the above mentioned statement E, to -	$2,639 37
II. The sums actually applied, during the year 1810, to the principal and interest of the public debt, are estimated as follows:
1. Paid in reimbursement of the principal of the public debt, and including the whole of the exchanged six per cent. stock -	$5,163,476 93
2. Paid on account of interest and charges on the same -	2,698,664 10
	7,862,141 03

As will appear by the estimate F.

III. The balance which remained unexpended, at the close of the year 1810, and applicable to payments falling due after that year, is estimated, per estimate G, at -	498,191 71
	$8,362,972 11

That, in conformity to the resolution of the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund, of April 26th, 1810, there was reimbursed, at the close of the year 1810, the residue of the exchanged six per cent. stock, amounting to $3,751,125 26; which sum of $3,751,125 26, forms a part of the sum of $5,163,476 93, above stated, as the amount of the principal of the public debt reimbursed in the year 1810.

And that the statement H exhibits the amount of stock transferred to the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund, and to the Treasurer of the United States, in trust for said States, and standing to their credit on the books of the Treasury, on the 31st December, 1810, no stocks having been transferred in payment for lands during the year 1810.

All which is respectfully submitted.

ALBERT GALLATIN.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, Feb. 1, 1811.

[The tabular statements are omitted.]

SETTLERS ON THE PUBLIC LANDS.

[Communicated to the House, January 9, 1811.]

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, Jan. 7, 1811.

The Secretary of the Treasury, in obedience to the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 17th ultimo, respectfully reports:

That, in conformity with the provisions of the act "to prevent settlements being made on lands ceded to the United States, until authorized by law," the Registers of the land districts east and west of Pearl river, in the Mississippi Territory, were instructed to give public notice of the act, and to invite persons who had settled on the public lands to avail themselves of the permission granted to them by the act to remain as tenants at will, on their signing declarations that they laid no claim to the land. Copy of which instructions (marked A,) is hereto annexed.

That it will appear, from the letter of the Register of the Land Office west of Pearl river, dated 28th of March, 1807, and from the transcripts of permission granted in that district to such settlers, (copies of which, marked B, B 2, and B 3, are hereto annexed,) that they did generally comply with the provisions of the law, and sign the declarations required from them.

That no information of a subsequent date has been received, respecting intrusions on the public lands in that district, nor is it believed that such intruders are numerous, or lay any claim to the land, those only excepted who derive their claim from certain species of British and Spanish grants, on which Congress has not yet made a final decision.

That no returns of permissions granted east of Pearl river were received from the late Register of that Land Office, and that the term for granting them had expired before the present Register was appointed to that office.

That, although no official information has been received by this department respecting the number of intruders, in that district, which includes all the settlements on the river Mobile, it is sufficiently known that they are more numerous than in any other part of the Mississippi Territory; but that it has never been suggested that any of them laid any claim to the land.

That the measures taken prior to the year 1810, for carrying the provisions of the law into effect in Madison county, are detailed in the report, made on the 15th day of December, 1809, to the House of Representatives, and which is respectfully referred to.

That, information having been subsequently received that the claim of Michael Harrison, a Yazoo claimant, was revived, and that he remained on the land, the subject was again laid before the President, and the information communicated to the Secretary of War, as will appear by the correspondence, (marked C.)

That, no power being vested in the Secretary of the Treasury, or in any of the land officers, to take any measures for the removal of intruders, the actual orders given in this instance to that effect did not fall within the province of, and were not transmitted by, the Treasury Department.

And that, as it is not made the particular duty of any local officer to enforce the penalties imposed by the law, it necessarily follows that the evil is neither checked in its first beginning, nor known to the Executive, until its magnitude has become such as to require, for its suppression, the application of military force.

All which is respectfully submitted.

ALBERT GALLATIN.

A.

Copy of a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury to Thomas Williams, Esq., Register of the Land Office west, and Nicholas Perkins, Esq., Register of the Land Office east, of Pearl river.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, March 28, 1807.

SIR: I enclose the copy of "An act to prevent settlements being made on lands ceded to the United States, until authorized by law."

It is thereby enacted, 1st. That persons who had settled on the public lands before the passing of the act, March 3, 1807, and did on that day reside on the same, may, by application to the Register, or to the Register's special deputy, obtain, on certain conditions, permission to remain on such lands.

2d. That it shall be lawful for the President of the United States to remove all those who may settle on the land after the passing of the act, or who, being settled previous thereto, shall not, before the 1st day of January next, have obtained permission to remain thereon, in the manner above-mentioned. Penalties, and a forfeiture of any supposed title, are also annexed to the offence, on which I will not dwell, as the first mentioned provisions of the act are those which you are to carry into effect.

You will please to appoint as many persons as you may think fit to receive applications, assigning to each such person a tract, designating, by precise boundaries, either one or more counties, or a certain number of townships, so as to render the applications easy to each settler. You may reserve to yourself a certain district, in which you may receive the applications yourself, or appoint a person for that district, as will best suit your own convenience.

The persons thus appointed must, as well as yourself, publish the substance of the act, so that the settlers may know generally that they will be removed, and exposed to penalties, if they do not apply for permissions, and that new settlements are altogether prohibited. Whenever an application is made, it should specify, with precision, the tract applied for, (not exceeding three hundred and twenty acres;) and if the land has been surveyed, the application must be for one or two quarter sections, to be specially designated. As, however, from ignorance, the parties may not be able always to do this, they must be assisted by the officer in framing the application; and even informal ones must not, in the first instance, be rejected, provided they state the water-courses on which the land lies, the date of the improvement, and by whom made. At the foot, or on the back of the application, or of the permission hereafter mentioned, the party must sign a declaration in the form annexed, (A).

All the applications received by the persons appointed by you must be transmitted to you, and you will thereupon grant permissions of the form (B); duplicates being signed by the parties, and retained by you.

The applications and permissions must be entered on a book kept for that purpose; but it is not necessary that they should be recorded at large. A register of the form (C) will be sufficient, and by endorsing on each application and permission its number, they may be always referred to from the register.

It is possible, that, from the extent of your district, and the inconvenience and delay arising from double transmission to and from you, of the applications and permissions, you may think it more eligible to authorize at once the persons appointed by you to grant the permissions. This you may do. But in that case, you must transmit to such persons the necessary instructions, and forms B and C; (the form A they must have at all events;) they must sign the permissions in their own names, adding the words "for A B, Register of the Land Office of —;" and they must, on the 1st of January next, transmit to you the Register's applications and duplicates of permissions, signed by the parties. You will, as soon thereafter as may be, state to this Department the number of applications and permissions, and, where the land has been surveyed, transmit a list of the tracts for which permissions have been given.

It may not be improper to remark, that such persons as may have formed settlements subsequent to the date which would entitle them to a right of pre-emption, cannot refuse to sign the required declaration, since they do not lay any claim to the land; and without pretending to encourage their expectations, a cheerful compliance on their part with the law, by signing the law, and thus acknowledging themselves to be tenants at will of the United States, would not certainly injure their cause.

As to the persons who, having obtained pre-emptions, wish that they may be converted into donations, it is sufficient to observe, that the present law is inapplicable to them; for their claims being recognised and confirmed as pre-emptions, they cannot be disturbed in their possession, and are positively excepted from the operation of the law.

Congress having directed special reports to be made of all complete British grants, duly filed with the Register, but not confirmed for want of a settlement, before 27th October, 1795, and also of all incomplete titles, which would have been confirmed had they not been granted to minors; these two descriptions of claims must be viewed as being still under the consideration of the Legislature; and claimants of either description, who have, prior to the passing of the present law, made settlements on lands thus claimed, will not be disturbed, though they may not sign the declaration required by the act. The President has also instructed me to say, that a representation having been made to Congress in favor of persons claiming under incomplete Spanish titles, not confirmed for want of actual settlement, on the 27th October, 1795, which representation has not yet been decided upon by that body, he will not order claimants of that description, who have, prior to the passing of the present law, settled on lands thus claimed, to be removed till after the end of the next session of Congress. But this indulgence will not be extended to persons forming settlements after the passing of the act, nor must it, by any means, be construed as giving any sanction whatever to the claim.

It may, perhaps, be useful that the inhabitants of the territory should be made acquainted with the intention of the President, as it relates to these several descriptions of persons.

The certificate, contemplated by the last section of the act, must be expressed in the very words of the act, and will be given by you on the application of either the person acting as marshal, or of the attorney prosecuting for the United States. But as the President has not yet issued any instructions on the subject of removing the intruders, it is not probable that any such application will soon be made. It will be desirable, in the meanwhile, that you should obtain, through the channel of the persons whom you will appoint for the purpose of receiving applications, or in any other way, an estimate of the number of intruders on the public lands in your district, and also whether any of them lay, or pretend to lay, any claim to the land.

And I have to request that you would, from time to time, give information both to this Department and to the officer acting as marshal, of any new intrusions which may take place.

Should any application be made for a lead mine or salt spring, you will be pleased to transmit the same to this office, together with your opinion of the terms on which it might be proper to lease the same. I am, &c.

Copy of a letter from the Register of the Land Office west of Pearl river to the Secretary of the Treasury.

LAND OFFICE WEST OF PEARL RIVER.

August 10, 1807.

SIR: I have delayed acknowledging the receipt of your letter of the 28th March, covering an act for the prevention of settlement on public lands, until I could have it in my power to give you some account of the measures pursued, in order to carry such of the provisions of that law into effect, as appear to have been particularly in your view.

Instead of selecting a number of deputies in the different parts of my district, for the purpose of receiving applications and issuing permissions, I thought it the better course to appoint particular places, along on the frontiers, where I could meet the people in person, and soften, as far as possible, the irritation this law had excited, and to explain away misrepresentations, if any were afloat. I have just returned from this service, and am happy to inform you that the experiment has done justice to my expectations. So far from witnessing any irregularity, I found nothing but a disposition to comply promptly with the law. This is to be attributed, not to my feeble efforts, but to the good sense and temperance of the people, and, above all, to that sound Republican maxim, that a law, although it may be deemed a bad one, is, nevertheless until repealed, sovereign.

It cannot, however, be denied, that they were, and still are, alarmed at some of the provisions of this law; and, indeed, from their situation, it is impossible they should be otherwise. Some of those settlers commenced their improvements three or four years ago, under an impression that the lands would be open for sale in a short time. They have continued to improve from necessity, and are now seriously apprehensive that speculators will compel them to pay for their own labor. Let it be recollected that those settlers were not intruders in the strict sense of the word. In seating themselves on the land, their views were to purchase whenever the United States would sell; and they have been extremely anxious for the arrival of this period. When it is considered that the only boon they ask of the Government, is to purchase for a bona fide consideration, I think it may be truly said, they ask but little indeed; and it is to be sincerely regretted that this little should be withheld. I speak with a warmth on this subject which your goodness will excuse. I have been among those people. In them I see industrious citizens, honestly and honorably engaged in the acquisition of a competence for their families, and firmly attached to the principles of our Government. These, sir, are claims to public patronage, which I feel fully persuaded will strike you with equal force. To quiet their fears, and put their anxieties at rest, I would respectfully suggest, that a right of pre-emption is the only thing, under all circumstances, calculated to produce those happy effects.

There are a number of settlers on lands which have been adjudged by the commissioners to be antedated grants.

I have declined granting permissions to settlers, until I could receive instructions from you, giving them assurances that those instructions would arrive in time to enable them to comply with the law, if your decision should be that they are within its purview. I shall leave this place the day after to-morrow for Richmond, to attend at Burr's trial; from thence I shall proceed to Washington City. In the meantime, I shall leave my office in the charge of Mr. Parke Walton, whose knowledge of business and zealous fidelity will prevent any public inconvenience from my absence, and will insure a prompt obedience to all instructions which may issue from the Treasury.

I have the honor to be, with high consideration, your most obedient servant,

THOMAS H. WILLIAMS.

A. GALLATIN, Esq., Sec'y of the Treasury.

Correspondence respecting the intruders in Madison county, Mississippi Territory, subsequent to the report of the 15th December, 1809, to the House of Representatives.

Extract of a letter from John Brahan, Esq., Receiver of Public Moneys at Nashville, to the Secretary of the Treasury, dated

APRIL 20, 1810.

The people of Madison county complain very much in having to pay so heavy a land tax this year: the money is to be collected by the 1st September; and, indeed, many of them are almost unable to pay it without inconveniences. The late decision of the Supreme Court has occasioned a great deal of clamor here about Cox's claim. I have assured the people to rest content; that they will keep the land they purchased, in defiance of any other claim; though some of the purchasers are yet uneasy. I went down to Madison county a few weeks ago, to satisfy them as far as I could, which had a good effect; notwithstanding all this, people are entering land in the office here almost every day; resting, very properly, their confidence in the General Government to make them good titles.

Extract of a letter from William Dickinson, Esq., Register of the Land Office at Nashville, to the Secretary of the Treasury, dated

JUNE 9, 1810.

I also enclose an extract of a letter from William H. Winston, Esq., clerk of the county court of Madison. The account he gives has been confirmed by several other letters to the Receiver of Public Moneys and myself.

It appears that many persons have recently purchased from Michael Harrison lands which have been sold under the authority of the United States.

That some few who had purchased from the United States have, in order to quiet their claim, purchased also from Harrison.

That the purchasers from Harrison have given warning to purchasers from the United States, to give immediate possession; this, I am informed, has given much uneasiness.

Harrison is making considerable sales, and exhibits the late decision in the Supreme Court of the United States, as a confirmation of his title.

I am induced to believe the sales here will be very inconsiderable hereafter. The late decision in the Supreme Court of the United States, viz: Fletcher vs. Peck, has been industriously circulated by the claimants from the State of Georgia, and all possible means made use of to impress on the minds of the people an opinion that this decision completely confirms their title, in opposition to that of the United States.

I am induced to believe that few who have purchased at this office will favor Harrison's claim; but the number of residents without certificates or permission is considerable, and from that class he will draw his principal support.

I propose to attend the court in Madison on the 1st Monday in July. Whatever information I may procure, I shall immediately after my return forward on to you.

Extract of a letter from Wm. H. Winston, Esq., Clerk of Madison County Court, dated

MAY 26, 1810.

At this time, nothing is talked of here but Harrison's claim; a great number of persons have come in from various parts of Virginia and purchased from him, lands previously sold by the United States; and those claimants have ordered off the purchasers under the United States, which has occasioned much uneasiness.

Very little land will be sold, until a change in the public sentiment takes place relative to Harrison's claim, in favor of which I find a very considerable number of the people in this country.

Copy of a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury to the Secretary of War, dated.

JUNE 27, 1810.

SIR: I have the honor to enclose a letter from the Register of the Land Office of Madison county, showing the necessity of an early execution of the intended removal of intruders in that county.

There are two classes of persons, who, according to law, cannot be removed, viz: 1. Those who have purchased lands from the United States. 2. Those who, having signed the requisite declarations, have received written permissions to remain on the land. Although every individual of either description may show evidence, in writing, of his right to remain on the tract he occupies, I have directed copies to be prepared and transmitted to the War Department, of the returns both of sales and permissions. These will facilitate the necessary discrimination; and in order to prevent any mistake, William Dickson, Register of the Land Office, and residing at Nashville, will be instructed to furnish the officers commanding the detachment with a supplementary list of the sales subsequent to the returns last received, and with that of persons, if any, who may have obtained permissions, and not been returned to this office.

These observations apply exclusively to persons residing on those lands purchased both from the Cherokees and Chickasaws, which form Madison county. No sale has been made or permission been granted by the United States, to remain on any part of the lands lying west of Madison county, which were ceded by the Cherokees, but are not included in the Chickasaw purchase. I have the honor, &c.

Copy of a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury to the Secretary of War, dated

JULY 2, 1810.

SIR: In conformity with the intimation given in my letter of the 27th ultimo, I have now the honor of transmitting to you lists of those two classes of persons, who, according to law, cannot be removed from the public lands in Madison county. I have the honor, &c.

Extract of a letter from John Brahan, Esq., Register of the Land Office at Nashville, to the Secretary of the Treasury, dated

JUNE 4, 1810.

I am sorry to say that the claim of Zachariah Cox, in Madison county, is making a very considerable noise, and creating much confusion there; Colonel M. Harrison, who yet resides in Madison county, appears to be the principal and most active person in the business. I am informed, by respectable authority, that he is selling out his claim to lands there, and that he has been surveying the lands sold by him under the title of Cox, and, in some instances, the land sold by the United States at the late public sales in this place. If Colonel M. Harrison is permitted to remain in Madison county, it will be productive of great injury to the sales of lands under the United States, for people will thereby be induced to believe that his title to the land is good. It would be well if he could be removed out of the country. A number of people would yet enter land in Madison county, if they could receive positive assurance that they would hold the lands when the last instalment was paid. An assurance of this kind would have a good effect. I have the honor, &c.

P. S. If Government would remove every person out of Madison county, except such as have purchased of the United States, it would be desirable, and would check the growing evil there in its infancy.

Extract of a letter from John Brahan, Receiver of Public Moneys at Nashville, to the Secretary of the Treasury, dated

JUNE 5, 1810.

I wrote you yesterday that Colonel Michael Harrison, claiming under Zachariah Cox, &c., was again selling out lands in Madison county under that title. It is said a number of people have purchased of him, and are settling there: if they are not immediately removed, it may be troublesome to remove them after a while.

Copy of a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury to the Secretary of War, dated

JULY 5, 1810.

SIR: I have the honor to enclose copies of letters, received by this day's mail from the Receiver of Public Moneys at Nashville, in order that it may be submitted to the President, whether a more speedy removal of Michael Harrison and his adherents, than had been contemplated, might not be directed. I have the honor, &c.

Extract of a letter from William Dixon, Register of the Land Office at Nashville, to the Secretary of the Treasury, dated

JULY 30, 1810.

SIR: I herewith enclose the returns for the month of June; a few sales were made during that month; this is to be attributed to the impression made on the minds of the people, by the late decision of the Supreme Court of the United States. The impression is now nearly done away, and the minds of the people generally quieted as to their titles. The speculations also which I noticed in my last are nearly, perhaps entirely, at an end.

Extract of a letter from John Brahan, Esq. to the Secretary of the Treasury, dated

JULY 12, 1810.

I discover that Colonel Harrison's claim, under Cox, is becoming more silent, and people are again entering lands in the office, more briskly than was the case some weeks ago.

PUBLIC ACTS OF CONGRESS;

PASSED AT THE THIRD SESSION OF THE ELEVENTH CONGRESS, BEGUN AND HELD AT THE CITY OF WASHINGTON, DECEMBER 3, 1810.

J. B. VARNUM,

Speaker of the House of Representatives.

GEO. CLINTON,

Vice-President of the United States, and President of the Senate.

Approved December 17, 1810.

JAMES MADISON.

An Act making an additional appropriation to supply a deficiency in the appropriation for the relief and protection of distressed American seamen, during the year one thousand eight hundred and ten.

Be it enacted, &c., That, for supplying the deficiency in the appropriation for the relief and protection of distressed American seamen in foreign countries, during the year one thousand eight hundred and ten, the further sum of seventy-six thousand dollars, to be paid out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, be and the same is hereby appropriated.

Approved, January 7, 1811.

An Act to continue in force for a further time the first section of the act, entitled "An act further to protect the commerce and seamen of the United States against the Barbary Powers."

Be it enacted, &c., That so much of the act passed on the twenty-fifth day of March, one thousand eight hundred and four, entitled "An act further to protect the commerce and seamen of the United States against the Barbary Powers," as is contained in the first section of the said act, and which was revived and continued in force for the time therein mentioned, by an act, entitled "An act to revive and continue in force for a further time the first section of the act, entitled "An act further to protect the commerce and seamen of the United States against the Barbary Powers," passed on the twelfth day of January, one thousand eight hundred and ten, be and the same is hereby continued in force until the fourth day of March, one thousand eight hundred and twelve: Provided, however, That the additional duty laid by the said section shall be collected on all such goods, wares, and merchandise, liable to pay the same, as shall have been imported previous to that day.

Approved, January 7, 1811.

An Act to fix the compensation of the additional Assistant Postmaster General.

Be it enacted, &c., That the additional Assistant Postmaster General, authorized by the act "regulating the Post Office Establishment," shall receive an annual salary of sixteen hundred dollars, payable quarter-yearly at the Treasury of the United States, to be computed from the time at which he may have entered upon the execution of the duties of his office.

Approved, January 17, 1811.

An Act to authorize the Secretary of War to ascertain and settle, by the appointment of Commissioners, the exterior line of the public land at West Point, with the adjoining proprietor.

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of War shall be and he is hereby authorized to settle the exterior line of the public land at West Point, in the State of New York, now in dispute with Thomas North, the adjoining proprietor; and for that purpose to appoint three Commissioners to ascertain the same, whose determination, or a majority of them—the same being first approved by the Congress of the United States—shall be final and conclusive in the premises. And any such Commissioner shall be entitled to receive at and after the rate of four dollars per diem, for the time necessarily employed in executing said commission or appointment.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That it shall and may be lawful for the commissioners who may be appointed under this act, or either of them, to issue process, in nature of a writ of subpoena, for any witness that may be required on a hearing in the premises; and any person duly served with such process shall be bound to appear and testify under the like penalty, and be liable to be proceeded against in the like manner, as is provided by law, in relation to any witness whose attendance is required in any court of the United States, to give testimony in any matter depending therein.

Approved, January 22, 1811.

An Act making appropriations for the support of the Military Establishment of the United States for the year one thousand eight hundred and eleven.

Be it enacted, &c., That, for defraying the expenses of the Military Establishment of the United States for the year one thousand eight hundred and eleven, for the Indian department, and for the expense of fortifications, arsenals, and armories, the following sums be, and the same hereby are respectively appropriated, that is to say:

For the pay of the Army of the United States, eight hundred and sixty-nine thousand nine hundred and sixty-eight dollars.

For forage, thirteen thousand seven hundred and fifty six-dollars.

For subsistence, six hundred and eighty-five thousand five hundred and thirty-two dollars and five cents.

For clothing, two hundred and ninety-three thousand eight hundred and four dollars.

For bounties and premiums, thirty thousand dollars.

For the medical and hospital department, fifty thousand dollars.

For camp-equipage, fuel, tools, and transportation, two hundred and seventy thousand dollars.

For ordnance, one hundred thousand dollars.

For fortifications, arsenals, magazines, and armories, including two thousand dollars for such a number of additional military storekeepers as may be required, two hundred and seventy-six thousand forty-nine dollars and seventy-six cents.

For purchasing maps, plans, books, and instruments, two thousand five hundred dollars.

For contingencies, fifty thousand dollars.

For the salary of clerks employed in the military agents' offices, and in the office of the inspector of the army, three thousand five hundred dollars.

For the Indian department, one hundred and forty-six thousand five hundred dollars.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the several sums, specifically appropriated by this act, shall be paid out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Approved, February 6, 1811.

An Act making appropriations for the support of the Navy of the United States for the year one thousand eight hundred and eleven.

Be it enacted, &c., That, for defraying the expenses of the navy of the United States for the year one thousand eight hundred and eleven, the following sums be, and the same are hereby respectively appropriated, that is to say:

For the pay and subsistence of the officers, and pay of the seamen, seven hundred and seventy-four thousand three hundred and ninety dollars.

For provisions, three hundred and eighty-five thousand, three hundred and thirty dollars.

For medicines, instruments, and hospital stores, thirty thousand dollars.

For repairs of vessels, two hundred and fifty thousand dollars.

For freight, store-rent, and all other contingencies, one hundred thousand dollars.

For pay and subsistence of the marine corps, including provisions for those on shore and forage for the staff, one hundred and thirty-eight thousand two hundred and fifty-six dollars and ninety cents.

For clothing for the same, thirty-seven thousand nine hundred dollars and ninety cents.

For military stores for the same, one thousand three hundred and ninety-six dollars and twenty-five cents.

For medicines, medical services, hospital stores, and all other expenses on account of the sick belonging to the marine corps, three thousand dollars.

For quartermasters' and barrackmasters' stores, officers' travelling expenses, armorers' and carpenters' bills, fuel, premiums for enlisting men, musical instruments, bounty to music, and other contingent expenses of the marine corps, fifteen thousand dollars.

For the expenses of navy yards, comprising docks and other improvements, pay of superintendents, storekeepers, clerks, and laborers, seventy-five thousand dollars.

For ordnance and small arms, sixty thousand dollars.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the several sums, specifically appropriated by this act, shall be paid out of any moneys in the Treasury, not otherwise appropriated.

Approved, February 7, 1811.

An Act providing for the final adjustment of claims to lands, and for the sale of the public lands in the Territories of Orleans and Louisiana.

Be it enacted, &c., That the following allowances and compensations shall be made to the several officers appointed for the purpose of ascertaining the rights of persons claiming lands in the Territories of Orleans and Louisiana; which allowances and compensation shall be in full for all their services, including those rendered since their salaries respectively ceased, that is to say: To each of the commissioners, and to each of the clerks of the boards, fifty cents for each claim, duly filed according to law, which remained undecided on the first day of July, one thousand eight hundred and nine, and on which a decision has been made subsequent to that day, or shall hereafter be made, whether such decision be in favor or against the claim: which allowance of fifty cents shall be paid at the Treasury of the United States, from time to time, and on receipt of the transcripts of the decisions and of the reports of claims not finally confirmed, as the same may be transmitted by the boards respectively to the Secretary of the Treasury according to law. To each of the said commissioners and clerks a further allowance of five hundred dollars, to be paid after the completion of the business of each of the boards respectively, to the officers then in office. And to each of the translators, at the rate of six hundred dollars a year, and not to exceed in the whole for each the term of eighteen months: Provided always, That the above mentioned allowance of fifty cents for each claim decided upon, shall not be made to any of the commissioners who may be absent at the time of such decision; the attendance of each to be certified by the clerk, or by a majority of the board: And provided also, That no allowance shall be made to any agent heretofore employed by the Secretary of the Treasury, for any period of time subsequent to the time when such agent ceased to act, or when the board ceased to receive evidence.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the two principal deputy surveyors of the Territory of Orleans shall, and they are hereby authorized, in surveying and dividing such of the public lands in the said Territory, which are or may be authorized to be surveyed and divided, as are adjacent to any river, lake, creek, bayou, or water course, to vary the mode heretofore prescribed by law, so far as relates to the contents of tracts, and to the angles and boundary lines, and to lay out the same into tracts as far as practicable, of fifty-eight poles in front and four hundred and sixty-five poles in depth, of such shape, and bounded by such lines as the nature of the country will render practicable, and most convenient: Provided, however, That such deviations from the ordinary mode of surveying shall be made with the approbation of, and in conformity with, the general instructions which may be given to that effect by the surveyor of the public lands south of the State of Tennessee.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That, for the disposal of the lands of the United States lying in the eastern land district of the Territory of Orleans, a land office shall be established at New Orleans; and that for the disposal of the lands of the United States lying south of Red river, in the western land district of the Territory of Orleans, a land office shall be established at Opelousas; and that for the disposal of the lands of the United States lying north of Red river, in the Territory of Orleans, a land office shall be established, which shall be kept at such place as the President of the United States may direct. The register of the western land district of the Territory of Orleans shall act as register of the land office of Opelousas, and as one of the commissioners for ascertaining the rights of persons claiming lands in any part of the said western land district. And for the land office north of the Red river, a register, and for each of the said three offices, a receiver of public moneys shall be appointed, who shall give security in the same manner, in the same sums, and whose compensations, emoluments, duties, and authority, shall in every respect be the same, in relation to the lands which shall be disposed of at their offices, as are or may be provided by law, in relation to the registers and receivers of public moneys in the several offices established for the disposal of the lands of the United States in the Territory of Mississippi.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the powers vested in the President of the United States by the eleventh section of the act, entitled "An act supplementary to an act, entitled 'An act for ascertaining and adjusting the titles and claims to land within the Territory of Orleans, and the district of Louisiana,'" passed on the twenty-first day of April, one thousand eight hundred and six, in relation to the public lands lying in the western district of the Territory of Orleans, and all the other provisions made by the same section, for the sale of the said lands, and for obtaining patents for the same, shall be and the same are hereby in every respect extended to the public lands lying in the eastern district of the Territory of Orleans.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That every person who, either by virtue of a French or Spanish grant, recognised by the laws of the United States, or under a claim confirmed by the commissioners appointed for the purpose of ascertaining the rights of persons claiming lands in the Territory of Orleans, owns a tract of land bordering on any river, creek, bayou, or water-course, in the said Territory, and not exceeding in depth forty arpens, French measure, shall be entitled to a preference in becoming the purchaser of any vacant tract of land adjacent to, and back of, his own tract, not exceeding forty arpens, French measure, in depth, nor in quantity of land, that which is contained in his own tract, at the same price, and on the same terms and conditions, as are, or may be provided by law for the other public lands in the said Territory. And the principal deputy surveyor of each district respectively, shall be and he is hereby authorized, under the superintendence of the surveyor of the public lands south of the State of Tennessee, to cause to be surveyed the tracts claimed by virtue of this section; and in all cases where, by reason of bends in the river, lake, creek, bayou, or water course, bordering on the tract, and of adjacent claims of a similar nature, each claimant cannot obtain a tract equal in quantity to the adjacent tract already owned by him, to divide the vacant land applicable to that object between the several claimants, in such manner as to him will appear most equitable: Provided, however, That the right of pre-emption, granted by this section, shall not extend so far in depth, as to include lands fit for cultivation, bordering on another river, creek, bayou, or water course. And every person entitled to the benefit of this section shall, within three years after the date of this act, deliver to the register of the proper land office, a notice in writing, stating the situation and extent of the tract of land he wishes to purchase, and shall also make the payment and payments for the same, at the time and times which are or may be prescribed by law for the disposal of the other public lands in the said Territory: the time of his delivering the notice aforesaid, being considered as the date of the purchase. And if any such person shall fail to deliver such notice within the said period of three years, or to make such payment or payments at the time above-mentioned, his right of pre-emption shall cease and become void; and the land may thereafter be purchased by any other person in the same manner and on the same terms as are or may be provided by law for the sale of other public lands in the said Territory.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That the land offices established by virtue of the fourth section of this act, shall be opened on the first day of January, one thousand eight hundred and twelve, for the sale of all the public lands, with the exception of section "number sixteen," of the salt springs, and land contiguous thereto, and of the tracts reserved for the support of seminaries of learning, as hereinafter provided, which shall have been previously surveyed and the surveys thereof returned according to law to the registers of the land offices respectively; and on the first day of February, one thousand eight hundred and twelve, for the sale of such of the public lands, which, from the nature of the country, cannot be surveyed in the ordinary way, and are embraced by the provisions of the third section of this act, as shall have, at least six weeks previous to the said first day of February, one thousand eight hundred and twelve, been advertised for sale by the surveyor of the public lands south of the State of Tennessee, with the approbation of the President of the United States. The public sales for the lands, subdivided into quarter sections in the ordinary way, shall be held for one calendar month, under the superintendence of the register and receiver of each land office respectively, and of either of the surveyors of public lands south of Tennessee, or of his principal deputy surveyor in the district, who shall each receive six dollars for each day's attendance on the same; and no tract of land shall be sold at said public sales, for a less price than that which is or may be prescribed by law for the sale of public lands in the Mississippi Territory. And, from and after the first day of February, one thousand eight hundred and twelve, any tract which has been thus offered for sale at public sale, and remains unsold, as well as any tract of land embraced by the provisions of the third section of this act, the sale of which is authorized by this section, may be disposed of at private sale by the register of the land office, for the same price which is or may be prescribed by law, for the sale of the public lands in the Mississippi Territory. All the lands, sold [by] virtue of this section, shall in every other respect be sold on the same terms of payment and conditions, in the same manner, and under the same regulations, as are or may be prescribed by law, for the sale of public lands in the Mississippi Territory: Provided, however. That in case of an application being made at the same time, for the purchase at private sale of the same tract of land by two or more persons, one of whom did actually inhabit and cultivate such tract of land at the time of passing this act, and still continues to inhabit and cultivate the same at the time of such application, the preference shall be given to the person thus inhabiting and cultivating such tract of land: And provided, also, That, till after the final decision of Congress thereon, no tract of land shall be offered for sale, the claim to which has been in due time, and according to law, presented to the register of the land office, and filed in his office, for the purpose of being investigated by the commissioners appointed for the purpose of ascertaining the rights of persons claiming lands in the Territory of Orleans, or which shall have been located by or for Major General Lafayette, according to law.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That, in addition to the township already reserved for that purpose by law, in the western district of the Territory of Orleans, and which shall be located south of Red river, another entire township shall be located by the Secretary of the Treasury north of Red river, for the use of a seminary of learning, and also an entire township in the Territory of Louisiana, for the support of a seminary of learning within the said Territory.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That the surveyor general shall cause such of the public lands in the Territory of Louisiana as the President of the United States shall direct, to be surveyed and divided in the same manner and under the same regulations and limitations as to expenses, as is provided by law in relation to the lands of the United States northwest of the river Ohio, and above the mouth of Kentucky river.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That, for the disposal of the lands of the United States lying in the Territory of Louisiana, a land office shall be established, which shall be kept at such place as the President of the United States may direct; and a register and receiver of public moneys shall be appointed for said office, who shall give security in the same manner, in the same sums, and whose compensations, emoluments, duties, and authority, shall, in every respect, be the same, in relation to the lands which shall be disposed of at their office, as are or may be provided for by law, in relation to the register and receiver of public moneys in the several offices established for the disposal of the lands of the United States northwest of the river Ohio, and above the mouth of Kentucky river.

SEC. 10. And be it further enacted, That the President of the United States be and he is hereby authorized, whenever he shall think proper, to direct so much of the public lands lying in the Territory of Louisiana, as shall have been surveyed in conformity with the ninth section of this act, to be offered for sale. All such lands shall, with the exception of the section "number sixteen," which shall be reserved in each township for the support of schools within the same, with exception also of a tract reserved for the support of a seminary of learning, as provided for by the eighth section of this act, and with the exception also of the salt springs, and lead mines, and lands contiguous thereto, which, by the direction of the President of the United States, may be reserved for the future disposal of the said States, shall be offered for sale to the highest bidder, under the direction of the register of the land office, and the receiver of the public moneys, and of the principal deputy surveyor, and on such day or days as shall, by public proclamation of the President of the United States, be designated for that purpose. The sales shall remain open for three weeks, and no longer. The lands shall be sold for a price not less than that which has been or may be fixed by law for the public lands northwest of the river Ohio, and above the mouth of Kentucky river. And shall in every other respect be sold in tracts of the same size, on the same terms and conditions, as have been or may be by law provided for the lands sold in the State of Ohio. The superintendents of the said public sales shall each receive six dollars for each day's attendance on the said sales. All the lands which have been thus offered for sale, at public sale, remaining unsold at the closing of the public sales, may be disposed of at private sale by the register of the land office, for the same price which is or may be prescribed by law for the sale of public lands in the State of Ohio: Provided, however, That, till after the decision of Congress thereon, no tract of land shall be offered for sale, the claim to which has been in due time and according to law presented to the recorder of land titles in the district of Louisiana, and filed in his office, for the purpose of being investigated by the commissioners appointed for ascertaining the rights of persons claiming lands in the Territory of Louisiana. And patents shall be obtained for all lands sold in the Territory of Louisiana, in the same manner and on the same terms as is or may be provided, by law, for land sold in the State of Ohio.

SEC. 11. And be it further enacted, That the claim of the Corporation of the City of New Orleans, to the common adjacent thereto, and within six hundred yards from the fortifications of the same, as confirmed by the act, entitled "An act respecting claims to lands in the Territories of Orleans and Louisiana," shall be deemed valid, although the relinquishment of the said corporation to any claim beyond the said distance of six hundred yards, was not made till after the expiration of the period of six months, prescribed by the act last mentioned.

SEC. 12. And be it further enacted, That all navigable rivers and waters in the Territories of Orleans and Louisiana, shall be, and forever remain, public highways.

SEC. 13. And be it further enacted That a sum not exceeding forty thousand dollars be, and the same is hereby appropriated, for the purpose of carrying this act into effect, which sum shall be paid out of unappropriated moneys in the Treasury.

Approved, February 15, 1811.

An Act concerning the Bank of Alexandria.

Be it enacted, &c., That the corporation heretofore created by the name and style of the President, Directors, and Company of the Bank of Alexandria, by an act of the Legislature of the Commonwealth of Virginia, passed in the year seventeen hundred and ninety-two, entitled "An act for establishing a bank in the town of Alexandria;" the capital stock of which said bank hath been increased to five hundred thousand dollars; and which said corporation was, by an act of the said Commonwealth, passed in the year eighteen hundred and one, continued until the fourth day of March, eighteen hundred and eleven, be, and the said corporation shall, by the name and style aforesaid, be further continued from the fourth day of March next, until the fourth day of March, eighteen hundred and twenty-one, subject to the regulations prescribed by and made in the manner provided by this act.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the said corporation shall, by the name and style of the President, Directors, and Company of the Bank of Alexandria, be capable in law to hold, have, and purchase, receive, possess, enjoy and retain to them and their successors, lands, rents, tenements, hereditaments, goods, chattels and effects, of what kind, nature, or quality soever; and the same to grant, demise, alien or dispose of; and, by the name aforesaid, may sue and be sued, plead and be impleaded, answer and be answered, defend and be defended, in any court of record within the United States; and may do and execute every other matter and thing by the name aforesaid, that they are authorized to do by virtue of this act: Provided always, That the lands, tenements, and hereditaments, which it shall be lawful for the president, directors, and company to hold, shall be only such as shall be requisite for their immediate accommodation, in relation to the convenient transacting their business, and such as shall have been bona fide mortgaged to them by way of security, or conveyed to them in satisfaction for debts previously contracted in the course of their dealings: Provided also, That the president and directors shall not purchase any goods, chattels, or effects, unless such as are sold by virtue of an execution, upon judgments obtained by them, except such articles as may be necessary for them in transacting the business of the bank; but it shall be lawful for them to receive and hold such securities, goods, chattels, and effects, by way of deposit for advances made by them to any person or persons, and, on failure of payment, the same to sell and dispose of at public sale.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the capital stock of the said bank shall consist of five hundred thousand dollars, in shares of two hundred dollars each.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That every stockholder shall be entitled to vote by himself, his agent, or proxy, appointed under his hand and seal, at all elections, by virtue of this act; and shall have as many votes as he has shares, as far as ten shares, and not more than one vote for every share thereafter; and every stockholder may sell and transfer his stock in the bank, or any part thereof, at his pleasure, not being less than one complete share or shares; the transfer to be made in the bank books, in the presence, and with the approbation of the proprietor or his lawful attorney, and the purchaser then to be entitled, to all the rights which the original proprietor enjoyed.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That a meeting of the stockholders, at the town of Alexandria, shall be held annually, on the third Monday of January, in every year, during the continuance of this act; previous notice whereof shall be published in some newspaper, printed in Alexandria, Richmond, Winchester, or the City of Washington, for the space of four weeks successively; and the stockholders, assembled in consequence of such notice, shall choose by ballot, from among themselves, by a majority of votes of such as shall be present, or by proxy, nine directors, being citizens of the United States, for the term of one year thereafter; and on the same day annually, for and during the continuance of this act, a like election shall be made; and in case of refusal, death, resignation, disqualification or removal out of the District of Columbia, of any director, the remaining directors, at their next meeting thereafter, shall elect by ballot another person, qualified as aforesaid, in his place, for the residue of the year. The directors or any seven of them, shall, at their first meeting after every general election, elect by a majority of members present, by ballot, from among the stockholders, a president, who shall, whether a director or not, be thereupon entitled to all the powers and privileges of one; and if he was before a director another director shall be elected as aforesaid, so as to keep up the number of directors, prescribed by this act, exclusively of the President; and in case of refusal, death, resignation, or removal, out of the district aforesaid, of the president, the directors shall meet as soon as conveniently can be thereafter, and elect another person for president, in manner before directed.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That there be a meeting of the directors quarterly, for the purpose of regulating the affairs of the bank, any five of whom shall make a board; and that the board have power to adjourn from time to time; and the president, or any three of the directors, may call a special meeting at any other time they may think necessary.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted. That the board of directors shall determine the manner of doing business, and the rules and forms to be pursued; appoint and pay the various officers which they may find necessary; and dispose of the money and credit of the bank, at a rate not exceeding six per centum per annum; and make half yearly dividends of the profits, or of such part thereof as they may think prudent.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That, in the appointment of cashier of the said bank, a majority of the votes of seven directors shall be necessary to a choice.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That the board shall, at every quarterly meeting, choose three directors, to inspect the business of the bank, for the ensuing three months; and the inspectors so chosen, or any two of them, shall, on the evening of every Saturday, examine into the state of the cash account, and all the notes received and issued, and see that those accounts are regularly balanced and transferred.

SEC. 10. And be it further enacted, That any director, officer, or other person holding any share or capital of the said stock, who shall commit any fraud or embezzlement, touching the money or property of the said bank, shall be liable to be prosecuted in the name of the United States, by indictment for the same, in any court of law in the district wherein the offence shall be committed; and, upon conviction thereof, shall, besides the remedy that may be had by action, in the name of the President, Directors, and Company of the Bank of Alexandria, for the fraud aforesaid, forfeit all his share and stock in the said bank to the company.

SEC. 11. And be it further enacted, That it shall not be lawful for the bank hereby incorporated to loan, by discount or otherwise, more than twice the amount of its capital stock actually paid in.

SEC. 12. And be it further enacted, That no stockholder or member of the said company shall be answerable for any loss, deficiencies, or failure of the capital stock of said bank, for any more or larger sum or sums of money whatsoever, than the amount of the stock, stocks, or shares, which shall appear by the books of the said company to belong to him at the time or times when such loss or losses shall be sustained, except as is hereafter excepted, that is to say: if the total amount of debts, which the said company shall at any time owe, whether by bond, bill, note, or other contract, shall exceed double the amount of capital stock of the said bank actually paid in, over and above the moneys actually deposited in the bank for safe-keeping, then in case of such excess, the directors under whose administration it shall happen, shall be liable for such excess, in their natural and private capacities; and an action or actions of debt may be brought against them, or any of them, their heirs, executors, or administrators, in any court of record within the United States, by any creditor or creditors of the said company, and may be prosecuted to judgment and execution, any condition, covenant, or agreement to the contrary notwithstanding; but this shall not be construed to exempt the said body politic, or the lands, tenements, goods, and chattels of the same, from being liable for, and chargeable with, the said excess. Such of the directors who may have been absent when the said excess was contracted or created, or who may have dissented from the resolution or act, whereby the same was so contracted or created, may, respectively, exonerate themselves from being so liable by forthwith giving notice of the fact, and of his absence or dissent, to the Mayor of the town of Alexandria, for the time being, and to the stockholders, at a general meeting which he or they shall have power to call for that purpose. And in case the directors, by whose act such excess shall be occasioned, shall not have property sufficient to pay the amount of such excess, then each and every stockholder shall be liable in their private capacities for the deficiency, in proportion to their respective shares in said bank.

SEC. 13. And be it further enacted, That the president and directors shall not issue any note for a smaller sum than five dollars; and the president and directors shall, once in every year, lay before the Secretary of the Treasury an account, truly stating the situation of the bank, and its funds, if required.

SEC. 14. And be it further enacted, That no director shall be entitled to any emolument, unless the same shall have been allowed by a majority of the stockholders at a general meeting. The directors shall make such compensation to the president, for his extraordinary services and attendance at the bank, as shall appear to them reasonable.

SEC. 15. And be it further enacted, That none but a stockholder, being a resident of the District of Columbia, shall be eligible as a president or director.

SEC. 16. And be it further enacted, That every cashier or treasurer, before he enters upon the duties of his office, shall give bond, with two or more securities, to the satisfaction of the directors, for his good behaviour in office.

SEC. 17. And be it further enacted, That in case it shall at any time happen, that an election of directors shall not be made on any day when, pursuant to this act, it ought to be made, it shall and may be lawful on any other day to hold and make an election of directors, in such manner as shall have been regulated by the laws and ordinances of the said president and directors.

SEC. 18. And be it further enacted, That process of law, served on the president for the time being, shall be deemed sufficient service, and shall avail in like manner, as if it had been served on all the directors, to the intent and purpose of making the said corporate company responsible.

SEC. 19. And be it further enacted, That whenever any note shall be given, containing express consent in writing, that it may be negotiable at the said bank, and the same shall be endorsed, if payment be refused or neglected to be made, at the time it shall have become due, the like proceedings are to be had out of court, and suit may be prosecuted against the drawer and endorser, jointly or separately, in like manner as if the same was a bill of exchange.

SEC. 20. And be it further enacted, That the said bank shall continue to transact its business of discount and deposit in the county of Alexandria, in the District of Columbia.

Approved, February 15, 1810.

An Act to incorporate the Bank of Washington.

Be it enacted, &c., That, from and after the fourth day of March, which will be in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and eleven,

all those persons, their legal representatives or assigns, who on the first Monday of September, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and nine, at the City of Washington, subscribed certain articles of association, and formed a company or limited partnership, under the name and style of "The President and Directors of the Bank of Washington," and who, on the said fourth day of March, in the year eighteen hundred and eleven, shall hold any share of the joint stock or funds, created in pursuance of the said articles of association, and their successors, being stockholders as aforesaid, shall be, and they are hereby, incorporated, and made a body corporate and politic, by the name and style of "The President and Directors of the Bank of Washington;" and by that name may sue and be sued, implead and be impleaded, answer and be answered, defend and be defended, in courts of record and any other place whatsoever; and by that name may have and hold, purchase, receive, possess, enjoy, and retain lands, rents, tenements, hereditaments, goods, chattels, and effects, of what nature, kind, or quality soever; and the same sell, grant, demise, alien, and dispose of; and by that name shall have succession, during the continuance of this act, and may make, have, and use a common seal, and the same may break, alter, and renew at pleasure; and shall have power to ordain, establish, and put in execution such by-laws, ordinances, and regulations as shall seem necessary and convenient for the government of the said corporation, not being contrary to law, nor to the constitution thereof; and, generally, to do and execute all acts necessary or proper for the objects of the said incorporation, subject to the rules, regulations, restrictions, limitations, and provisions herein described and declared.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the capital stock of the said bank shall consist of five hundred thousand dollars, money of the United States, to be divided into shares of twenty dollars each; of which, ten dollars on each share will, according to the articles of association aforesaid, have been paid before the said fourth day of March, eighteen hundred and eleven; and it shall be optional with any stockholder thereafter to fill up his or her share or shares, by the payment, at any one time, of the residue of the money due thereon, who shall thereupon be entitled to receive dividends in future, in proportion to the whole amount paid upon such share or shares: Provided, That the dividend or dividends, on such sums of money so paid, shall not commence until the first day of the month next ensuing such payment.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the said bank shall transact its business in the City of Washington.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the affairs of the bank shall be conducted by twelve directors and a president, whose place, if chosen from among their number, shall be supplied by that body. Six of the directors, with the president, shall form a board or quorum for transacting all the business of the company. In case of his sickness or necessary absence, his place may be supplied by any director, whom he, by writing under his hand, may nominate for that purpose; or, in case of his not making such nomination, the board may appoint a president to act during his absence. The president and directors who may be in office, under the said articles of association, on the said fourth day of March, eighteen hundred and eleven, shall continue in office under and by virtue of this act of incorporation, until others shall be duly chosen in their stead. No person shall be a director or president who is not a citizen of the United States and a stockholder; and a director ceasing to be a stockholder shall cease to be a director. And no person, a director of another bank, shall be a director of this bank. Every stockholder, being a citizen of the United States, shall be entitled to vote at all elections to be holden by the stockholders, in pursuance of this act, and shall have as many votes, in proportion to the stock he may hold, as follows: for one share, and not exceeding two shares, one vote each; for every two shares above two, and not exceeding ten, one vote; for every four shares above ten, and not exceeding thirty, one vote; and for every six shares above thirty, and not exceeding sixty, one vote; for every eight shares above sixty, and not exceeding one hundred, one vote; and for every ten shares above that number, one vote. But no person or persons, bodies corporate, or otherwise, shall be entitled to more than fifty votes. But no stockholder shall be permitted to vote, who has not held his stock two calendar months prior to the day of election. All stockholders, living in the City of Washington, shall vote in the choice of directors by ballot in person; but every stockholder, living out of said city, may vote in person or by a written ballot by him or her subscribed with his or her name, and duly acknowledged before a judge of a court, a justice of the peace, or a notary public: a certificate whereof shall be made on said ballot by the judge, justice of the peace, or notary public, before whom such acknowledgment shall be made, and said ballot shall by him be sealed up, and addressed to the cashier of the bank; and being transmitted before the time of the election, shall be received and counted in the election. No person who is not a citizen of the United States shall be entitled to vote in any election of this corporation. Provided nevertheless, That this section may at any time hereafter be altered or amended by Congress, in such manner as they may see fit, so as to provide for an annual rotation of the directors.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That a general meeting of the stockholders of the said bank shall be holden on the first Monday of January, in the year eighteen hundred and twelve, and on the first Monday of January in every year thereafter, at such place as the president and directors shall appoint, by giving four weeks notice in one or more of the newspapers of the City of Washington, for the purpose of electing directors for the ensuing year, who shall meet on the day succeeding their election, and shall immediately proceed to choose a president; and the president and directors for the time being shall continue in office until others shall be duly elected in their places, and be organized by the assembling of a quorum, and the choice of a president. At all elections the persons having the greatest number of votes shall be deemed to be chosen. All elections shall be held under the superintendence of the president of the bank for the time being and four stockholders, not being at the time directors, appointed by the board of directors, any three of whom shall be judges thereof. They shall immediately thereafter notify the persons elected to meet the ensuing day at the bank, and shall make a return of the persons elected at their first meeting. Should two or more persons have an equal number of votes, the other individuals elected directors shall determine by ballot from among said persons, who shall be the director or directors. All elections shall be opened at ten o'clock in the forenoon, and closed at three in the afternoon.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That the president and directors shall have full power to make, revise, alter, and annul all such rules, orders, by-laws, and regulations, for the government of the said corporation, and that of its officers, servants, and affairs, as they shall, from time to time, think expedient; and to use, employ, and dispose of the capital stock, funds and property of the said bank, for the interest and benefit of the stockholders, subject only to the restrictions herein contained; but the said bank shall not take, for discounting any bill or note, more than at the rate of six per cent. per annum, upon the amount due by such bill or note.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That all promissory notes, bills of exchange, drafts, checks, and receipts, for the payment of money, made on behalf of the said bank, signed by the president, and countersigned or attested by the cashier, shall be obligatory upon the said body corporate, and shall possess the like qualities as to negotiability, and the holders thereof shall have the like actions thereupon, as if such promissory notes, bills of exchange, drafts, checks, or receipts, had been made by or on behalf of a natural person.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That the books, papers, correspondence, and funds of the bank, shall at all times be subject to the inspection of the directors. And the said president and directors shall once in every year cause to be laid before the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States an account truly stating the situation of the bank and its funds.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That the said president and directors shall have power to appoint a cashier, and all other officers and servants, for executing the business of the said bank, and to establish the compensation to be made to the president and all other officers and servants of the said bank respectively. But no compensation shall be given to a director for his services, except by a vote of the stockholders in general meeting.

SEC. 10. And be it further enacted, That the president and directors shall have power to call a general meeting of the stockholders, for purposes concerning the interests of the bank, giving at least six weeks notice in one or more of the newspapers of the City of Washington, specifying in such notice the object or objects of such meeting.

SEC. 11. And be it further enacted, That the shares of capital stock, at any time owned by any individual stockholders, shall be transferable only on the books of the bank, according to such rules as may, conformably to law, be established in that behalf by the president and directors; but all debts actually due and payable to the bank (days of grace for payment being past) by a stockholder, requesting a transfer, must be satisfied before such transfer shall be made, unless the president and directors shall direct to the contrary.

SEC. 12. And be it further enacted, That the dividends of the profits of the company, or so much of said profits as shall be deemed expedient and proper, shall be declared half yearly, in the first week in May and November, in each year; the amount of said dividend shall, from time to time, be determined by the president and directors, and shall in no case exceed the amount of the net profits actually acquired by the company, so that the capital stock of the said company shall never be impaired by dividends.

SEC. 13. And be it further enacted, That the said bank shall not at any time discount or loan a greater sum than double the amount of the capital stock thereof, which shall be actually paid in.

SEC. 14. And be it further enacted, That if the said directors shall at any time wilfully and knowingly make or declare any dividend, which shall impair the said capital stock, all the directors present at the making or declaring of said dividend, and consenting thereto, shall be liable in their individual capacities to the company for the amount or proportion of said capital stock so divided by the said directors; and each director, who shall be present at the making or declaring such dividend, shall be deemed to have consented thereto, unless he shall immediately enter, in writing, his dissent on the minutes of the proceedings of the board, and give notice thereof to the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States.

SEC. 15. And be it further enacted, That the bank shall in no case be owners of any ships or vessels, or directly or indirectly be concerned in trade, or the importation or exportation, purchase, or sale, of any goods, wares, or merchandise, whatever, except bills of exchange, bullion, stock of the United States, or of incorporated institutions, and such ships, vessels, goods, wares, or merchandise, as shall be truly pledged to them by way of security for debts due, owing or growing due to the said bank, or purchased by it to secure such debts.

SEC. 16. And be it further enacted, That the bank shall not purchase or hold any lands, tenements, or other real estates, other than what may be necessary for the convenient transaction of its business, unless such lands, tenements, and real estates shall have been bona fide mortgaged to the bank by way of security, or conveyed to it in satisfaction of debts previously contracted in the course of dealings, or purchased to secure debts, contracted with or due to the bank; and in every instance in which the bank may become the owners or claimants of lands, tenements, or real estates, the president and directors are empowered to sell or dispose of the same, in such manner as they may deem beneficial for the said bank.

SEC. 17. And be it further enacted, That if any vacancy shall at any time happen among the directors by death, resignation, or otherwise, the rest of the directors, for the time being, shall elect a director to fill the vacancy.

SEC. 18. And be it further enacted, That any number of stockholders, who shall be proprietors of not less than two thousand shares, may, for any purpose relative to the institution, at any time apply to the president and directors to call a general meeting of the stockholders, and if by them refused, the said number of stockholders, proprietors of not less than the number of shares aforesaid, shall have power to call a general meeting of the stockholders, giving at least sixty days notice in one or more of the public newspapers of the City of Washington, specifying in such notice the object or objects of such call.

SEC. 19. And be it further enacted, That the total amount of the debts, which the said corporation shall at any time owe, whether by bond, bill, note, or other contract, shall not exceed twice the amount of their capital stock actually paid over and above the moneys then actually deposited in the bank for safe keeping. In case of excess, the directors, under whose administration it shall happen, shall be liable for the same, in their natural and private capacities; and an action of debt may in such case be brought against them, or any of them, their or any of their heirs, executors, or administrators, in any court proper to try the same, by any creditor or creditors of said corporation, and may be prosecuted to judgment and execution; any condition, covenant, or agreement to the contrary notwithstanding. But this shall not be construed to exempt said corporation, or the lands, tenements, goods, or chattels of the same from being also liable for and chargeable with said excess. Such of said directors who may have been absent when said excess was contracted or created, or who may have dissented from the resolution or act whereby the same was so contracted or created, may respectively exonerate themselves from being so liable by forthwith giving notice of the fact, and of their absence or dissent, to the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, and to the stockholders, at a general meeting which they shall have a power to call for that purpose; and the body corporate, hereby created, and the capital stock thereof, shall be liable for all the debts and engagements contracted, or which, before or on the said fourth day of March, in the year eighteen hundred and eleven, shall be contracted by the company or co-partnership heretofore created by the articles of association herein before mentioned, and which carried on the banking business under the name and style of "The President and Directors of the Bank of Washington;" and the creditors of the said copartnership shall have the like remedy by action, against the said body corporate, as they had or have, or may or can have, against the said co-partnership.

SEC. 20. And be it further enacted, That in case it should at any time happen, that an election of directors should not be made on any day when, pursuant to this act, it ought to have been made, the said corporation shall not for that cause be deemed to be dissolved; but it shall be lawful on any other day to hold and make an election of directors, at a meeting to be called, in such manner as shall be prescribed by the laws and ordinances of the said corporation.

SEC. 21. And be it further enacted, That this act shall, to all intents and purposes, be deemed and held a public act, and be and continue in force for the term of ten years, from and after the fourth day of March, which will be in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and eleven, and no longer.

Approved, February 15, 1811.

An Act to incorporate the subscribers to the Farmers' Bank of Alexandria.

Be it enacted, &c., That the present subscribers to the Farmers' Bank of Alexandria, as well as those who shall hereafter become subscribers to the same, their successors and assigns, shall be, and they are hereby created a corporation and body politic by the name and style of the Farmers' Bank of Alexandria; and by that name and style shall be and are hereby made able and capable in law to have, purchase, receive, possess, enjoy, and retain, to them and their successors, lands, rents, hereditaments, goods, chattels, and effects, of what kind, nature, or quality soever; and the same to sell, grant, demise, alien, or dispose of; to sue and be sued, plead and be impleaded, answer, and be answered, defend and be defended, in courts of record or any other place whatsoever, subject nevertheless to the rules, regulations, restrictions, limitations, and provisions hereinafter prescribed and declared.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the capital stock of said corporation may consist of five hundred thousand dollars, divided into shares of fifty dollars each; and subscriptions, towards filling up the remaining part of said stock not already subscribed, may be opened by the president and directors of the bank, at such times and places, and under such regulations, as they shall direct; and it shall be lawful for any person, a citizen of the United States, to subscribe; and it shall be the duty of the president and directors to give notice in two newspapers, or more, published in the District of Columbia, of the times and places of opening such subscriptions, at least thirty days previous thereto; and each of said subscriptions shall be kept open one day at least, and such further time as said directors may order.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the lands, tenements, and hereditaments, which it shall be lawful for the said corporation to hold, shall be only such as shall be requisite for its immediate accommodation, in relation to the convenient transaction of its business, and such as shall have been conveyed to it, in satisfaction of debts previously contracted in the course of its dealings, or purchased at sales on judgments, which shall have been obtained for such debts; nor shall this corporation directly or indirectly deal in or trade in anything, except bills of exchange, gold or silver bullion; or in the sale of goods, really and truly pledged for money lent, and not redeemed in due time; or of goods sold by virtue of an execution, on a judgment obtained by them.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That, for the well ordering the affairs of the said corporation, there shall be thirteen directors, of whom there shall be an election on the first Monday in January, in each year, by the stockholders or proprietors of the capital stock of the said corporation, and by plurality of the votes actually given; and those who shall be duly chosen at any election shall be capable of serving as directors, by virtue of such choice, until the end or expiration of the Monday of January next ensuing the time of such election, and until others shall be chosen. But the first election of directors under this act shall not take place until the first Monday in January, in the year one thousand eight hundred and twelve; and the said directors, at their first meeting after each election, shall choose one of their number as president. No person, a director of another bank, shall be a director of this bank: Provided, That in case it should at any time happen, that an election of directors should not be made upon any day, when pursuant to this act it ought to have been made, the corporation shall not for that cause be deemed to be dissolved; but it shall be lawful on any other day, within fifteen days thereafter, to hold and make an election of directors, in such manner as shall have been regulated by the laws and ordinances of said corporation.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That no director shall be entitled to any emolument, unless the same shall have been allowed by the stockholders at a general meeting. The directors shall make such compensation to the president, for his extraordinary attendance at the bank, as to them shall appear reasonable.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That the directors for the time being shall have power to appoint such officers and servants under them, as may be necessary for executing the business of the said corporation, and to allow them such compensation for their services, respectively, as shall seem reasonable; and shall be capable of exercising such other powers and authorities for the well governing and ordering of the affairs of the said corporation as shall be described, fixed, and determined by the laws, regulations, and ordinances of the same.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That the president and directors shall determine the manner of doing business, and the rules and forms to be pursued, and dispose of the money and credit of the bank in such manner as shall seem to them best calculated to promote the interest of the proprietors.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That stockholders shall vote at all elections for directors, by ballot, in person, except those who shall reside out of the town of Alexandria, who may vote either in person, or by a written ballot, by him or her subscribed with his or her name, and duly acknowledged before a judge of a court, a justice of the peace, or notary public; a certificate whereof shall be made on said ballot, by the said judge, justice of the peace, or notary public, before whom such acknowledgement shall be made, and the said ballot shall be sealed up and directed to the cashier of the bank; and being transmitted to said cashier, before the time of the election, shall be received and counted in the choice of directors. No share or shares shall confer a right of suffrage, which shall not have been holden two calendar months previous to the day of election; and the number of votes to which each stockholder shall be entitled shall be in proportion to the number of shares he shall hold, as follows: For one share, and not exceeding two shares, one vote each; for every two shares above two, and not exceeding ten, one vote; for every four shares above ten, and not exceeding thirty, one vote; for every six shares above thirty, and not exceeding sixty, one vote; for every eight shares above sixty, and not exceeding one hundred, one vote; and for every ten shares above that number, one vote; but no person or persons, bodies corporate or otherwise, shall be entitled to more than fifty votes: Provided, That this section may at any time hereafter be altered or amended by Congress, in such manner as they may see fit, so as to provide for an annual rotation of directors.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That one month previous to each election of directors, the cashier shall cause to be made out a correct list of all the stockholders, which shall be subject to the inspection of any stockholder.

SEC. 10. And be it further enacted, That no person shall be eligible to hold the office of president or director, who is not a citizen of the United States, and a bona fide stockholder.

SEC. 11. And be it further enacted, That a majority of the whole number of directors shall be necessary in the choice of a president and cashier; but three members, with the president, may constitute a board for transacting the ordinary business of the bank.

SEC. 12. And be it further enacted, That the president and directors shall, as soon as they may deem it expedient, declare a dividend of profits; and every half year thereafter, shall make and declare such dividends of profit as they may deem proper; but no dividend shall be declared, except by a majority of all the directors.

SEC. 13. And be it further enacted, That the president and directors shall keep a book in which their proceedings at their meetings, as a board, shall be regularly recorded, and upon every question which may occur, the ayes and noes thereupon shall be noted, which record-book shall at all times be open to the inspection of any stockholder, not being a director, officer or servant of any other bank, who shall, six months previous to his application, be the proprietor of stock to the amount of three thousand dollars.

SEC. 14. And be it further enacted, That any number of stockholders, not less than twenty, owning together fifty thousand dollars of stock, shall be at liberty to call a meeting of the stockholders at any time, and may appoint three of their number as a committee to examine into the state and condition of the bank, and the manner in which its affairs have been conducted: Provided, That no member of such committee shall be a director, president, or other officer or servant of any other bank.

SEC. 15. And be it further enacted, That the president and cashier shall respectively give bond and security, and also take an oath, for the faithful discharge of their duties; the president in the sum of twenty thousand dollars, and the cashier in the sum of thirty thousand dollars; the other officers and servants shall also take an oath, and enter into bond and security, in such sums as the president and directors may prescribe.

SEC. 16. And be it further enacted, That the said bank shall not at any time discount or loan a greater sum than double the amount of the capital stock thereof, which shall be actually paid in.

SEC. 17. And be it further enacted, That all bills, bonds, notes, and every contract or engagement, on behalf of the corporation, for the payment of money, shall be signed by the president and countersigned by the cashier; and the funds of the corporation shall in no case be liable for any contract or engagement, unless the same shall be signed and countersigned as aforesaid; and the president and directors shall not issue any note for a smaller sum than five dollars.

SEC. 18. And be it further enacted, That it shall not be lawful for the president and directors, to demand or receive a greater discount or interest than at the rate of one per cent. for sixty days, upon any loans or advances of money which they may make.

SEC. 19. And be it further enacted, That the shares of the capital stock shall be transferrable at any time, according to such rules as may be established by the president and directors; but no stock shall be transferred, the holder thereof being indebted to the bank, until such debt be satisfied, except the president and directors shall otherwise order it.

SEC. 20. And be it further enacted, That every stockholder, whether he be so by original subscription or by transfer, shall be considered as a member of this corporation, and, when he ceases to be a stockholder, he shall cease to be a member.

SEC. 21. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the president, or, in his absence, such one of the directors as they shall appoint, to supply his place for the time, to preside at the board of directors, to vote on all questions, to minute the proceedings of the board, to cause all the orders and resolutions of the board to be carried into effect, to sign all bonds, bills, notes or other engagements, which the board of directors may, from time to time, direct to be issued for the payment of money, and, generally to superintend the affairs, and to watch over the interest of this corporation.

SEC. 22. And be it further enacted, That if a vacancy shall, at any time, happen in the office of president, director, cashier, or any other officer or servant of the bank, by death, resignation, disqualification or otherwise, the same may be filled by a majority of the directors for the time being.

SEC. 23. And be it further enacted, That no standing or unlimited accommodation shall be granted.

SEC. 24. And be it further enacted, That if any stockholder shall fail to pay up the several instalments upon his subscription, as the same may become due, his dividends upon such instalments as he may have paid shall cease as to him, and remain to the use and benefit of the other members of the corporation.

SEC. 25. And be it further enacted, That if the president and directors shall, at any time, wilfully and knowingly make and declare any dividend which shall impair the capital stock, or shall wilfully and knowingly violate or infringe any of the foregoing articles of this corporation, all the directors present at the making or declaring such dividends, or violating or infracting such article or articles, and consenting thereto, shall be liable in their individual capacities to the corporation, for the amount or proportion of said capital stock so divided, and also for any injury or damage that may accrue to creditors, in consequence of any such violation or infraction as aforesaid; and each director who shall be present shall be deemed to have assented thereto, unless he shall cause his dissent to be entered upon record: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to exempt the corporation from any liability, to any person or persons, which otherwise the said corporation might incur.

SEC. 26. And be it further enacted, That the president and directors shall have power—a majority of their whole number concurring—to make, revise, alter, or annul all such rules, orders, or by-laws, for the government of the corporation, and that of their officers, servants and affairs, as they may, from time to time, think expedient, not inconsistent with law.

SEC. 27. And be it further enacted, That any number of stockholders not less than twenty, who together shall be proprietors of two thousand shares, may, for any purpose, relative to this corporation, at any time apply to the president and directors to call a general meeting of the stockholders, and if by them refused, the said number of stockholders, proprietors of not less than that number of shares, shall have power to call a general meeting of the stockholders, giving at least thirty days' notice in one newspaper printed within the town of Alexandria, and one printed within the city of Washington, specifying in such notice the object or objects of such call.

SEC. 28. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States shall be (at least once in every year) furnished, from time to time, as he may require it, with statements of the amount of the capital stock of the said corporation, and of the debts due to the same, of the moneys deposited therein, of the notes in circulation, and of the cash in hand, and shall have a right to inspect such general accounts in the books of the bank, as shall relate to the said statements; Provided, That this shall not be construed to imply a right of inspecting the account of any private individual or individuals with the bank.

SEC. 29. And be it further enacted, That this corporation shall continue until the first day of January, in the year one thousand eight hundred and twenty-one; but nevertheless the proprietors of two-thirds of the capital stock of the company may, by their concurrent votes at a general meeting to be called for that purpose, dissolve the same at an earlier period: Provided, That notice of such meeting and its object shall be published in two or more newspapers, printed within the District of Columbia, for at least three months successively, previous to the time appointed for such meeting.

SEC. 30. And be it further enacted, That on the dissolution of this corporation, whenever the same shall be determined on as aforesaid, effectual measures shall be immediately taken by the president and directors, then in office, for closing all the concerns of the corporation, and for dividing the capital and profits which may remain, among the stockholders, in proportion to their respective interests.

SEC. 31. And be it further enacted, That this act shall not take effect until the fourth day of March, which will be in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and eleven, and shall, to all intents and purposes, be deemed and held a public act.

Approved, February 16, 1811.

An Act to incorporate the Bank of Potomac.

Be it enacted, &c., That, from and after the fourth day of March, which will be in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and eleven, all those who have or hereafter may become stockholders in the Bank of Potomac, their successors and assigns, shall be and they are hereby created and made a body politic, by the name and style of "The President, Directors and Company of the Bank of Potomac," and so shall continue until the fourth day of March, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and twenty-one, and no longer; and by that name shall have succession; and shall be and are hereby made able and capable in law to have, purchase and receive, possess, enjoy and retain, to them and their successors, lands, rents, tenements, hereditaments, goods, chattels and effects, of what kind, nature or quality soever, and the same to sell, grant, demise, alien or dispose of; and by the name aforesaid may sue and be sued, plead and be impleaded, answer and be answered, defend and be defended, in any court of law or equity. And by the name aforesaid may do and execute every other matter and thing, that they are authorized to do by virtue of this act: Provided always, That the lands, tenements, and hereditaments, which it shall be lawful for the said president and directors to hold; shall be only such as shall be requisite for their immediate accommodation, in relation to the convenient transacting their business, and such as shall have been bona fide mortgaged to them by way of security, or conveyed to them in satisfaction of debts previously contracted in the course of their dealings: Provided also, That the said president and directors shall not purchase any goods, chattels or effects, unless such as are sold by virtue of an execution upon a judgment obtained by them, except such articles as may be necessary for them in transacting the business of the bank; but it shall be lawful for them to receive and hold such securities, goods, chattels and effects, by way of deposit for advances made by them to any person or persons, and on failure of payment, the same to sell and dispose of at public sale.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the capital of the said bank shall consist, as it now does, of the sum of five hundred thousand dollars, divided into shares of one hundred dollars each.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That every stockholder, being a citizen of the United States, shall be entitled to vote at all elections to be holden by the stockholders in pursuance of this act, and shall have as many votes in proportion to the stock he may hold, as follows: For one share and not exceeding two shares, one vote each; for every two shares above two and not exceeding ten, one vote; for every four shares above ten and not exceeding thirty, one vote; for every six shares above thirty and not exceeding sixty, one vote; for every eight shares above sixty, and not exceeding one hundred, one vote; and for every ten shares above that number, one vote. But no person or persons, bodies corporate or otherwise, shall be entitled to more than fifty votes. No share or shares shall confer a right of suffrage, which shall not have been holden two calendar months previous to the day of election. And in the choice of directors, every stockholder shall vote in person, (except those who shall reside out of the town of Alexandria,) who may vote either in person or by a written ballot by him or her subscribed, with his or her name, and duly acknowledged before a judge of a court, a justice of the peace, or a notary public; a certificate whereof shall be made on said ballot by the said judge, justice of the peace or notary public, before whom such acknowledgment shall be made; and said ballot shall be by him sealed up, and addressed to the cashier of the bank, and being transmitted to said cashier before the time of the election of directors, said ballot shall be received and counted in the choice of directors. And every stockholder may sell and transfer his stock in the said bank, or any part thereof, at his pleasure, not being less than one complete share or shares, the transfer being made in the bank books, in the presence and with the approbation of the proprietor or his lawful attorney.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That an election shall be held in the town of Alexandria on the first Monday of November in each year, of which notice shall be given in one or more newspapers, printed in the town of Alexandria, four weeks at least, before said day of election. And the stockholders shall choose, by ballot, from among the stockholders, by a majority of votes, twelve directors, for the term of one year thereafter; and on resignation, disqualification or removal of any director, out of the county of Alexandria, in the District of Columbia, or out of the county of Fairfax, in the State of Virginia, the other directors, at their next meeting thereafter, shall elect by ballot another person, qualified as aforesaid, in his place, for the residue of the year. The directors shall, at the first meeting after every whole general election, elect by a majority of their number, by ballot from among their own number, a president, who shall be thereupon entitled to all the powers and privileges of one; and if he was before a director, another director shall be elected as aforesaid, so as to keep the number of directors, prescribed by this act, exclusive of the president, entire; and in case of the death, resignation or removal of the president, out of the county of Alexandria, or county of Fairfax aforesaid, or his refusal to accept his office, the directors shall meet as soon as conveniently can be thereafter, and elect another person for president, in the manner before directed; but the president and directors at present elected by the stockholders, shall continue to act, until their successors are chosen: Provided, That in case it should at any time happen, that an election of directors should not be made upon any day, when, pursuant to this act, it ought to have been made, the corporation shall not for that cause be deemed to be dissolved, but it shall be lawful on any other day, within fifteen days thereafter, to hold and make an election of directors, in such manner, as shall have been regulated by the laws and ordinances of said corporation. And provided nevertheless, That this section may at any time hereafter be altered or amended by Congress, in such manner as they may see fit, so as to provide for an annual rotation of the directors.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That there shall be a meeting of the directors quarterly, for the purpose of examining the affairs of the bank, any four of whom shall make a board; and the board shall have power to adjourn, from time to time; and the president, or any three of the directors, may call a special meeting at any other time that they may think proper.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That the board of directors, by a majority of votes, shall make by-laws, determine the manner of doing business, and the rules and forms to be pursued; and dispose of the money and credit of the bank, for the interest and benefit of the stockholders; and are hereby authorized to receive for discounts, made at the said bank, at the rate, and not exceeding six per cent. per annum, and make at the expiration of each half year, a dividend of the profit, or such part thereof, as they may think prudent.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That in appointing a cashier of the said bank, and all other officers, a majority of the whole directors shall be necessary to a choice.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That any director, officer, or other person, holding any share or capital of the said bank stock, who shall commit any fraud or embezzlement, touching the money or property of said bank, shall be liable to be prosecuted, in the name of the United States, by indictment for the same; and upon conviction thereof, shall, besides the remedy that may be had by action, in the name of the President and Directors of the Bank of Potomac, for the fraud aforesaid, forfeit to the company all his share and stock in the said bank.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That the said bank shall not at any time discount or loan a greater sum than double the amount of the capital stock, which shall be actually paid in.

SEC. 10. And be it further enacted, That no stockholder, or member of said company, shall be answerable for any losses, deficiencies or failure of the capital stock of the said bank, for any more or larger sum or sums of money whatsoever, than the amount of the stock, stocks, or shares, which shall appear by the books of said company to belong to him at the time or times when such loss or losses shall be sustained, except as is hereafter excepted, that is to say: If the total amount of the debts which said company shall at any time owe, whether by bond, note, bill, or other contract, exceed twice the amount of the capital stock of the said bank, over and above the moneys actually deposited in the bank for safe-keeping, then, in case of such excess, the directors, under whose administration it shall happen, shall be liable for such excess in their natural and private capacities; and an action or actions of debt may be brought against them, or any of their heirs, executors or administrators, in any court of record within the District of Columbia, by any creditor or creditors, of said company, and may be prosecuted to judgment and execution, any condition or covenant, or agreement, to the contrary notwithstanding; but this shall not be construed to exempt the said body politic, or lands, tenements, goods or chattels of the same, from being also liable for, and chargeable with said excess: Provided, That such of the said directors, who may have been absent when said excess was so contracted or created, or who may have dissented from the resolution or act, whereby the same was so contracted or created, may respectively exonerate themselves from being so liable, by forthwith giving notice of the fact, and of their absence or dissent, to the mayor of the town of Alexandria, for the time being, and to the stockholders, at a general meeting, which he or they shall have power to call for that purpose. And in case the directors, by whose act such excess shall be occasioned, shall not have property to pay the amount of such excess, then each and every stockholder, shall be liable in their private capacities for the deficiencies, in proportion to their respective shares in the said bank.

SEC. 11. And be it further enacted, That the said president and directors shall not issue any note for a smaller sum than five dollars; and the said president and directors shall, once in every year, cause to be laid before the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States an account, truly stating the situation of the bank and its funds.

SEC. 12. And be it further enacted, That no director shall be entitled to any emolument, unless the same shall have been allowed by a majority of the stockholders, at a general meeting, but the directors shall make such compensation to the president, for his extraordinary services and attendance at the bank, as shall appear to them reasonable.

SEC. 13. And be it further enacted, That none but a stockholder, being a citizen of the United States, and a resident of the county of Alexandria, or county of Fairfax aforesaid, shall be eligible as a president or director.

SEC. 14. And be it further enacted, That a number of stockholders, not less than twenty, who together shall be proprietors of one thousand shares or upwards, shall have power to call a general meeting of the stockholders, for purposes relative to the institution, giving at least six weeks notice in one or more newspapers, printed in the town of Alexandria, and specifying in such notice the object or objects of such meeting.

SEC. 15. And be it further enacted, That this act shall, to all intents and purposes, be deemed and held a public act.

Approved, February 16, 1811.

An Act to incorporate the Union Bank of Georgetown.

Be it enacted, &c., That, from and after the fourth day of March, one thousand eight hundred and eleven, all those persons, their legal representatives or assigns, who on the first Monday of November, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and nine, in Georgetown, District of Columbia, subscribed certain articles of association, and formed a company or limited partnership, under the name and style of the "President and Directors of the Union Bank of Georgetown," and who on the said fourth day of March, in the year eighteen hundred and eleven, shall hold any share of the joint stock or funds created in pursuance of the said articles of association, and their successors, being stockholders as aforesaid, shall be and they are hereby incorporated, and made a body corporate and politic, by the name and style of the "President and Directors of the Union Bank of Georgetown," and by that name may sue and be sued, implead and be impleaded, answer and be answered, defend and be defended, in courts of record and any other place whatsoever; and by that name may have and hold, purchase, receive, possess, enjoy and retain lands rents, tenements, hereditaments, goods, chattels and effects, of what nature, kind or quality soever, and the same sell, grant, demise, alien and dispose of. And by that name, shall have, during the continuance of this act, succession; and may make, have and use a common seal, and the same may break, alter and renew at pleasure; and shall have power to ordain, establish and put in execution, such by-laws, ordinances and regulations as shall seem necessary and convenient for the government of said corporation, not being contrary to law nor to the constitution thereof; and generally to do and execute all acts necessary or proper for the objects of said incorporation, subject to the rules, regulations, restrictions, limitations and provisions herein described and declared.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the capital stock of the said bank shall consist of five hundred thousand dollars, money of the United States, to be divided into shares of fifty dollars each; of which fifteen dollars on each share has been paid, according to the articles of association aforesaid; and it shall be optional with any stockholder hereafter to pay up the further sum of thirty-five dollars: Provided, That not more than fifty thousand dollars be paid, in any one year, unless the president and directors, by a rule or order, should authorize or permit a greater sum to be paid; the dividend or dividends on such sums of money so paid, shall not commence until the first day of the month next ensuing such payment.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the said bank shall transact its business in Georgetown.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the affairs of the said bank shall be conducted by twelve directors and a president, whose place, if chosen from among their number, shall be supplied by that body. Six of the directors, with the president, shall form a board or quorum for transacting all the business of the company, but the ordinary discounts may be done by the president and three directors. In case of his sickness or necessary absence, his place may be supplied by any director, whom he, by writing under his hand, may nominate for that purpose, or in case of his not making such nomination, the board may appoint a president to act during his absence. The president and directors who may be in office under the said articles of association on the said fourth day of March, eighteen hundred and eleven, shall continue in office under and by virtue of this act of incorporation, until others shall be duly chosen in their stead. No person shall be a director or president, who is not a citizen of the United States, and a stockholder; and a director ceasing to be a stockholder, shall cease to be a director; and no person, a director of another bank, shall be a director of this bank. Every stockholder, being a citizen of the United States, shall be entitled to vote at all elections to be held by the stockholders in pursuance of this act, and shall have as many votes, in proportion to the stock they may hold, as follows: for every share as far as twenty, one vote for each share, and one vote for every two shares thereafter, as far as forty; but no person or persons, bodies corporate or otherwise, shall be entitled to more than one hundred and fifty votes; no stockholder shall be permitted to vote, who has not held his stock two calendar months, prior to the day of election. All stockholders living in Georgetown, shall vote in the choice of directors by ballot in person: but every stockholder living out of said town may vote in person or by a written ballot, by him or her subscribed with his or her name, and duly acknowledged before a judge of a court, a justice of the peace, or a notary public; a certificate whereof shall be made on said ballot by the judge, justice of the peace, or notary public, before whom such acknowledgment shall be made: and said ballot shall by him be sealed up, and addressed to the cashier of the bank, and being transmitted before the time of the election, shall be received and counted in the election. No person who is not a citizen of the United States shall be entitled to vote in any election of this corporation: Provided, nevertheless, That this section may at any time hereafter be altered or amended by Congress, in such a manner as they may see fit, so as to provide for an annual rotation of the directors.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That a general meeting of the stockholders of the said bank shall be holden on the first Monday in April, in the year eighteen hundred and eleven, and on the first Monday of April, in every year thereafter, at such place as the president and directors shall appoint, by giving four weeks notice in two or more of the newspapers of the District, for the purpose of electing directors for the ensuing year, who shall meet on the day succeeding their election, and shall immediately proceed to choose a president; and the president and directors for the time being, shall continue in office until others shall be duly elected in their places, and be organized by the assembling of a quorum, and the choice of a president. At all elections the persons having the greatest number of votes shall be deemed to be chosen. All elections shall be held under the superintendence of the president of the bank, for the time being, and four stockholders, not being at the time directors, appointed by the board of directors, any three of whom shall be judges thereof. They shall immediately thereafter notify the persons elected to meet the ensuing day at the bank, and shall make a return of the person elected, at their first meeting. Should two or more persons have an equal number of votes, the other individuals elected directors shall determine, by ballot from among said persons, who shall be the director or directors. All elections shall be opened at ten o'clock in the forenoon, and closed at three in the afternoon.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That the president and directors shall have full power to make, revise, alter and annul all such rules, orders, by-laws and regulations, for the government of said corporation, and that of its officers, servants, and affairs, as they shall from time to time think expédient; and to use, employ, and dispose of the capital stock, funds and property of said bank, for the interest and benefit of the stockholders, subject only to the restrictions herein contained; but the said bank shall not take for discounting any bill or note, more than at the rate of six per cent. per annum, upon the amount due by such bill or note.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That all promissory notes, bills of exchange, drafts, checks, and receipts, for the payment of money made on behalf of the said bank, signed by the president and countersigned and attested by the cashier, shall be obligatory upon the said body corporate, and shall possess the like qualities as to negotiability, and the holders thereof shall have the like actions thereupon, as if such promissory notes, bills of exchange, drafts, checks or receipts, had been made by or on behalf of a natural person.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That the books, papers, correspondence, and funds of the bank shall at all times be subject to the inspection of the directors. And the said president and directors shall once in every year cause to be laid before the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States an account, truly stating the situation of the bank and its funds.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That the said president and directors shall have power to appoint a cashier, and all other officers and servants, for executing the business of said bank, and to establish the compensation to be made to the president and all other officers and servants of the said bank, respectively; but no compensation shall be given to a director for his services, except by a vote of the stockholders in general meeting.

SEC. 10. And be it further enacted, That the president and directors shall have power to call a general meeting of the stockholders, for purposes concerning the interest of the bank, giving at least six weeks notice, in one or more of the newspapers of the District, specifying in such notice the object or objects of such meeting.

SEC. 11. And be it further enacted, That the shares of the capital stock, at any time owned by any individual stockholder, shall be transferable only on the books of the bank according to such rules, as may, conformably to law, be established in that behalf, by the president and directors; but all debts actually due and payable to the bank (days of grace for payment being passed) by a stockholder, requesting a transfer, must be satisfied, before such transfer shall be made, unless the president and directors shall direct to the contrary.

SEC. 12. And be it further enacted, That the dividends of the profits of the company, or so much of said profits as shall be deemed expedient and proper, shall be declared half yearly, in the first week in April and October, in each year; the amount of said dividend shall from time to time be determined by the president and directors, and shall in no case exceed the amount of the net profits actually acquired by the company, so that the capital stock of the said company shall never be impaired by dividends.

SEC. 13. And be it further enacted, That if the said directors shall at any time, wilfully and knowingly make or declare any dividend which shall impair the said capital stock, all the directors present at the making or declaring of said dividend, and consenting thereto, shall be liable in their individual capacities to the company, for the amount or proportion of said capital stock so divided by the said directors; and each director who shall be present at the making or declaring of such dividend, shall be deemed to have consented thereto, unless he shall immediately enter in writing his dissent, on the minutes of the proceedings of the board, and give notice thereof, to the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States.

SEC. 14. And be it further enacted, That the bank shall in no case be owners of any ships or vessels, directly or indirectly be concerned in trade, or the importation or exportation, purchase, or sale of any goods, wares, or merchandise whatever, except bills of exchange, bullion, stock of the United States, or of incorporated institutions, and such ships, vessels, goods, wares, or merchandise, as shall be truly pledged to them by way of security for debts due, owing or growing due to the said bank, or purchased by it to secure such debts.

SEC. 15. And be it further enacted, That the bank shall not purchase or hold any lands, tenements, or other real estates, other than what may be necessary for the convenient transaction of its business, unless such lands, tenements, and real estates, shall have been bona fide mortgaged to the bank by way of security, or conveyed to it in satisfaction of debts previously contracted in the course of dealings, or purchased to secure debts contracted with or due to the bank; and in every instance in which the bank may become the owners or claimants of lands, tenements, or real estates, the president and directors are empowered to sell or dispose of the same, in such a manner as they may deem beneficial for the said bank.

SEC. 16. And be it further enacted, That if any vacancy shall at any time happen among the directors, by death, resignation, or otherwise, the rest of the directors for the time being, shall elect a director to fill the vacancy.

SEC. 17. And be it further enacted, That any number of stockholders, not less than twenty, who shall be proprietors of not less than four thousand shares, may for any purpose relative to the institution, at any time apply to the president and directors, to call a general meeting of the stockholders, and if by them refused, the said number of stockholders, proprietors of not less than the number of shares aforesaid, shall have power to call a general meeting of the stockholders, giving at least sixty days notice in two or more of the public newspapers in the District, specifying in such notice the object or objects of such call.

SEC. 18. And be it further enacted, That the said bank shall not at any time discount or loan a greater sum than double the amount of the capital stock, which shall be actually paid in.

SEC. 19. And be it further enacted, That the total amount of the debts which the said corporation shall at any time owe, whether by bond, bill, note, or other contract, shall not exceed twice the amount of their capital stock actually paid, over and above the moneys then actually deposited in the bank for safe-keeping. In case of excess, the directors, under whose administration it shall happen, shall be liable for the same in their natural and private capacities; and an action of debt may in such case be brought against them or any of them, their or any of their heirs, executors, or administrators, in any court proper to try the same, by any creditor or creditors of said corporation, and may be prosecuted to judgment and execution, any condition, covenant, or agreement to the contrary notwithstanding. But this shall not be construed to exempt said corporation, or the lands, tenements, goods, or chattels of the same, from being also liable for, and chargeable with said excess. Such of said directors who may have been absent when said excess was contracted or created, or who may have dissented from the resolution or act whereby the same was so contracted or created, may respectively exonerate themselves from being so liable, by forthwith giving notice of the fact, and of their absence or dissent, to the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, and to the stockholders at a general meeting, which they shall have power to call for that purpose; and the body corporate hereby created, and the capital stock thereof, shall be liable for all the debts and engagements contracted, or which, before or on the said fourth day of March, in the year eighteen hundred and eleven, shall be contracted by the company, or co-partnership heretofore created by the articles of association herein before mentioned, and which carried on the banking business under the name and style of "The President and Directors of the Union Bank of Georgetown;" and the creditors of the said co-partnership, shall have the like remedy by action, against the said body corporate, as they had or have, or may or can have against the said co-partnership.

Sec. 20. And be it further enacted, That in case it should at any time happen, that an election of directors should not be made, on any day when, pursuant to this act, it ought to have been made, the said corporation shall not for that cause be deemed to be dissolved; but it shall be lawful on any other day to hold and make an election of directors, at a meeting to be called in such manner as shall be prescribed by the laws and ordinances of the said corporation.

Sec. 21. And be it further enacted, That this act shall, to all intents and purposes, be deemed and held a public act, and be and continue in force for the term of ten years, from and after the fourth day of March, which will be in the year of our Lord, one thousand eight hundred eleven, and no longer.

Approved, February 18, 1811.

An Act making a further distribution of such laws of the United States, as respect the Public Lands.

Be it enacted, &c., That the copies of the laws prepared and printed under the authority of "An act providing for printing and distributing of such laws of the United States as respect the public lands," passed the twenty-seventh day of April, one thousand eight hundred and ten, not otherwise disposed of, shall be distributed in the manner following, that is to say: The President and Vice President of the United States, the members of the Senate and House of Representatives, the Secretaries of the State, Treasury, War, and Navy Departments, the Attorney General, the Comptroller, and Register of the Treasury, the Judges of the Supreme and District Courts of the United States, the Governors and Judges of the Territories, the Surveyor General of the United States, and the Surveyor of the lands of the United States south of Tennessee, shall each receive one copy; the clerks in each of the Departments of State, Treasury, and War, employed on land business, five copies; the Secretary of the Senate, to be placed on his table for the use of the Senate, five copies; the Clerk of the House of Representatives, to be placed on his table, for the use of the House of Representatives, ten copies; two hundred and fifty copies shall be placed in the Library, and remain there under the same regulations as the other laws of the United States; one hundred copies shall be deposited in the Treasury Department, for the use of the land boards and offices which may hereafter be established; and the remainder shall be placed in the Library, and each member of Congress hereafter elected, shall, so long as any remain, exclusive of the two hundred and fifty copies before mentioned, be entitled to one copy at the commencement of that session of Congress next succeeding his election.

Approved, February 18, 1811.

An Act to enable the people of the Territory of Orleans to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of such State into the Union, on an equal footing with the original States; and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, &c., That the inhabitants of all that part of the territory or country ceded under the name of Louisiana, by the treaty made at Paris on the thirtieth of April, one thousand eight hundred and three, between the United States and France, contained within the following limits, that is to say: beginning at the mouth of the river Sabine, thence by a line to be drawn along the middle of the said river, including all islands to the thirty-second degree of latitude, thence due north, to the northernmost part of the thirty-third degree of north latitude; thence along the said parallel of latitude to the river Mississippi; thence down the said river to the river Iberville; and from thence along the middle of the said river and Lakes Maurepas and Pontchartrain, to the Gulf of Mexico; thence bounded by the said gulf to the place of beginning: including all islands within three leagues of the coast, be and they are hereby authorized to form for themselves a constitution and State government, and to assume such name as they may deem proper, under the provisions and upon the conditions hereinafter mentioned.

Public Acts of Congress.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That all free white male citizens of the United States, who shall have arrived at the age of twenty-one years, and resided within the said Territory, at least one year previous to the day of election, and shall have paid a territorial, county, or district, or parish tax; and all persons having in other respects the legal qualifications to vote for representatives in the General Assembly of the said Territory, be and they are hereby authorized to choose representatives to form a convention; who shall be apportioned amongst the several counties, districts, and parishes in the said Territory of Orleans, in such manner as the Legislature of the said Territory shall by law direct. The number of representatives shall not exceed sixty; and the elections for the representatives aforesaid shall take place on the third Monday in September next, and shall be conducted in the same manner as is now provided by the laws of the said Territory, for electing members for the House of Representatives.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the members of the convention, when duly elected, be and they are hereby authorized to meet at the city of New Orleans, on the first Monday of November next, which convention, when met, shall first determine, by a majority of the whole number elected, whether it be expected or not, at that time, to form a constitution and State government, for the people within the said Territory, and if it be determined to be expedient, then the convention shall in like manner declare, in behalf of the people of the said Territory, that it adopts the Constitution of the United States; whereupon the said convention shall be, and hereby is, authorized to form a constitution and State government, for the people of the said Territory: Provided, The constitution to be formed, in virtue of the authority herein given, shall be republican, and consistent with the Constitution of the United States; that it shall contain the fundamental principles of civil and religious liberty; that it shall secure to the citizen the trial by jury in all criminal cases, and the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus, conformable to the provisions of the Constitution of the United States; and that after the admission of the said Territory of Orleans as a State into the Union, the laws which such State may pass shall be promulgated, and its records of every description shall be preserved, and its judicial and legislative written proceedings conducted, in the language in which the laws and the judicial and legislative written proceedings of the United States are now published and conducted: And provided also, That the said convention shall provide by an ordinance, irrevocable without the consent of the United States, that the people inhabiting the said Territory do agree and declare that they forever disclaim all right or title to the waste or unappropriated lands, lying within the said Territory; and that the same shall be and remain at the sole and entire disposition of the United States; and moreover that each and every tract of land, sold by Congress, shall be and remain exempt from any tax, laid by the order or under the authority of the State, whether for State, county, township, parish, or any other purpose whatever, for the term of five years from and after the respective days of the sales thereof; and that the lands, belonging to citizens of the United States, residing without the said State, shall never be taxed higher than the lands belonging to persons residing therein; and that no taxes shall be imposed on lands the property of the United States; and that the river Mississippi and the navigable rivers and waters leading into the same or into the Gulf of Mexico, shall be common highways and forever free, as well to the inhabitants of the said State as to other citizens of the United States, without any tax, duty, impost or toll therefor, imposed by the said State.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That in case the convention shall declare its assent in behalf of the people of the said Territory, to the adoption of the Constitution of the United States, and shall form a constitution and State government for the people of the said Territory of Orleans, the said convention, as soon thereafter as may be, is hereby required to cause to be transmitted to Congress the instrument, by which its assent to the Constitution of the United States is thus given and declared, and also a true and attested copy of such constitution or frame of State government, as shall be formed and provided by said convention and if the same shall not be disapproved by Congress, at their next session, after the receipt thereof, the said State shall be admitted into the Union, upon the same footing with the original States.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That five per centum of the net proceeds of the sales of the lands of the United States, after the first day of January, shall be applied to laying out and constructing public roads and levees in the said State, as the Legislature thereof may direct.

Approved, February 20, 1811.

An Act to enable the Georgetown Potomac Bridge Company to levy money for the object of its incorporation.

Be it enacted, &c., That the Directors of the Georgetown Potomac Bridge Company be, and they are hereby empowered to call a general meeting of the stockholders of said company, to be held at Georgetown, in the District of Columbia, by causing public notice to be given of the time and place of such meeting, in the National Intelligencer, and in one of the newspapers printed in each of the cities of New York, Philadelphia, and Baltimore, in four successive weeks, the last time at least thirty days before the day of holding the said general meeting. And if at such general meeting, the stockholders present, by themselves or legal representatives, shall determine to rebuild the bridge at or near the little falls of the river Potomac, (for the purpose of erecting which originally was the object of their incorporation,) the holders of two-thirds of the stocks represented at that meeting concurring, then it shall and may be lawful for the directors of said company, or any two of them, and they are hereby empowered, to assess upon and collect, from the stockholders of the said company, such sum and sums of money, as shall be necessary to pay its debts already incurred, and to rebuild, make and keep in repair the said bridge, together with the road leading thereto from Georgetown: Provided, That the whole amount of such assessments shall not exceed twenty-five dollars on each share in the stock of said company. And any such assessment and assessments, the said directors shall give public notice to the said stockholders, by advertising the same in the newspapers aforesaid; and the sum and sums which shall be so assessed, the said stockholders are hereby required to pay to the said directors, within sixty days after such notice; and on failure thereof, for the space of thirty days, after the expiration of the said sixty days, the said directors, or any two of them, are hereby authorized to sell the share or shares of any and every delinquent stockholder; every such sale to be made at public auction in Georgetown aforesaid, on the day specified in said advertisement: Provided, That no more shares shall be sold than shall be deemed necessary to levy the sum and sums of money which shall be assessed as aforesaid; and that the surplus, if any, arising on any such sales, shall by the directors aforesaid, be deposited in the Bank of Columbia, for the use of the owner or owners of the share or shares so sold. And the said directors, or any two of them, shall transfer on the books of the said company, to the purchaser or purchasers, the share or shares so sold, and if demanded give a certificate or certificates thereof, under their hands and seals, which shall secure to such purchaser, or purchasers, a valid title to the same.

Approved February 22, 1811.

An Act providing for the sale of a tract of land lying in the State of Tennessee, and a tract in the Indiana Territory.

Be it enacted, &c., That the commissioners appointed by an act of the Legislature of the State of Tennessee, passed on the fourteenth day of November, one thousand eight hundred and nine, to fix on a site for the town of Pulaski, in the county of Giles, and State aforesaid, and their successors in office, be and they are hereby authorized, on producing a receipt from the receiver of public moneys for at least one-twentieth part of the purchase money, to enter with the register of the land office, established for the lands ceded to the United States by the Cherokee and Chickasaw Indians, in the Mississippi Territory, a tract of land lying in a regular square, and containing six hundred and forty acres, which has or may be fixed on as a site for the town of Pulaski, as aforesaid, at the same price and on the same terms and conditions of payment as are provided with respect to the other public lands sold at private sale at the said office; and, on completing the payment of the purchase money, a patent shall be granted therefor to the said commissioners and their successors in office, in trust, for the use of the said county of Giles, for the purpose aforesaid.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the commissioners appointed by an act of the Legislature of the Indiana Territory, to fix on a proper site for the permanent seat of government for the said Territory, be, and they are hereby authorized, and their successors in office, so soon as the surveys under the authority of the United States shall have been made of the lands which they shall select, and on producing a receipt from the receiver of public moneys, for at least one-twentieth part of the purchase money, to enter with the register of the land office for the district, in which the land lies, any four quarter sections, of land adjoining to each other, which have not been reserved by any former act of Congress, and which the said commissioners may select and fix on as a site for the permanent seat of government for the said Territory, and payment shall be made therefor at the same price, and on the same terms and conditions, as are provided in respect to the other public lands sold at private sale in the same district; and on completing the payment of the purchase money, a patent shall be granted therefor to the said commissioners and their successors in office, in trust for the use of said Territory, for the purpose aforesaid.

Approved, February 25, 1811.

An Act providing for the removal of the land office established at Nashville, in the State of Tennessee, and Canton, in the State of Ohio; and to authorize the register and receiver of public moneys to superintend the public sales of land in the district east of Pearl river.

Be it enacted, &c., That the President of the United States be, and he hereby is, authorized to remove the land office established for the sale of the public lands ceded to the United States by the Cherokee and Chickasaw Indians in the Mississippi Territory, from Nashville, to such place within the district for which it was established as he may judge most proper; and to remove the land office from Canton, in the State of Ohio, to some suitable place within the district for which it was established.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the public sales of the public lands, in the district east of Pearl river, in the Mississippi Territory, and, also, in the district of Kaskaskia, in the Illinois Territory, be conducted under the superintendence alone of the register and receiver of public moneys for the said districts, who are hereby authorized and empowered to superintend the same, in their respective districts, any law to the contrary notwithstanding; and they shall receive the compensation provided by law for the superintendents of public sales in the districts aforesaid.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That, if any tract of the public lands which has been sold, or may hereafter be sold, in any State or Territory wherein a land office is, or may be established, and on which complete payment has not, or may not have been made, within the time prescribed by law for completing the same, and the tract having been advertised for sale, agreeably to law, it shall be lawful to offer the same for sale at public vendue, at the time and place of the sitting of the court for the county in which the land office is kept for the district to which the tract belongs, whether the court shall be denominated a court of quarter sessions, or by whatever other designation it may be known.

Approved, February 25, 1811.

An Act establishing Navy Hospitals.

Be it enacted, &c., That the money hereafter collected by virtue of the act, entitled "An act in addition to 'An act for the relief of sick and disabled seamen,'" shall be paid to the Secretary of the Navy, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Secretary of War, for the time being, who are hereby appointed a board of commissioners, by the name and style of Commissioners of Navy Hospitals, which, together with the sum of fifty thousand dollars hereby appropriated out of the unexpended balance of the marine hospital fund, to be paid to the commissioners aforesaid, shall constitute a fund for navy hospitals.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That all fines imposed on navy officers, seamen and marines, shall be paid to the Commissioners of Navy Hospitals.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the Commissioners of Navy Hospitals be, and they are hereby authorized and required to procure, at a suitable place or places, proper sites for navy hospitals, and if the necessary buildings are not procured with the site, to cause such to be erected, having due regard to economy, and giving preference to such plans as with most convenience and least cost will admit of subsequent additions, as the funds will permit, and circumstances require; and the commissioners are required, at one of the establishments, to provide a permanent asylum for disabled and decrepit navy officers, seamen and marines.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Navy be authorized and required to prepare the necessary rules and regulations for the government of the institution, and report the same to the next session of Congress.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That, when any navy officer, seaman, or marine, shall be admitted into a navy hospital, that the institution shall be allowed one ration per day during his continuance therein, to be deducted from the account of the United States with such officer, seaman, or marine; and, in like manner, when any officer, seaman, or marine, entitled to a pension, shall be admitted into a navy hospital, such pension, during his continuance therein, shall be paid to the Commissioners of the Navy Hospitals, and deducted from the account of such pensioner.

Approved, February 26, 1811.

An Act in addition to the act, entitled "An act supplementary to the act concerning Consuls and Vice-Consuls," and for the further protection of American seamen.

Be it enacted, &c., That in all cases where distressed mariners and seamen of the United States have been transported from foreign ports where there was no consul, vice-consul, commercial agent, or vice-commercial agent, of the United States, to ports of the United States; and in all cases where they shall hereafter be so transported, there shall be allowed to the master or owner of each vessel, in which they shall or may have been transported, such reasonable compensation, in addition to the allowance now fixed by law, as shall be deemed equitable to the Comptroller of the Treasury.

Approved, February 28, 1811.

An Act supplementary to the act, entitled "An act concerning the commercial intercourse between the United States and Great Britain and France, and their dependencies, and for other purposes."

Be it enacted, &c., That no vessel, owned wholly by a citizen or citizens of the United States, which shall have departed from a British port prior to the second day of February, one thousand eight hundred and eleven, and no merchandise, owned wholly by a citizen or citizens of the United States, imported in such vessel, shall be liable to seizure or forfeiture, on account of any infraction, or presumed infraction, of the provisions of the act to which this act is a supplement.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That, in case Great Britain shall so revoke or modify her edicts, as that they shall cease to violate the neutral commerce of the United States, the President shall declare the fact by proclamation; and such proclamation shall be admitted as evidence, and no other evidence shall be admitted of such revocation or modification in any suit or prosecution which may be instituted under the fourth section of the act to which this act is a supplement. And the restrictions imposed, or which may be imposed, by virtue of the said act, shall, from the date of such proclamation, cease and be discontinued.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That, until the proclamation aforesaid shall have been issued, the several provisions of the third, fourth, fifth, sixth, seventh, eighth, ninth, tenth, and eighteenth sections of the act, entitled "An act to interdict the commercial intercourse between the United States and Great Britain and France and their dependencies, and for other purposes," shall have full force, and be immediately carried into effect against Great Britain, her colonies, and dependencies: Provided, however, That any vessel or merchandise which may, in pursuance thereof, be seized, prior to the fact being ascertained, whether Great Britain shall, on or before the second day of February, one thousand eight hundred and eleven, have revoked or modified her edicts in the manner above-mentioned, shall, nevertheless, be restored on application of the parties, on their giving bond, with approved sureties, to the United States, in a sum equal to the value thereof, to abide the decision of the proper court of the United States thereon; and any such bond shall be considered as satisfied, if Great Britain shall, on or before the second day of February, one thousand eight hundred and eleven, have revoked or modified her edicts in the manner above-mentioned: Provided, also, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to affect any ships or vessels wholly owned by a citizen or citizens of the United States, which had cleared out for the Cape of Good Hope, or for any port beyond the same, prior to the tenth day of November, one thousand eight hundred and ten.

Approved, March 2, 1811.

An Act for establishing trading houses with the Indian tribes.

Be it enacted, &c., That it shall be lawful for the President of the United States to establish trading houses at such ports and places on the frontiers, or in the Indian country, on either or both sides of the Mississippi river, as he shall judge most convenient, for the purpose of carrying on a liberal trade with the several Indian nations, within the United States or their territories.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the President of the United States shall be authorized to appoint a Superintendent of Indian trade, whose duty it shall be to purchase and take charge of all goods intended for trade with the Indian nations, aforesaid, and to transmit the same to such places as he shall be directed by the President; and he shall take an oath or affirmation faithfully to execute the trust committed to him, and that he will not directly or indirectly be concerned or interested in any trade, commerce, or barter, restricted by this law, and except on the public account; and he shall also give bond, in the penal sum of twenty thousand dollars, with sufficient security, to be approved by the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, truly and honestly to account for all money, goods, and other property whatever, which shall come into his hands, or for which, in good faith, he ought so to account, and to perform all the duties required of him by this act; and he shall render to the Secretary of the Treasury a quarter yearly account of all his receipts and expenditures of cash, purchases, and transmittals of goods for the Indian trade, to be settled and adjusted by the accounting officer of the Treasury, as other public accounts.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the Superintendent of Indian trade shall receive an annual salary of two thousand dollars, payable quarter yearly, at the Treasury of the United States.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the President of the United States shall be authorized to appoint an agent, and, when he shall deem it proper, an assistant agent, for each trading-house establishment, established under the provisions of this act; and every such agent and assistant agent shall give bond, with sufficient security, in such sum as the President shall direct, truly and honestly to account for all the money, goods, and other property whatever, which shall come into his hands, and for which he ought so to account; and to perform all the duties required of him by this act; and shall take an oath or affirmation faithfully to execute the trust committed to him; and that he will not directly or indirectly be concerned or interested in any trade, commerce, or barter, but on the public account.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of each of the said agents to receive, from the Superintendent of Indian trade, and dispose of in trade with the Indian nations aforesaid, such goods as may be transmitted to him by the superintendent, to be received and disposed of as aforesaid, according to the rules and orders which the President of the United States shall prescribe; and he shall render an account, quarter yearly, to the Superintendent of Indian trade, of all money, goods, and other property whatsoever, which shall be transmitted to him, or which shall come into his hands, or for which, in good faith, he ought to account; and he shall transmit duplicates of his accounts to the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That the Superintendent of Indian trade, the agents, or their clerks, or other persons employed by them, shall not be, directly or indirectly, concerned or interested in carrying on trade or commerce in any of the goods or articles bought for, or supplied to, or received from the Indians, or shall be owner, in whole or in part, of any sea vessel, or shall take or apply to his or their use any gain or emolument for negotiating or transacting any business in the Indian department, other than what shall be allowed by law; and that the said agents, assistant agents, or any persons employed by them, shall not be directly or indirectly concerned or interested in carrying on the business of trade or commerce, on their own or any other than the public account, or take or apply to his or their use any emolument or gain for negotiating any such business, during their appointment, agency, or employment, respectively, other than provided by this act, or excepting for and on account of the United States; and if any such persons shall offend against any of the prohibitions aforesaid, he shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall, upon conviction thereof, forfeit to the United States a sum not exceeding one thousand dollars, and shall be removed from such office, agency, or employment, and forever thereafter be incapable of holding any office under the United States: Provided, That if any person, other than a public prosecutor, shall give information of any such offence upon which a prosecution and conviction shall be had; one-half of the aforesaid penalty, when recovered, shall be for the use of the person giving such information: And provided, also, That if such misdemeanor be committed by the Superintendent of Indian trade, or by any agent or assistant agent, it shall be deemed a breach of the condition of his bond, and the penalty thereof may be recovered in any court having competent jurisdiction of the same.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That the prices of goods supplied to, and to be paid for by, the Indians, shall be regulated in such manner, that the capital stock furnished by the United States shall not be diminished.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That if any agent or agents, their clerks, or other person employed by them, shall purchase or receive from any Indian, in the way of trade or barter, any gun, or other article commonly used in hunting, any instrument of husbandry or cooking utensil, of the kind usually obtained by Indians in their intercourse with white people, or any article of clothing, excepting skins or furs, he or they shall, respectively, forfeit the sum of one hundred dollars for each offence, to be recovered by action of debt, in the name and to the use of the United States, in any court having jurisdiction in like cases: Provided, That no suit shall be commenced, except in the State or Territory within which the cause of action shall have arisen, or in which the defendant may reside; and it shall be the duty of the Superintendent of Indian trade, or of the Superintendents of Indian affairs, and their deputies, respectively, to whom information of every such offence shall be given, to collect the requisite evidence, if attainable, to prosecute the offender without delay.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That the goods requisite for annuities to the Indian nations within the United States, and the Territories thereof, and for treaties with them, and for presents to be made them at the Seat of Government, or elsewhere, shall henceforward be purchased and transmitted to the proper posts and places, by the Superintendent of Indian trade, upon orders from the Department of War, and the accounts therefor shall be rendered to the War Department.

SEC. 10. And be it further enacted, That, during the continuance of this act, the annual sum of two thousand dollars for the payment of the salary of the Superintendent of Indian trade, and the annual sum of two thousand five hundred dollars for the payment of the clerks in his office, (including the sum of eight hundred dollars, allowed for an additional clerk by the act passed on the twenty-sixth day of February, one thousand eight hundred and ten,) are hereby appropriated, to be paid out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated.

SEC. 11. And be it further enacted, That, during the continuance of this act, the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to draw annually from the Treasury of the United States a sum not exceeding fourteen thousand seven hundred and fifty dollars, to be applied under his direction to the payment of the agents, assistant agents, and clerks at the trading houses; which agents shall be allowed to draw out of the public supplies two rations each, and each clerk one ration per day; which rations, or such payments as may be made in lieu thereof, by the order of the President, shall be charged to the trading fund; and the President shall cause an annual report to be made to Congress of how much of the sum so authorized has been drawn, and in what manner the same has been applied.

SEC. 12. And be it further enacted, That the sum of two hundred and sixty thousand dollars, appropriated by the tenth section of the act, entitled "An act for establishing trading houses with the Indian tribes," approved twenty-first April, one thousand eight hundred and four, and the sum of forty thousand dollars, appropriated by the act, entitled "An act supplemental to the act, entitled 'An act for establishing trading houses with the Indian tribes,'" approved third March, one thousand eight hundred and nine, shall be and remain a fund for the purpose of carrying on trade and intercourse with the Indian nations, in the manner provided by this act, exclusive of the salary of the Superintendent of Indian trade, and of the allowances to agents, assistant agents, and clerks.

SEC. 13. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of said Superintendent of Indian trade, under the direction of the President of the United States, and upon such terms and conditions as he shall prescribe, to cause the furs and peltry, and other articles acquired in trade with the Indian nations, to be sold at public auction, in different parts of the United States, or otherwise disposed of, as may be deemed most advantageous to the United States.

SEC. 14. And be it further enacted, That if the President should deem it expedient to establish, under the authority of this act, trading houses, in addition to the number now in operation, for the purposes of carrying on a trade with the Indian tribes within the United States, or their Territories, the expenses for each trading house so established shall not exceed the following sums of money, in addition to the appropriations already made by this act, viz: For the principal agent, an annual sum, not exceeding one thousand dollars; for an assistant agent, if necessary, an annual sum not exceeding five hundred dollars; to be drawn by the President out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

SEC. 15. And be it further enacted, That, from and after the first day of April next, an act, entitled "An act for establishing trading houses with the Indian tribes," approved on the twenty-first of April, one thousand eight hundred and six, and an act, entitled "An act supplemental to the act, entitled 'An act for establishing trading houses with the Indian tribes,'" approved on the fourth day of March, one thousand eight hundred and nine, shall be, and the same are hereby, repealed:

Public Acts of Congress.

Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to exonerate any person who shall not have performed the duty, or who shall have violated any of the prohibitions contained in the said acts, from suits or prosecutions, but as to all bonds, contracts, debts, demands, rights, penalties, punishments, which have been made, have arisen, or have incurred, or which shall be made, arise, or be incurred, previous to the first day of April next, the said acts shall have the same force and effect as though this act had not been passed: Provided, likewise, That the Superintendent of Indian trade, the agents, assistant agents, and other persons employed under the aforesaid acts, shall continue to hold their several offices, appointments, and trusts, until otherwise removed, anything herein contained that might be construed to the contrary notwithstanding; and also the bonds, which they or either of them have given, or may give, for the faithful execution of their several duties and offices, shall continue to have the same force and effect, to all intents and purposes, as though this act had not been passed.

SEC. 16. And be it further enacted, That this act shall be in force, from and after the first day of April next, for the term of three years, and from thence to the end of the session of Congress next thereafter, and no longer.

Approved, March 2, 1811.

An Act to establish the districts of Mumphreymagog, of Oswegatchie, and of the White Mountains.

Be it enacted, &c., That, from and after the first day of April next, all that part of the State of Vermont, lying east of Lake Mumphreymagog, and including, also, all such shores and waters of the said lake as lie within the said State, shall constitute a district, to be called the district of Mumphreymagog, of which Derby shall be the sole port of entry; and a collector for the said district shall be appointed to reside at the said port of entry.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That, from and after the first day of April next, all the shores and waters of the river St. Lawrence, which lie in the State of New York, east of the western boundary of the county of St. Lawrence, and west of the western boundary of the collection district of Champlain, shall constitute a district to be called the district of Oswegatchie, of which Ogdenburg shall be the sole port of entry, and a collector for the said district shall be appointed to reside at Ogdenburg. And the President of the United States is authorized to establish another place in the said district to be a port of delivery only; and a surveyor shall be appointed to reside at such port of delivery.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That all that part of the State of New Hampshire which lies adjacent to the northern boundary of the United States, and north of forty-four degrees thirty minutes north latitude, shall, from and after the first day of April next, constitute a district to be called the district of "White Mountains;" the President of the United States is authorized to establish a place in the said district to be the port of entry; and a collector shall be appointed to reside at the said place.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to alter the place which had heretofore been designated to be the port of entry for the district of Vermont, and to establish another place to be such port of entry.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That, from and after the first day of April next, the collectors of the district established by this act, and the collectors of the districts of Vermont, Champlain, and Sackett's Harbor, and Oswego, shall each receive, in addition to the fees and commissions allowed by law, an annual salary of five hundred dollars a year; and the annual salary heretofore allowed to the collectors of the three last mentioned districts shall, from and after the said first day of April, be discontinued; and the surveyor to be appointed for the district of Oswegatchie shall receive, in addition to the fees allowed by law, a salary of one hundred and fifty dollars a year.

Approved, March 2, 1811.

An Act, authorizing a loan of money, for a sum not exceeding five millions of dollars.

Be it enacted, &c., That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, empowered to borrow, on the credit of the United States, a sum not exceeding five million of dollars, at a rate of interest, payable quarter-yearly, not exceeding six per centum per annum, and reimbursable at the pleasure of the United States, or at such periods as may be stipulated by contract, not exceeding six years from the first day of January next; to be applied, in addition to the moneys now in the Treasury, or which may be received therein from other sources during the present year, to defray any of the public expenses which are or may be authorized by law. The stock thereby created shall be transferable in the same manner as is provided by law for the transfer of the funded debt: And it is further hereby declared, That it shall be deemed a good execution of the said power to borrow, for the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approbation of the President of the United States, to cause to be constituted certificates of stock, signed by the Register of the Treasury, or by a commissioner of loans for the sum to be borrowed, or for any part thereof, bearing an interest of six per cent. per annum, transferable and reimbursable as aforesaid; and to cause the said certificates of stock to be sold at auction, after having given thirty days public notice of the time and place of such sale: Provided, That no such stock be sold under par.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That so much of the funds constituting the annual appropriation of eight millions of dollars, for the payment of the principal and interest of the public debt of the United States, as may be wanted for that purpose, is hereby pledged and appropriated for the payment of the interest, and for the reimbursment of the principal of the stock, which may be created by virtue of this act. It shall accordingly be the duty of the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund to cause to be applied and paid out of the said fund yearly, and every year, such sum and sums as may be annually wanted to discharge the interest accruing on the said stock, and to reimburse the principal, as the same shall become due, and may be discharged in conformity with the terms of the loan; and they are further authorized to apply, from time to time, such sum or sums out of said fund, as they may think proper, towards redeeming by purchase, and at a price not above par, the principal of the said stock, or any part thereof. And the faith of the United States is hereby pledged to establish sufficient revenues for making up any deficiency that may hereafter take place in the funds hereby appropriated for paying the said interest and principal sums, or any of them, in manner aforesaid.

Approved, March 2, 1811.

An Act to annex a part of the State of New Jersey to the collection district of New York; to remove the office of Collector of Niagara to Lewistown; to make Cape St. Vincent, in the district of Sackett's Harbor, a port of delivery; and out of the districts of Miami and Mississippi to make two new districts, to be called the districts of Sandusky and Teche; and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, &c., That all that part of the State of New Jersey, which lies north and east of Elizabethtown and Staten Island, be, and the same is hereby, annexed to the district of New York; that an assistant collector, to be appointed and commissioned by the President of the United States, shall reside at the town of Jersey, who shall have power to enter and clear vessels in like manner as the collector of New York is authorized by law to do; but such assistant collector shall nevertheless act in conformity to such instructions and regulations as he shall from time to time receive from the collector of New York; and that the said assistant collector shall receive for his annual salary one thousand dollars, in full for all services to be by him performed, and in lieu of commissions and fees.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That all that part of the Miami district, lying east of the western cape of Sandusky bay, shall be a district, to be called the district of Sandusky; and the President is hereby authorized to designate such place, in the district of Sandusky, as he shall judge expedient, to be the port of entry of the said district; and a collector for the said district shall be appointed, to reside at the port of entry.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That Cape Vincent, in the district of Sackett's Harbor, shall, from and after the thirty-first day of May next, be a port of delivery only; and a surveyor shall be appointed, to reside at the said port.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the collector's office shall, after the thirty-first day of May next, be removed from Fort Niagara to Lewistown, which last mentioned place shall in future be the residence of the collector; and also, that the office of the collector of the customs, for the district of Buffalo creek, shall be kept at such place or places in the town of Buffalo, as the President of the United States shall designate.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That ships or vessels, arriving from and after the first day of May next from the Cape of Good Hope, or from any place beyond the same, shall be admitted to make entry at Plymouth and Nantucket, ports of entry in the State of Massachusetts.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That, from and after the first day of May next, Bangor, in the district of Penobscot, in the State of Massachusetts, be, and the same is hereby made, a port of delivery, to be annexed to the district of Penobscot; and that a surveyor be appointed, to reside at the said port of delivery.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That all that part of the collection district of Mississippi which includes the waters of the river Teche, and all the shores, bays, and rivers, west of the Atchafalaya, be, and the same is hereby established as a new district, to be called the district of Teche; that Nova Iberia be the port of entry for the same; and that a collector be appointed, to reside at the port of entry.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That a surveyor be appointed to reside at or near the mouth of the Rappahannock river, at such place as the President of the United States shall designate.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That the several collectors and surveyors who may be appointed by virtue of this act, and whose salaries are not fixed by a preceding section, shall, in addition to the fees and commissions authorized by law, receive respectively the same annual salary which, by law, is allowed to the collectors and surveyors of the districts bordering on Lake Erie.

Approved, March 2, 1811.

An Act to extend the time for completing the Third Census, or enumeration of the inhabitants of the United States.

Be it enacted, &c., That the assistants in the several States and Territories for which returns have not been completed, have until the first Monday of June next, to make their returns to the marshals and secretaries; and that the marshals and secretaries have until the first Monday of July next, to make and file their returns in the office of the Secretary of State, any law to the contrary notwithstanding.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That there be paid, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Abram Gamble, of the State of Maryland, who was placed on the pension list from the eighteenth day of January, one thousand eight hundred and nine, the sum of fifty-three dollars and seventy-five cents, for arrears of pension from the twenty-fifth day of January, one thousand eight hundred and eight, when he first completed his testimony under an irregular commission, to the said eighteenth day of February, one thousand eight hundred and nine, being ten months and twenty-three days.

Approved, March 3, 1811.

An Act making further appropriations to complete the fortifications commenced for the security of the ports and harbors of the United States.

Be it enacted, &c., That for the purpose of completing the fortifications commenced for the security of the ports, towns, and harbors of the United States, and the Territories thereof, there be, and hereby is appropriated the sum of one hundred and thirty-one thousand and forty-six dollars and thirty cents, to be paid out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Approved, March 3, 1811.

An Act for allowing a reasonable compensation to the persons who have taken an account of the several manufacturing establishments and manufactures within the United States.

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he hereby is authorized, to allow such reasonable compensation as he shall deem adequate, for the services of each of those persons who took, under his direction, in pursuance of an act, entitled "An act further to alter and amend 'An act providing for the third census or enumeration of the inhabitants of the United States,'" an account of the several manufacturing establishments and manufactures within their several districts: Provided however, That nothing herein contained shall authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to expend, out of the fund already appropriated for taking the enumeration of the inhabitants of the United States, a sum exceeding thirty thousand dollars.

Approved, March 3, 1811.

An Act in addition to the act to regulate the laying out and making a road from Cumberland, in the State of Maryland, to the State of Ohio.

Be it enacted, &c., That in addition to the unexpended balance of the sum heretofore appropriated for laying out and making a road from Cumberland, in the State of Maryland, to the State of Ohio, the sum of fifty thousand dollars be, and the same is hereby appropriated, to be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and to be expended under the direction of the President of the United States, in making said road between Cumberland, in the State of Maryland, and Brownsville, in the State of Pennsylvania, commencing at Cumberland; which sum of fifty thousand dollars shall be replaced out of the fund reserved for laying out and making roads to the State of Ohio, by virtue of the seventh section of an act passed on the thirtieth day of April, one thousand eight hundred and two, entitled "An act to enable the people of the eastern division of the Territory Northwest of the river Ohio, to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of such State into the Union, on an equal footing with the original States, and for other purposes."

Public Acts of Congress.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby authorized and empowered to permit such deviations from the courses run and established by the commissioners under the authority of "An act to regulate the laying out and making a road from Cumberland in the State of Maryland, to the State of Ohio," as in his opinion shall be deemed expedient: Provided, That no deviation shall be made from the principal points established on said road between Cumberland and Brownsville. Approved, March 3, 1811.

An Act providing for the final adjustment of claims to lands, and for the sale of the public lands in the Territories of Orleans and Louisiana, and to repeal the act passed for the same purpose, and approved February sixteenth, one thousand eight hundred and eleven.

Be it enacted, &c., That the following allowances and compensations shall be made to the several officers appointed for the purpose of ascertaining the rights of persons claiming lands in the Territories of Orleans and Louisiana; which allowances and compensations shall be in full for all their services, including those rendered since their salaries respectively ceased; that is to say: To each of the commissioners, and to each of the clerks of the boards, fifty cents for each claim, duly filed according to law, which remained undecided on the first day of July, one thousand eight hundred and nine, and on which a decision has been made subsequent to that day; or shall hereafter be made, whether such decision be in favor of, or against the claim: which allowance of fifty cents shall be paid at the Treasury of the United States, from time to time, and on receipt of the transcripts of the decisions and of the reports of claims not finally confirmed, as the same may be transmitted by the boards respectively, to the Secretary of the Treasury, according to law. To each of the said commissioners and clerks a further allowance of five hundred dollars, to be paid after the completion of the business of each of the boards, respectively, to the officers then in office. And to each of the translators, at the rate of six hundred dollars a year, and not to exceed in the whole for each the term of eighteen months: Provided always, That the abovementioned allowance of fifty cents for each claim decided upon, shall not be made to any of the commissioners who may be absent at the time of such decisions; the attendance of each to be certified by the clerk, or by a majority of the board: And provided also, That no allowance shall be made to any agent heretofore employed by the Secretary of the Treasury for any period of time, subsequent to the time when such agent ceased to act, or when the board ceased to receive evidence.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the two principal deputy surveyors of the Territory of Orleans shall, and they are hereby authorized, in surveying and dividing such of the public lands in the said Territory, which are or may be authorized to be surveyed and divided, as are adjacent to any river, lake, creek, bayou, or water course, to vary the mode heretofore prescribed by law, so far as relates to the contents of the tracts, and to the angles and boundary lines, and to lay out the same into tracts, as far as practicable, of fifty-eight poles in front and four hundred and sixty-five poles in depth, of such shape, and bounded by such lines as the nature of the country will render practicable, and most convenient: Provided however, That such deviations from the ordinary mode of surveying shall be made with the approbation of, and in conformity with the general instructions which may be given to that effect, by the surveyor of the public lands south of the State of Tennessee.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That, for the disposal of the lands of the United States lying in the eastern land district of the Territory of Orleans, a land office shall be established at New Orleans; and that for the disposal of the lands of the United States lying south of Red river, in the western land district of the Territory of Orleans, a land office shall be established at Opelousas; and that for the disposal of the lands of the United States lying north of Red river, in the western land district of the Territory of Orleans, a land office shall be established, which shall be kept at such place as the President of the United States may direct. The register of the western land district of the Territory of Orleans shall act as register of the land office of Opelousas, and as one of the commissioners for ascertaining the rights of persons claiming lands in any part of the said western land district. And for the land office north of the Red river, a register, and for each of the said three offices a receiver of public moneys shall be appointed, who shall give security in the same manner, in the same sums, and whose compensations, emoluments, duties, and authority, shall in every respect be the same, in relation to the lands which shall be disposed of at their offices, as are or may be provided by law, in relation to the registers and receivers of public moneys in the several offices established for the disposal of the lands of the United States in the Territory of Mississippi.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the powers vested in the President of the United States by the eleventh section of the act, entitled "An act supplementary to an act, entitled 'An act for ascertaining and adjusting the titles and claims to land within the Territory of Orleans, and the District of Louisiana,'" passed on the twenty-first day of April, one thousand eight hundred and six, in relation to the public lands, lying in the western district of the Territory of Orleans, and all the other provisions made by the same section, for the sale of said lands, and for obtaining patents for the same, shall be, and the same are hereby, in every respect, extended to the public lands lying in the eastern district of the Territory of Orleans.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That every person who, either by virtue of a French or Spanish grant recognised by the laws of the United States, or under a claim confirmed by the commissioners appointed for the purpose of ascertaining the rights of persons claiming lands in the Territory of Orleans, owns a tract of land bordering on any river, creek, bayou, or water course, in the said Territory, and not exceeding in depth forty arpens, French measure, shall be entitled to a preference in becoming the purchaser of any vacant tract of land adjacent to, and back of his own tract, not exceeding forty arpens, French measure, in depth, nor in quantity of land that which is contained in his own tract, at the same price, and on the same terms and conditions, as are, or may be, provided by law for the other public lands in the said Territory. And the principal deputy surveyor of each district respectively shall be and he is hereby authorized, under the superintendence of the surveyor of the public lands south of the State of Tennessee, to cause to be surveyed the tracts claimed by virtue of this section; and in all cases where by reason of bends in the river, lake, creek, bayou, or water course, bordering on the tract, and of adjacent claims of a similar nature, each claimant cannot obtain a tract equal in quantity to the adjacent tract already owned by him, to divide the vacant land applicable to that object between the several claimants, in such manner as to him may appear most equitable: Provided however, That the right of pre-emption granted by this section shall not extend so far in depth, as to include lands fit for cultivation, bordering on another river, creek, bayou, or water course. And every person entitled to the benefit of this section shall, within three years after the date of this act, deliver to the register of the proper land office, a notice in writing, stating the situation and extent of the tract of land he wishes to purchase, and shall also make the payment and payments for the same, at the time and times, which are, or may be, prescribed by law for the disposal of the other public lands in the said Territory; the time of his delivering the notice aforesaid being considered as the date of the purchase. And if any such person shall fail to deliver such notice within the said period of three years, or to make such payment or payments at the time abovementioned, his right of pre-emption shall cease and become void; and the land may thereafter be purchased by any other person in the same manner, and on the same terms, as are or may be provided by law for the sale of other public lands in the said Territory.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That the land offices established by virtue of the third section of this act, shall be opened on the first day of January, one thousand eight hundred and twelve, for the sale of all the public lands, with the exception of section number sixteen, of the salt springs, and land contiguous thereto, and of the tracts reserved for the support of seminaries of learning as hereinafter provided, which shall have been previously surveyed, and the surveys thereof returned according to law to the registers of the land offices respectively; and on the first day of February, one thousand eight hundred and twelve, for the sale of such of the public lands, which from the nature of the country cannot be surveyed in the ordinary way, and are embraced by the provisions of the second section of this act, as shall have, at least six weeks previous to the said first day of February, one thousand eight hundred and twelve, been advertised for sale by the surveyor of the public lands south of the State of Tennessee, with the approbation of the President of the United States. The public sales for the land sub-divided into quarter sections in the ordinary way, shall be held for one calendar month, under the superintendence of the register and receiver of each land office respectively, and of either the surveyor of public lands south of Tennessee, or of his principal deputy surveyor in the district, who shall each receive six dollars for each day's attendance on the same; and no tract of land shall be sold at said public sales for a less price than that which is or may be prescribed by law, for the sale of public lands in the Mississippi Territory. And from and after the first day of February, one thousand eight hundred and twelve, any tract which has been thus offered for sale at public sale, and remains unsold, as well as any tract of land embraced by the provisions of the second section of this act, the sale of which is authorized by this section, may be disposed of at private sale by the register of the land office, for the same price which is or may be prescribed by law, for the sale of public lands in the Mississippi Territory. All the lands sold by virtue of this section, shall in every other respect be sold on the same terms of payment, and conditions, in the same manner, and under the same regulations as are, or may be, prescribed by law for the sale of public lands in the Mississippi Territory: Provided, however, That in case of an application being made at the same time, for the purchase at private sale of the same tract of land by two or more persons, one of whom did actually inhabit and cultivate such tract of land at the time of passing this act, and still continues to inhabit and cultivate the same at the time of such application, the preference shall be given to the person thus inhabiting and cultivating such tract of land: And provided also, That till after the final decision of Congress thereon, no tract of land shall be offered for sale, the claim to which has been in due time, and according to law, presented to the register of the land office, and filed in his office, for the purpose of being investigated by the commissioners appointed for the purpose of ascertaining the rights of persons claiming lands in the Territory of Orleans; or which shall have been located by or for Major-General Lafayette, according to law.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That in addition to the township already reserved for that purpose by law in the western district of the Territory of Orleans, and which shall be located south of Red river, another entire township shall be located by the Secretary of the Treasury north of Red river, for the use of a seminary of learning, and also an entire township in the Territory of Louisiana, for the support of a seminary of learning within the said Territory.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That the Surveyor General shall cause such of the public lands in the Territory of Louisiana, as the President of the United States shall direct, to be surveyed and divided in the same manner and under the same regulations and limitation as to expenses, as is provided by law in relation to the lands of the United States northwest of the river Ohio and above the mouth of Kentucky river.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That, for the disposal of the lands of the United States lying in the Territory of Louisiana, a land office shall be established, which shall be kept at such place as the President of the United States may direct; and a register and receiver of public moneys shall be appointed for said office, who shall give security in the same manner, in the same sums, and whose compensations, emoluments, duties and authority, shall in every respect be the same, in relation to the lands which shall be disposed of at their office, as are or may be provided for by law in relation to the register and receiver of public moneys in the several offices established for the disposal of the lands of the United States northwest of the river Ohio, and above the mouth of Kentucky river.

SEC. 10. And be it further enacted, That the President of the United States be and he is hereby authorized, whenever he shall think proper, to direct so much of the public lands lying in the Territory of Louisiana, as shall have been surveyed in conformity with the eighth section of this act, to be offered for sale. All such lands shall, with the exception of the section "number sixteen," which shall be reserved in each township for the support of schools within the same, with the exception also of a tract reserved for the support of a seminary of learning, as provided for by the seventh section of this act, and with the exception also of the salt springs and lead mines, and land contiguous thereto, which, by the direction of the President of the United States, may be reserved for the future disposal of the said States, shall be offered for sale to the highest bidder, under the direction of the register of the land office and the receiver of public moneys and of the principal deputy surveyor, and on such day or days as shall, by public proclamation of the President of the United States, be designated for that purpose. The sale shall remain open for three weeks, and no longer. The lands shall be sold for a price not less than that which has been or may be fixed by law for the public lands northwest of the river Ohio, and above the mouth of Kentucky river. And shall in every other respect be sold in tracts of the same size, on the same terms and conditions, as have been or may be by law provided for the lands sold in the State of Ohio. The superintendents of the said public sales shall each receive six dollars for each day's attendance on the said sales. All the lands which have been thus offered for sale, at public sale, remaining unsold at the closing of the public sales, may be disposed of at private sale by the register of the land office, for the same price which is or may be prescribed by law for the sale of public lands in the State of Ohio: Provided, however, That, till after the decision of Congress thereon, no tract of land shall be offered for sale, the claim to which has been in due time and according to law presented to the recorder of land titles in the district of Louisiana and filed in his office, for the purpose of being investigated by the Commissioners appointed for ascertaining the rights of persons claiming lands in the Territory of Louisiana. And patents shall be obtained for all lands sold in the Territory of Louisiana, in the same manner and on the same terms as is or may be provided by law for land sold in the State of Ohio.

SEC. 11. And be it further enacted, That the claim of the corporation of the city of New Orleans, to the common adjacent thereto, and within six hundred yards from the fortifications of the same, as confirmed by the act, entitled "An act respecting claims to lands in the Territories of Orleans and Louisiana," shall be deemed valid, although the relinquishment of the said corporation to any claim beyond the said distance of six hundred yards was not made till after the expiration of the period of six months prescribed by the act last mentioned.

SEC. 12. And be it further enacted, That all the navigable rivers and waters in the Territories of Orleans and Louisiana shall be and forever remain public highways.

SEC. 13. And be it further enacted, That a sum not exceeding forty thousand dollars be, and the same is hereby appropriated, for the purpose of carrying this act into effect, which sum shall be paid out of unappropriated moneys in the Treasury.

SEC. 14. And be it further enacted, That the act entitled "An act providing for the final adjustment of claims to lands, and for the sale of the public lands in the Territories of Orleans and Louisiana," approved February the sixteenth, eighteen hundred and eleven, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Approved March 3, 1811.
